The Senator from Vermont further says:

We have already seen that by means of the various experiments upon which the Government of the United States has entered it has become possible, and is therefore taken advantage of, for a private business corporation which represents the United States of America to exceed its authorization five times over in the course of 2 years. So what is the significance of the limitation in the proposed act of $100,000,000?

That is another statement absolutely not borne out by any evidence or by any facts.

I call the attention of the Senate to another very unfair argument made by the Senator from Vermont. He is complaining of the T. V. A., of this wicked board. He says they have, without authority, taken millions of dollars out of the Treasury of the United States. I do not know how they got it. I do not know how they could do it. As a matter of fact, they have not done it. They could not do it if they wanted to.

The Senator argued against using the T. V. A. service as a yardstick, and he took up nitrate plant no. 1 and nitrate plant no. 2 and complained that in arriving at a basis upon which they could figure rates the T. V. A. did not put in those plants at what they cost the Government. Here is what he said:

Cost of nitrate plant no. 1, $13,757,807.58.

That plant has been a failure, and everyone knows it. I said so a hundred times on the floor of the Senate before the Tennessee Valley Act ever was passed. The plant never made a pound of nitrate or produced a pound from the atmosphere. The plant was constructed with the best of intentions. I am not criticizing the men who did it. They thought they knew how to produce nitrogen from the atmosphere by means of an improvement over the cyanamide process, and our chemical engineers under the Wilson administration built nitrate plant no. 2 with the idea of getting nitrogen from the air by the Haber process. Plant no. 1 cost $13,757,807.58. It is not worth, and never has been worth, anything but its scrap value; and no one ever claimed it was worth anything else. Everyone who has had anything to do with it knows that statement to be true. Many Senators have been there and have seen the plant. It was an absolute failure because our men did not know what they thought they knew about the production of nitrogen from the atmosphere.

Again let me say, I charge no one with bad faith. I think those who constructed the plant acted in good faith, but the experiment was a complete failure. That plant, however, is part of the Government property down there; and under the law the Government property was turned over to T. V. A.; and the question is, when we come to figure rates, What shall be the basis? The Senator objects because they do not figure in the cost of the nitrate plant in arriving at the basis of rates.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, that property would not be used and useful in the production of energy there, would it?

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, no; it had nothing whatever to do with the production of energy. The Senator says it is wrong to take that out of the capitalization when we come to figure rates.

Here is nitrate plant no. 2, another one, which cost a little over $71,000,000. Under the T. V. A. Act the Board is required to keep that plant in good stand-by condition. It is considered in our military plans, so that in case of war we could put it to use; but we know, and the Board knows, and every qualified chemist knows, that it is completely out of date for the production of nitrogen from the atmosphere.

However, if we had a war tomorrow we should probably utilize it the next day, because the expense of recommissioning the plant would be only a small item.

The Senator from Vermont kicks because plant no. 2 is not put in at $71,181,526.57 in order to have a base upon which to figure rates on electricity. It seems to me it is perfectly foolish, it is perfectly silly, to say that. However, that is a Power Trust argument, and it fits in with the Senator's arguments during 6 years of service here any time any measure has come up providing for regulating a public utility.

The total cost of those two plants was $84,939,334.15. No one who wants to be fair would provide that the users of electricity from any dams constructed by the T. V. A. should be required to pay any interest and any income on that nitrate-plant property. The same thing is true of the other property referred to by the Senator from Vermont. He says on this point:

Oh, but this is just the beginning—"only the beginning." I proceed:

Warrior Dam, power plant and equipment, not including the locks, $46,971,955 and some cents.

That is what it cost. The Senator wants the Board to put that in at cost and to make the electric-light users pay an income on it. Everyone knew that it was never worth what it cost. Constructed in war times at peak of prices no one supposed it was worth what we paid for it, because at that time we had to pay fabulous war prices for everything. Again, I am not criticizing the men who did that. They did the best they could. We knew we were paying too much for the dam, but now to charge us what that dam cost and make us pay interest on it if we take electricity from the T. V. A. would be an economic sin.

The Senator further says:

Warrior-Sheffield transmission line, including Gorgas steam plant, $5,012,643 and some odd cents.

Mr. President, the Warrior steam plant was sold by the Government of the United States before the T. V. A. Act was passed. The T. V. A. Board never had anything to do with it. Is the Senator treating the Senate fairly if he leaves the impression that that was one of the properties which ought to be included in fixing a base for electric-light rates?

Mr. President, the Gorgas steam plant was built during the war. It was practically a duplication of the Alabama steam plant on the Warrior River. The Government of the United States furnished the money with which to build it. They made a contract with the Alabama Power Co. that at the conclusion of the war the Alabama Power Co. should have a right to buy it on a certain basis of valuation. The Government built the plant and built a lot of houses there. I have been there. I have been all over the property. Gorgas is located on a bend of the Warrior River. A small village sprang up there. The Government owned about half the houses. They built a number of houses there. They were all ordinary houses. There would be a Government house and then next to the Government house would be an Alabama Power Co. house, and then another Government house. It was all war-made, all war-built, all hurried.

The Government doubled the capacity of that plant and built houses in which the employees could live. That was done under a contract with the Alabama Power Co. It was done upon land owned by the Alabama Power Co. No one could unscramble that mixture afterward by any manner of means. There were the two plants. It was really all in the same building. They practically duplicated the buildings.

The land on which the houses were built was all owned by the Alabama Power Co., but the Government went in there as a war measure and made a contract with the Alabama Power Co., by which they agreed to spend the money and make this improvement. The T. V. A. had no more to do with it than the flowers that bloom in the springtime. The contract provided that at the close of the war the Alabama Power Co. could buy the Government interest, and they did buy it.

That was done while Mr. Weeks was Secretary of War. I remember he was criticized by some who said he did not get enough money out of it. In my weak way I went to his relief. I said that Weeks was bound to do it under a contract made with the Alabama Power Co. by the Government, and therefore he was right in doing it, and that I thought he had received for the Government a fair price for the property. It was much less than it cost, it is true. But what has that to do with the determination of a basis on which we shall fix rates in the Tennessee Valley? All this was done before the Tennessee Valley Authority was dreamed of. Yet the Senator has it all here in his speech. If Senators were not familiar with the facts they would think the T. V. A. had the Warrior plant down there and that it was turned over to them. I do not know that they ever heard of it or that they know anything about it.

Adding all these costs together, the Senator from Vermont makes a total of $136,000,000, and says that the amount of the balance upon which the basis is figured was reduced to $51,000,000. Let me tell how that came about.

In the first place, the Wilson Dam was not worth what it cost. The nitrate plant was not worth much of anything. In the next place, there is the law which Congress enacted, and I shall read it so Senators may see how the valuations were made. I tell Senators and the law tells Senators, but the Senator from Vermont did not tell Senators how these valuations were made. The T. V. A. is not to blame for it. If anybody is to blame we are, and Senators will see in a moment that there is no blame anywhere. Here is what the law provides, the original Tennessee Valley Act now on the statute books, section 14:

The Board shall make a thorough investigation as to the present value of Dam No. 2 and the steam plants at nitrate plant no. 1 and nitrate plant no. 2, and as to the cost of Cove Creek Dam.

Notice the difference. They shall make an investigation of the present value—not what it cost. Everybody knew it was not worth what it cost. The steam plant, for instance, was several years out-of-date. It had been a fine steam plant and up-to-date when it was built; but we cannot build a steam plant now and expect 10 years from now to get what it cost. Accordingly the law said:

They shall make a thorough investigation as to the present value * * * and as to the cost of Cove Creek Dam.

There the cost was taken into consideration, but the steam plant at nitrate plant no. 2 and the steam plant at nitrate plant no. 1 were taken at their value and Wilson Dam was taken at its present value. The Board has done that. Let us read on:

The Board shall make a thorough investigation as to the present value of Dam No. 2 and the steam plants at nitrate plant no. 1 and nitrate plant no. 2, and as to the cost of Cove Creek Dam—

There is a difference between cost and value—for the purpose of ascertaining how much of the value or the cost of such property shall be allocated and charged up (1) to flood control, (2) to navigation, (3) to fertilizer, (4) to national defense, (5) to development of power.

There they were using them for all those purposes. We directed just how it should be done, and we did right when we did it. We directed them to find out how much should be charged to navigation, how much should be charged to flood control, how much should be charged to power, how much should be charged to fertilizer. That is the reason why we can produce power down there, where it only pays its own legitimate charge, cheaper than any private company anywhere in the South can produce it. That is what they were instructed to do.

The findings thus made by the Board, when approved by the President of the United States, shall be final, and such findings shall thereafter be used in all allocations of value for the purpose of keeping the book value of said property.

That is what they did, and yet the great Senator from Vermont makes a great splurge about their committing a grievous sin, threw out all these values, and did not take the cost, when they ought not to have done it anyway and when the law, which he did not cite, provided that they should do just what they did.

Further on the law says:

In like manner the cost and book value of any dams, steam plants, or other similar improvements hereafter constructed and turned over to said Board for the purpose of control and management shall be ascertained and allocated.

First, the T. V. A. took the cost of all these dams. The properties which were already built were 10 or 15 years old at the time they took them. They took them on the basis of what they were worth. They made the appraisal. With the approval of the President, that became the book value of these properties. So what is the meaning of all this splurge of the Senator from Vermont to try to make us believe that the T. V. A. Board are trying to cut down the rates of electricity there because they are taking away the basis upon which rates should be based, and that they have no right to do so? Under the Senator's figuring, he estimates that instead of that $51,000,000 they ought to have had $132,000,000, I think. I have explained what the T. V. A. Board did, however, and I have read you what the law says; and I submit again that if we should follow the Senator from Vermont we would get an erroneous idea of what was true. We would get an erroneous idea of what was done. We would get an erroneous idea of what ought to have been done.

The Senator says:

It is safe to assume, is it not, that this was a transaction between a willing vendor and a willing purchaser, and that that valuation probably was correct? What did they do, however, in order to carry out the objective of having a yardstick? Of course, they were confronted with the question of whether they could ever make a return on that amount of money invested in their capital structure that would show in the black. So what do they do? They write it down, and they account for it all on their books with a set-up of 38 percent of the cost of the property transferred; that is to say, $51,000,000. Now, they are almost down to the authority granted by the act.

I submit, Senators, that the presentation made by the Senator from Vermont had no fairness in it, no justification in it. It only carries out what I have said before—that since he has been in the United States Senate, on every occasion and every time, he has been found on the side of the interests that used to be his clients, even if they are not now.

The Senator says, at another place:

Third. By allotment to Electric Home and Farm Authority, incorporated under the laws of the State of Delaware, for invested capital, allotment from the N. I. R. A. fund, $1,000,000.

He goes into the subject of the Electric Home and Farm Authority. Let me tell the Senate what the facts were, and what all of us know if we will think about the matter.

It is not enough to give the people of the country cheap electricity. They must also be given cheap appliances. For instance, if $200 is charged for a refrigerator, that ought to be sold for $50, or if $150 is charged for a stove that ought to be sold for $50, the price is so high that the poor man cannot buy these appliances. If he cannot buy them, he cannot use electricity, even if it is given to him. So the officials of the T. V. A. were confronted with the fact that we desired to give the people cheap electricity, and in order to do so it was necessary to enable them to buy appliances that would use the electricity, and buy them at a fair price; but the T. V. A. had no authority under the law to take such action.

The Senator from Vermont charges up to the T. V. A. what he claims to be the evils of this other corporation. The T. V. A. had not a thing in the world to do with it. The T. V. A. did not handle the money of the other corporation.

The T. V. A. did not give them any money. They never got a cent from the T. V. A. The President, as he had a right to do under the authority given him by law, allocated some of the special funds which had been appropriated to him, and he organized a corporation with a capital stock of a million dollars, and he put in as the officers of the corporation the members of the T. V. A. Board.

That was done as a matter of economy. These men never got any salaries as such officers. They never got any pay from the President. They drew only their original salaries.

This corporation was organized in the way I have stated. Mr. Lilienthal went to see the electrical-appliance manufacturers all over the United States, and he said to them:

You have always been against the people. You have always stood with the power companies. They charge a high price for electricity. You charge a high price for the means by which electricity can be used. It is to your interest to make something that is cheaper, that the poor people can buy. They are going to have cheap electricity down in the Tennessee Valley. There will be a great demand for refrigerators, for stoves, for water-heating arrangements, for fans, for ironing machines, for washing machines. You wish to get some of that business, and it is to your interest to make these things cheaper.

So Mr. Lilienthal made arrangements with the manufacturing concerns to manufacture a lot of those appliances cheaper, and make them just as good as the standard ones, but not quite so beautiful to look at, perhaps; and this new corporation sold them to the people. When the people bought the appliances they became consumers of electricity, getting their appliances at practically half what they used to cost, and getting their electricity at one-third of what it used to cost. That is not very agreeable to the holding companies; that is not very agreeable to the Power Trust, and they find fault with it.

However, that has not anything to do with this bill. This bill does not enlarge the power of the Electric Home and Farm Authority. It does not take anything away from its power. It has not a thing on earth to do with it. Let us see, though. While I am not going to discuss it in detail, I think this corporation, the Electric Home and Farm Authority, has done a wonderful thing.

I have in my hand a report from the Banking and Currency Committee of the House of Representatives, and I desire to quote from that report. It was made in reporting a certain bill to the House of Representatives. The committee says:

It is felt that an unusual benefit should result from each dollar spent toward aiding in financing the sale of electrical, plumbing, and air-conditioning appliances and equipment. The Electric Home and Farm Authority, an agency of the Tennessee Valley Authority, to which the Reconstruction Finance Corporation agreed to make available the sum of $10,000,000 to aid in financing the sale of electrical appliances and equipment in the immediate Tennessee Valley States, has proved eminently successful in reducing both the cost to the consumer of his electrical appliances and equipment and the rates he has to pay for electricity. Before the advent of the Electric Home and Farm Authority a vicious circle existed in the Tennessee Valley region, i. e., power rates were high because of the scarcity of consumers and the low consumption, and users were few and consumption low because of the high rates. The Electric Home and Farm Authority provided the lever by which this circle was completely broken.

It is not part of my province to go into a defense of this corporation. They need no defense; but it seemed to me that in passing I ought to read something of that kind. That is a report from a standing committee of the House of Representatives.

Much of the objection which is made has been because the corporation has done this and that. It has been the means—outside of the Tennessee Valley Authority, the greatest one of all—that has enabled the people of the Tennessee Valley to get cheap appliances and low rates.

Mr. President, I desire now to refer to another deception which I think was practiced on the Senate. Let us see just what it was. I read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD what the Senator said in his speech yesterday:

Thus we find donations appropriated by it to various activities like the C. W. A. I find a record of a donation of $58,338.91 made by this corporation, which now comes in and asks us to proceed to the consideration of a bill to permit it to borrow $100,000,000, to be payable by the people of the United States if this corporation fails to earn money enough to pay the debt.

That is a statement one cannot have any difficulty in construing. It says, in effect, that the T. V. A. made donations amounting to over $58,000 to the C. W. A. The Senator had said before that:

Although we were led to believe, when we enacted the T. V. A. Act, that the corporation would have definite and specific powers and limited purposes, curiously enough the corporation has become an eleemosynary corporation, a social organization, and it has entered upon all kinds of activities outside those named in its authority.

Then follows what I read, and I repeat it:

Thus we find donations appropriated by it to various activities like the C. W. A. I find a record of a donation of $58,338.91 made by this corporation, which now comes in and asks us to proceed to the consideration of a bill to permit it to borrow $100,000,000.

Senators, you have heard me read twice the language which the Senator used yesterday, and I call attention to the fact that there is not a word of truth in what he said on that subject—not a word. The T. V. A. never made a donation to the C. W. A. or to anybody else of that amount. There is no foundation of fact for that. What impression did you get yesterday when that assertion was made? That is just one of the many illusionary things he proclaimed, and by which he led every honest Senator who was following him into error.

He said in another place:

Apparently those in charge believe that because the original act did not enable them to engage in the business of selling refrigerators, curling machines, household aids of various kinds operated by electrical energy, nevertheless they had the power to go up into Delaware and form another corporation which would have that authority. So we find them spreading out, the shadow of their great hand falling over a large part of the United States of America, with a threat that they not only intend to have this a yardstick but a model and a form for all communities in this great land of ours.

Leaving the impression that the T. V. A. was selling refrigerators, when the T. V. A. never bought a refrigerator and never sold one. I do not mean to criticize the corporation which did. I think it has done a wonderful work, as the House committee report says.

Here is another reference to the section providing for bonds, which I have shown is a limitation, and under which the bonds can be issued for only one purpose. He did not tell the Senate anything of that kind. Here is another reference he makes to it:

One of the amendments proposes to double the amount of money and to broaden out the time and the power so that this may be an open-end mortgage, and there can be in existence at any time from now ad infinitum $100,000,000 of those bonds.

Which you know is not true; which he had no right to say to the Senate.

He cannot plead ignorance, of course. He conveyed to the Senate the idea that they would run through all time, when a reading of it shows that it provides nothing of the kind. That is the kind of argument that is made by a Senator who now says that he does not represent the Power Trust, but the evidence shows he did before he was elected, and, if his action in the Senate can be taken as any criterion, at least so far as the Senate is concerned, he has represented them ever since he has been here.

He said:

Of course, this would be regarded as a very small corporation, having a capital of only $300,000, and I have already shown that it obtained that capital from F. E. R. A. funds.

That is as far as we ought to go. They get their capital from some other corporation. It is not right to charge that up, even if it is wrong. But this official report of the committee shows that it has been very satisfactory. It has not lost a dollar, not a cent. It has reduced prices to the poor who have to buy electrical appliances by practically 50 percent.

He makes fun of this corporation, which was organized with $20,000 capital. Perhaps that may be wrong. I do not think so. But suppose it is wrong; what has that to do with this bill? Not a thing on earth. They will do it again if the bill is passed, they will do it again if the bill is not passed, unless some law on the subject is passed by Congress.

He said:

Proceeding with the varied and colorful businesses engaged in by the United States through the Tennessee Valley Authority, we come to Haywood County Cannery Association, $7,500; next, Farmers' Confederated Cannery, Hendersonville, $6,000; Norris Town Stores Consumers' Corporation, $10,000; Shady Grove Cannery, $2,500. Thus we have all of these diverse activities summed up at a cost in money of the taxpayers of $94,500.

Again, all misleading.

Since this refers to the town of Norris, what was done there that is criticized by the Senator? It is the finest exhibition in the world of the development of hydroelectric power without any injury to labor, without any injury to anyone on earth, with perfect satisfaction to everyone engaged in it.

What do we find to be the facts? The Norris Dam is away ahead of schedule—the schedule fixed by the Army engineers of the great military authority which the Senator wishes to have consider this bill. It is away below the estimated cost; yet it has paid better wages and worked men fewer hours than any development of a hydroelectric concern by a private corporation ever performed in the history of the United States.

The laborers there are better housed, they have more modern homes, they work fewer hours, they are better satisfied than the laborers on any privately constructed operation of a similar nature in the United States. Between 10,000 and 12,000 persons are now employed there. Senators have not heard of any labor trouble there. Senators have not heard of any trouble with politicians there. Senators have not heard of any misuse of funds. No; it has all been on the square.

That project is the shining light in the United States today, and everyone admits it except the holding companies, the Power Trust. It has given more employment with less difficulty than the operation of any other governmental function in the United States during this depression, and I say that with measured words; and yet the men who are executing the project are condemned in the severest of terms. The dam is going to cost less than the Army engineers estimated it could be built for. The same thing is true of the Wheeler Dam. It is ahead of the estimates in time and below the estimates in cost. Is not that a pretty good record?

A great many things with which fault has been found by the Comptroller General have been called to our attention by the Senator from Vermont, and yet in no place that I know is there an insinuation or a charge that one penny was stolen or misappropriated. In one case I happen to know what the dispute was. The Comptroller General has been very strict, and I do not blame him for it. An auditing officer cannot be too strict with this corporation, or any other governmental function to suit me. When they do anything wrong, I want them to be corrected; and if the Comptroller General finds anything wrong in their method of bookkeeping I want it rectified, just as any other citizen does.

I happen to know about the request for bids for a certain improved method that was to be utilized in carrying dirt, and perhaps cement as well, on a certain kind of carrier. It was expensive. Bids were had. The bids were opened. The man who put in the lowest bid—referred to by the Senator today and on yesterday—had a certain kind of contrivance. When Dr. Morgan took up the matter and called in the engineers, and they examined the contrivance, they believed it would not do. Dr. Morgan himself told me that the chief engineer said:

If you accept that bid I shall wash my hands of the whole thing. We shall be called upon to pay for dead men who will be killed by the machine. It will not work long enough to build this dam, and you will have to buy another one.

The upshot was that the Board took the next bid and got a better machine, as they thought, and I think it is true. That machine is operating today. No one has been killed by it. There has not been any injury from it; and the machine is going to wear long enough, I understand, to complete the dam. The Board saved a considerable amount of money by what they did, but technically, probably they did not obey the commands of the Comptroller General, and they got into trouble with him.

Dr. Morgan is not a politician. Dr. Morgan, as all Senators know, is a professional engineer and an instructor of great ability. He is an educator. He knows nothing about politics, but he is an expert in his line. It probably grated on him somewhat, when he knew he could save a thousand dollars or $5,000 by taking the bid which was not the lowest, to be compelled to take the lowest bid. If, however, the Comptroller General finds that to be required by the law Dr. Morgan must follow it, even if it results in greater cost to the Government.

I do not know anything about all these things which have been put into the RECORD, but I have no doubt on earth that if the cases cited were run down it would be found that there was not the misappropriation of a cent. A great many times it would be found that the Comptroller General would say, "What does this mean? What does that mean? I reject this or that."

I know one case in point. A member of the T. V. A. Board came from Chicago with his wife. He was engaged on official business of the Board, but his wife was with him on the trip, and when he sent in his expense account he allocated a certain amount to be charged to himself and a certain amount to be charged to his wife which could not be charged against the T. V. A. When that account went in to the Comptroller General there was something lacking about it, I understand. The Comptroller said it did not appear why one allocation was made, or why the other was not made. That is probably one of the cases which has been read to intimate that there was something wrong; but there was nothing wrong in that case.

Of course, the man did not expect his wife's expenses to be charged up to the Government. I will guarantee, however, that if the president of the great New England Power Co. went across the country and took his wife with him the books would not show that he had privately paid his wife's expenses. No private company would do it. We are doing something better than private companies do. We ought to do it better. I want it done better.

I understand there is another dispute. When the T. V. A. Act was passed, the first Dr. Morgan, of Ohio, was appointed a member of the Board. He was confirmed by the Senate before the other two appointments were made. After he was confirmed by the Senate, the President asked him to help him select the other two men. The President sent Dr. Morgan to the State of Washington, he sent him to Oregon, he sent him to California, he sent him to Wisconsin, he sent him to New York, and then, I think, he sent him into New England. I am not sure about the latter statement. He also sent Dr. Morgan all over the South, and in all these places Dr. Morgan looked up men whose applications the Board had, whose recommendations they had, in order to determine who was the best one of all and, if possible, to get him. That trip cost Dr. Morgan some money. I understand that expense money is in dispute at the present time. I have not received my information from anyone connected with the Authority, but I have been told that the Comptroller General holds that Dr. Morgan has no right to charge that traveling expense up to the T. V. A., and I am not sure but that the Comptroller General is right about it. Whatever he holds must be followed. I am in favor of abiding by his decision, even though I do not believe it is right. Like a Supreme Court decision, we must have things decided, even if they are decided wrong.

Now let me tell the Senate of another case which the Senator from Vermont put into the RECORD yesterday. An overpayment, he said, appears there, or something of that kind, something over $1,100 for each one of the members of the Board. How did that come about?

We passed the Economy Act making a reduction in salaries. It never occurred to the members of the Board, being members of the corporation, that it applied to them. They did not think it did. The question was not even raised. They paid their salaries, but when the matter came to Mr. McCarl, the Comptroller General, he said: "It applies to you. You cannot have your full salary. You are subject to the Economy Act." It appeared on the books and appeared here that they had overdrawn their salaries. The Government did not lose a cent. It was all an honest mistake. There is not going to be any loss anywhere. It is just what might happen in the dealings of any great corporation.

I have here a list of their employees. They employ between 10,000 and 12,000 people. They have a large number of executives, some of the finest electrical engineers in the United States. They pay out in salaries about $1,000,000 every month. They have been one of the greatest instrumentalities in the United States to relieve unemployment. There has never been a cry of anything wrong in it all. There is no doubt that now and then, here and there, quite often the Comptroller General might perhaps say, "This is not right; you cannot do this." What would be wrong if he did? If Mr. Morgan cannot be paid his expenses from the T. V. A. while he was helping the President, then he cannot be paid from the T. V. A. and must be paid from some other fund. No one would want him to bear that expense.

Here is another item mentioned by the Senator from Vermont of $36 for photographs.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to know if a claim has ever been made, in order that the books might be straightened out?

Mr. NORRIS. I do not know.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have no doubt Congress would allow the item.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not know. No one would dispute that it ought to be allowed, but if the Comptroller General will not allow it they must pay for their photographs out of their own pockets, and then probably they would not have any more taken.

How did it come about? There were thousands and thousands of letters almost every day, and thousands and thousands of visitors coming to the dam to see it. Would they treat those people with contempt? Would those people want a photograph of the buildings? Would they want a photograph of Dr. Morgan? If they asked for it and he had it, would he not give it to them? Suppose they all went away without a picture of a house, without a picture of the dam, does anyone think the Government ought to be so stingy that it would not pay and do what an ordinary private person always pays and always does, and which is perfectly legitimate and perfectly honest? I think there is nothing criminal in that. If these men had to bear all the expense of furnishing these things, they would have an expense account twice as large as their salaries. I think it is perfectly foolish to make such objections.

Then it is alleged that they paid for somebody else, and that was the basis for another objection. Suppose the Senator from Idaho [Mr. POPE], now listening to me, went down there; how would they feel if they had to tell the Senator, "We have nobody to act as your guide. Congress will not allow us to pay the salary of such a man. You will just have to go around by yourself." Does anyone suppose they would act that way?

Would not any Senator expect, if he went there, or if anybody went there and respectfully asked to see the property, that he would be treated with courtesy and shown what he came there to see? Of course, it would cost something to do it. In the aggregate it would cost a great deal. Do we want to stop that sort of thing? Are we so stingy that we are going to complain about that kind of thing?

The Senator from Vermont in all his great practice for public utilities, running back over the years, has never seen a time yet when the private utilities were so careful that they would refuse to show a visitor about their property. I do not think there is anything in these objections. They seem to me to be silly—to be foolish. They originate in minds which have nothing in view but to find fault and to see how many monkey wrenches can be thrown into the machinery.

Mr. President, I have on my desk a copy of the New Republic for May 1, 1935, in which I find an article by Morris L. Cooke. Most Senators know him. He is probably as high-class a man as lives, whose record for ability, honesty, and efficiency is second to none. He wrote an article on What Electricity Should Cost. He has some references in the article to some of the things we have been discussing. I want to read just a little of his introduction:

We have now 20,000,000 domestic consumers. There are around 12,000 different kinds of monthly bills, a majority of which are not only unintelligible, but fluctuate violently in price for the same amount of current served under like conditions. These facts are rapidly becoming known and are almost as irritating to the public as the high cost of current itself. The legitimate costs of generating, transmitting, and distributing electricity are now known. It is not only practicable, but financially feasible for the industry as a whole to put in force this year a domestic rate schedule of the following order which would combine the three essential elements of reduction, uniformity, and simplicity.

Then he gives the rates and goes on to say:

To take a late example from a region much in the news. As a direct result of the low rate schedules set up by the T. V. A. for Muscle Shoals current, the Commonwealth & Southern Corporation and its subsidiaries in Alabama, Georgia, and Tennessee cut their rates on September 1, 1934, and made them uniform over these States, which include over 1,300 communities. The companies announced an estimated "loss" of $1,500,000 in domestic revenue—

That is what they always say, "Cut down our rates and we are ruined." The day this writer is speaking of was, as I remember, the day when the T. V. A. took over the properties—Dam No. 2, and so forth—belonging to the United States. That day the Alabama Power Co., the Tennessee Power Co., and the Georgia Power Co., covering those three States and parts of others, voluntarily reduced their rates to the amount of $1,500,000 per annum. Just the threat of this corporation's coming into existence brought about that kind of a reduction.

The companies said that was a loss—a donation to the public. It turned out to be a benefit, as this article shows, and as I shall now read:

The companies announced an estimated "loss" of $1,500,000 in domestic revenue, but instead of a loss, September 1934—showed an increase of 0.3 percent as against the same month in 1933, and the third month, November, yielded an increase of 2.8 percent as against the same month of the previous year.

That is just 1 month afterward—

The companies were making money by their reduction. They could not see that that would be the case before they did it. They cannot see in front of their faces farther than their noses anyway; but those who do see and do study realize that in the case of electric rates it is possible to put the rates so high that the company cannot make anything.

That was the third month. Now, let us go on.

In September—

That was a year afterward. Let us see what they did.

In September there was a 32-percent increase in the number of kilowatt-hours used and a 10-percent increase in the number of customers.

The writer of the article says farther on:

The immediate increase of company revenues shown again demonstrates the axiom that usage increases as rates are reduced. This is still more strikingly proven by results achieved under the still lower standard T. V. A. rates. They were first put into effect in Tupelo, Miss., in March 1934 with the following domestic schedule:

First 50 kilowatt-hours per month at 3 cents per kilowatt-hour.
Next 150 kilowatt-hours per month at 2 cents per kilowatt-hour.
Next 200 kilowatt-hours per month at 1 cent per kilowatt-hour.
Excess over 400 kilowatt-hours at 0.4 cent per kilowatt-hour.

This represented an average drop of about 55 percent as against the preceding rates charged by the city, the profits then being turned into the town treasury. From an average residence consumption of only 42 kilowatt-hours per month, usage jumped to 61 in June and to 98 in November.

In other words, the consumption jumped from 42 to 98 kilowatt-hours in just a few months.

The average national consumption is about 53 kilowatt-hours per month.

That is, in the whole United States. There it is 98 kilowatt-hours per month.

T. V. A. service to Corinth, Miss., and Athens, Ga., shows the same trend. The above experiences confirm the soundness of low rates from every point of view. Customers benefit from cheap, abundant use; manufacturers of electrical equipment are doing a profitable business. In these communities gross revenues are adequate to cover operating and fixed costs, provide for new construction, and retire bonds.

Observation of a multitude of such facts as are here presented, plus intensive engineering and cost-accounting studies by impartial official agencies, have swept aside the mysteries surrounding the electrical industry and justify the contentions here made. The New York State Power Authority's recent report reached this significant conclusion, among others.

I ask unanimous consent to have that conclusion printed at this point in my remarks without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McGUIRE in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Variation in the cost of distributing electricity to any class of customer, as between the various municipalities, proves to be much less than commonly understood. * * * An intensive study of conditions over a wide area in the United States shows that the savings in retail electric rates justified by this survey would not mean a corresponding decrease in the revenues derived from the supplying of electric service, because a truly promotional rate would result in a rapid increase in average use per customer. Private companies * * * have improved both their gross and net income by reducing rates to the levels suggested. * * * We are confident that a single residential rate schedule for the entire State, including farm service, will eventually be found economically practicable.

Mr. NORRIS. The article continues:

It is a well-known and useful truth of utility history that the more pronounced reductions in private company rates, the results of which have been so instructive, have been forced by the fact or threat of competition with publicly owned plants. President Roosevelt, in the case of Muscle Shoals and other projects, including his earlier advocacy of the St. Lawrence development, made a wider application of a well-tried, sound method of regulation.

In 10 States adjacent to Muscle Shoals savings of over $10,000,000 through rate reductions are reported to have been effected.

That is something for which we ought to give the T. V. A. credit—a reduction of $10,000,000.

Influenced by developments in the T. V. A. territory, the city of Cincinnati and the Union Gas & Electric Co. in July 1934, reached a rate agreement that will benefit over 400,000 people. It provided progressive reductions from 1934 to 1937.

Then the writer of this article speaks of Chattanooga:

Chattanooga recently voted, 2 to 1, to join the T. V. A. The belief that the public plant is the only method by which low rates and abundant use can be achieved is rapidly spreading. All that is now needed to turn this impression into a passionate mass conviction is a continuance of the old methods of propaganda, lawsuits, lobbyists, and interference in politics.

I desire to say at this point, Mr. President, that the Senate has adopted a resolution instructing the Power Commission to investigate the injunctions and restraining orders which have been issued all over the United States against the installation of municipal plants, including the injunctions issued against the T. V. A. When that report comes in it will startle Senators. It will show them that we are now in danger of being governed by injunction rather than by law. We are in danger of having our laws made by a judge, one-man-made laws, where there will be no legislation and no statute, and the jail will open for the person who happens to violate the law made by one man in injunction proceedings.

It will be idle for the industry to plead taxes and losses due to the depression as an excuse. Every soundly financed electric operating company has pulled through this depression successfully. It is time we heard more of these successes and the stellar part the domestic consumer has played in keeping these companies out of the red by actually increasing his use at a time when revenue from the industrial consumer fell off disastrously.

It is unwise for the industry to attempt to force domestic consumers to furnish a disproportionate share of its profits. Hence the next great problem facing the industry is whether it will reward these consumers by the general introduction of uniform rates at fair levels.

If the leaders who control these electrical properties—

And I submit that argument to those who are filibustering against this bill—

If the leaders who control these electrical properties—in contradistinction to the investors who own them—prove themselves incapable of gaging the peril of the situation in its threat to bona fide investments, and act accordingly, then we can look forward to a rapid transition to public ownership.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. Not just now.

The people will not continue to pay through the nose to insure dividends on inflated values. They now know what rates should be and the part that plentiful, cheap, and widely distributed power can play in the social economy now in the making. They will overthrow the present system of private-utility ownership rather than be thwarted by it. The people now know how to bypass ineffective regulation.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. HARRISON, from the Committee on Finance, reported favorably the nominations of Drs. John W. Knutson and George R. Jones to be assistant dental surgeons in the United States Public Health Service, to take effect from date of oath.

Mr. BYRD, from the Committee on Finance, reported favorably the nomination of Thomas W. Page, of Virginia, to be a member of the United States Tariff Commission for the term expiring June 16, 1941 (reappointment).

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of sundry postmasters.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McGILL in the chair). The reports will be placed on the Executive Calendar.

If there be no further reports of committees, the calendar is in order.

GEORGE W. CARRIER

The legislative clerk read the nomination of George W. Carrier to be postmaster at Newcastle, Ind., which had been reported adversely from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the Senate advise and consent to the nomination of George W. Carrier to be postmaster at Newcastle, Ind.?

The nomination was rejected.

DIPLOMATIC AND FOREIGN SERVICE

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Alvin Mansfield Owsley, of Texas, to be Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to the Irish Free State.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Leland Harrison of Illinois, to be Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to Rumania.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of John R. Putnam, of Oregon, to be consul general.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask that the nominations of postmasters be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations of postmasters are confirmed en bloc.

IN THE MARINE CORPS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations for promotion in the Marine Corps.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask that the nominations in the Marine Corps be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations in the Marine Corps are confirmed en bloc.

IN THE NAVY

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations for promotions in the Navy.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask that the nominations in the Navy be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations in the Navy are confirmed en bloc.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate adjourn until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until tomorrow, Friday, May 10, 1935, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CONFIRMATIONS

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate May 9 (legislative day of May 7), 1935

ENVOYS EXTRAORDINARY AND MINISTERS PLENIPOTENTIARY

Alvin Mansfield Owsley to be Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to the Irish Free State.

Leland Harrison to be Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to Rumania.

CONSUL GENERAL

John R. Putnam to be consul general.

REJECTION

Executive nomination rejected by the Senate May 9 (legislative day of May 7), 1935

POSTMASTER

INDIANA

George W. Carrier to be postmaster at Newcastle.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, MAY 9, 1935

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Infinite God, we rejoice that in the midst of selfishness and the disordered condition of this life the fountain of Thy mercy is accessible and open to all. They that put their trust in the Lord shall be as Mount Zion that cannot be removed. Though our infirmities be as the sands of the sea-shore, Thou art our bountiful Father. We pray that we may have an initial leaning toward goodness, virtue, and truth. When different avenues of duty are before us, do Thou help us to accept the worthiest and the most excellent. We ask Thee to give us the right angle of vision of the needs of our country, and may we make our survey in the light of the teaching of the Man of Galilee. Holy Spirit, purify our dispositions and give enrichment to our personal pleasures. As we view the field of purpose and duty, of life and destiny, we beseech Thee to appoint us to a place in the vast design. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed without amendment to a concurrent resolution of the House of the following title:

H. Con. Res. 20. Concurrent resolution authorizing the Committee on Banking and Currency of the House of Representatives to have printed for its use additional copies of the hearings on the Banking Act of 1935.

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the amendments of the House to bills and joint resolution of the Senate of the following titles:

S. 282. An act for the relief of William Kemper;

S. 563. An act for the relief of the Jay Street Terminal, New York;

S. 1616. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory and supplementary thereto; and

S. J. Res. 43. Joint resolution for the establishment of a commission for the construction of a Washington-Lincoln Memorial Gettysburg Boulevard connecting the present Lincoln Memorial in the city of Washington with the battlefield of Gettysburg in the State of Pennsylvania.

The message also announced that the Vice President had appointed Mr. GLASS, Mr. PITTMAN, Mr. WALSH, Mr. HALE, and Mr. METCALF members of the joint committee on the part of the Senate to greet Rear Admiral Byrd upon his arrival at the navy yard on May 10, as provided for in House Joint Resolution 274.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 672. An act for the relief of the city of Baltimore.

PUBLIC GRAZING LANDS

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado, from the Committee on Rules, reported the following privileged resolution for printing in the RECORD:

House Resolution 215

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for consideration of H. R. 3019, "A bill to amend sections 1, 3, and 15 of 'An act to stop injury to the public grazing lands by preventing overgrazing and soil deterioration, etc.', approved June 28, 1934." That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 1 hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Public Lands, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit, with or without instructions.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

Mr. CARY. Mr. Speaker, I rise to announce that my colleague the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARDEN] has been seriously ill for about 10 days and has been necessarily absent from the House. I therefore request an indefinite leave of absence for the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 20 minutes on the processing tax.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I am going to object to any speeches after 12:30 o'clock today.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I intended to ask unanimous consent to address the House following the gentleman.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I modify my request and ask unanimous consent to address the House for 15 minutes. This will leave 9 minutes for the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I only desire about 7 minutes, and it is not on anything that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON] wants to talk about.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, what is there special about 12:30?

Mr. O'CONNOR. That is the morning half hour.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I think some of the rest of us are going to have something to say about this matter if we cannot have time to speak after 12:30.

The SPEAKER. That is a question for the House itself to determine.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, the Chairman of the Rules Committee would prevent all talk, particularly on bills on the Private Calendar. He made an arbitrary ruling the other day that no Member would be recognized for the purpose of speaking on private bills.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the time of the House is in the control of the House. The House itself controls its own time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct. Undoubtedly any Member has a right to object to any unanimous-consent request that is submitted.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I renew my request that I may be permitted to speak for 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 7 minutes at the conclusion of the speech by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, would the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN] mind telling us on what subject he is going to speak?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. It is purely on a district matter. I am not entering into any controversial question at all. My subject deals with how the silver question affects the silver industry in my district, hoping that we may reach a solution of the problem.

Mr. SNELL. Is the gentleman going to object to bringing in controversial matters?

Mr. WOODRUM. The gentleman has the floor.

Mr. SNELL. I am asking the gentleman from Virginia.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN] is a distinguished Member of this House. I shall certainly not object to his speaking at this time. The gentleman would not permit me to have a little time the other day, but I am glad to have the gentleman address the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN]?

There was no objection.

THE PROCESSING TAX

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, we have listened at length during the past few weeks to a discussion of the processing tax, some urging its repeal with much fervor. We have seen the clamor rise to a height that no doubt some people, not familiar with the situation, were fully convinced that the 4.2 cents a pound levy on cotton was responsible for the major portion of the ills of the very sick textile industry.

Nor was this campaign confined to Congress. Delegations come to Washington, marching to a tune which was a curious mixture of threat and supplication, and casual readers of newspapers must have wondered why Congress would allow a levy so generally hated and reviled to remain in effect.

During those days I felt sorry for some of those who advocated a repeal for they knew that the textile industry has been one of our most persistent industrial invalids for years.

It is rather significant to note at this point that while the United States produces approximately one-half of the world's cotton less than 20 percent of the cotton spindles of the world are in the United States. In 1934 there were 156,000,000 cotton spindles in the world and of this number some 30,000,000 were in the United States.

I am glad to say, however, that during the past few days I have noticed, or seemed to have noticed, at any rate, some of the hysteria abate, because I know a reasonable attitude and a calm discussion are a prerequisite for an understanding and a solution of the textile troubles.

The textile industry has too many real problems; problems that will demand patient cooperation to solve, to be beclouding and befuddling the issue with processing-tax harangues. The processing tax could be removed tomorrow and, in my judgment, it would be only a matter of time, and a short time at that, before the wails and cries would go up again from the textile industries.

The processing tax has been coupled with increasing Japanese imports, although there is not the slightest relation between the two. The levy in no way changes the competitive situation so far as domestic and foreign textiles are concerned.

A compensatory import tax, equal to the full amount of the domestic cotton-processing tax, must be paid in addition to the tariff duties when manufactured textiles are imported into this country. Conversely, the amount of the processing tax is refunded when manufactured articles are exported from the United States. So that the domestic processing tax does not put our mills at a disadvantage in selling their products in foreign markets.

But it is not my purpose at this time to endeavor to prescribe for the textile operators. I sympathize with them, and so does the administration. They are entitled to the consideration given other groups of citizens, the farmers among them, but no more, may I emphasize, than that given other groups. And all that the farmer desires is equality of treatment.

A Cabinet committee is making a textile ailment diagnosis. I hope that it finds a remedy, an efficacious one, but I will venture a prediction that it will not find that abolition of the processing tax would do a real service to the textile industry. I know that some have declared that the committee has prepared its case beforehand. But let me prophesy that any impartial group which studies the question in the future will come to the conclusion that little is to be gained for the textile industry, but much is to be lost for the farmer by removal of the processing tax.

The processing tax is the farmer's tariff, the first such levy he has had during all the years that the mills which spun his staple had their output protected from foreign competition.

It is rumored that some textile interests are seeking a higher tariff for themselves, and at the same time they are working day and night for removal of the meager bit of protection for the farmer.

It has become generally recognized, I think, that one of the prime causes of the farmers' difficulties, many difficulties they are, is the one-sided tariff policy this country has pursued for years.

The factory owners talk about cheap labor and the need for protecting the American workman from it. I do not intend to enter into a tariff argument. I favor an adequate tariff, but let me point out that the American farmer has raised and sold his product in competition with some of the cheapest labor in the world. The price of American cotton has set the world price, but the cotton grower has bought his goods in a tariff-protected market. He sold low and bought high, and that is burning the economic candle at both ends. You know the result. The depression started on the farm and spread like a drought; over country towns; the smaller cities; and on toward the giant centers of commerce.

Just a few days ago my good friend from Kansas [Mr. Hope], the ranking Republican member of the House Agricultural Committee, summed up the processing-tax situation in clear and vigorous fashion. To the surprise and dismay of some of the Republicans, he said that if the processing tax was removed that the entire tariff structure should—and would—be torn down. Mr. Hope said he was not voicing a threat, but that the farmer could not exist under an economic system which forced him to sell in competition with the world and buy in a closed market.

I have said—and let me repeat—that I am a friend of the textile interests. I have some of the largest mills in the South in my district. I think I am considerably more of a friend than some of those who are shouting for the repeal of the processing tax so vociferously.

A man suffering from an organic malady is not benefiting himself by taking patent medicines designed to "tone up the system." The textile industry should, in cooperation with the Government, study its problems carefully; and then whatever aid Federal authorities can give should be willingly extended. I do not think, however, that assistance should come at the expense of the cotton farmer. I do not believe the fair-minded leaders of the mill operators seek advantage at the expense of others.

Just how, may I ask, has the processing tax operated to the detriment of the textile operators? I have not seen one bill of particulars on that. I have heard a lot of charges, but no figures to back them up. I am convinced that they cannot supply the proof. On the other hand, I feel certain that it is fairly easy to show that the textile industry would be one of the most prosperous in all the world if the cotton tax were its only problem.

The most common assertion is that the processing tax on cotton has raised the price of textiles to the point that people are buying more wool, more rayon, and the like.

In 1932, with cotton prices near the record low point, the total consumption of cotton was 2,457,600,000 pounds, or 84.1 percent of total fiber consumption. Wool consumption was 240,900,000, or 8.2 percent; silk 73,700,000, or 2.5 percent; and rayon 152,200,000, or 5.2 percent. Much the same picture is presented for 1931, another year of low cotton prices. Cotton consumption was 2,656,000,000, or 82.7 percent; wool was 320,900,000, or 10 percent; silk 79,100,000, or 2.4 percent; and rayon 157,300,000, or 5.2 percent.

The cotton-processing tax went into effect in August 1933 and the consumption of cotton, instead of declining in 1933, rose sharply to 3,052,500,000 pounds, although the percentage declined slightly to 83.7 percent. The comparative figures for competing fibers are wool, 324,300,000, 8.9 percent; silk, 62,400,000 pounds, 1.7 percent; and rayon, 207,400,000, 5.7 percent.

Even more revealing are figures for 1934 when the cotton-processing tax was in effect during the entire year. The consumption of cotton declined slightly as compared to 1933, due largely to the textile strike in the fall of 1934, the figure for 1934 being 2,662,900,000 pounds; but the percentage of cotton to total consumption increased to 84.2 percent.

Instead of being displaced by competing fibers, the percentage of cotton consumed increased over both 1931 and 1932, years in which there was no processing tax and in which the price of the staple was very low.

The comparative figures for competing fibers last year are: Wool, 240,200,000, 7.6 percent; silk, 61,400,000, 1.9 percent; and rayon, 3,164,000, 6.3 percent.

The consumption of rayon increased in percentage during 1933 and 1934, years of the processing tax; but that increase was apparently at the expense of fibers such as silk, which compete with cotton and which had no processing tax to carry.

It seems to me that these figures offer convincing proof in refutation of the statement that the processing tax is causing buyers to purchase competing materials.

However, if the processing tax on cotton is causing a shift from cotton to competing materials, the law provides for compensating taxes on competing fibers. To get the compensating taxes levied it is only necessary for cotton mills to show that such shifts are taking place and are due to the processing tax.

Just how much does the processing tax increase the cost of cotton goods to the consumer? That question can be answered, and that answer, I believe, will show better than thousands of words of argument that the tax has not really injured the textile industry.

Official estimates are that the added cost of the processing tax for a pair of overalls selling at $1.30 is 8 cents—8 cents only, mind you. The figures which show what that same pair of overalls would cost if they were imported are interesting. The tariff—the tariff which has protected the textile industry for years—would be 48¾ cents, six times that of the processing levy.

An imported work shirt which cost 70 cents would pay a processing tax of 3 cents and a tariff of 31½ cents; a house dress which cost 80 cents would pay a processing tax of 3 cents and a tariff of 30 cents.

However, the processing tax, like the tariff, is not paid by the manufacturer, but is passed on to, and is paid by, the consumer.

I have heard the assertion that the cotton tax is pyramided and I have heard also that the operator must absorb the levy due to intensive competition in the business. Both claims cannot be true, and all available data indicates that the cotton spinner is simply the collecting agency through which the Government collects the levy. The Bureau of Internal Revenue has been liberal in its regulations, and in some instances it has allowed the mills 6 months to pay the tax; that is, 6 months from the time the cotton is purchased. The mills thus are oftentimes permitted to actually sell the goods before the tax is paid.

There is not as much opportunity to pyramid the processing tax as there is to pyramid an equal increase in the price of cotton. Cotton passes through several hands between the producer and the mill, and there is therefore more opportunity to pyramid price than there is to pyramid the tax.

In section 9 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act are provisions designed to prevent pyramiding.

Let me define the cotton processing tax and state its purpose briefly. It is a levy of 4.2 cents a lint pound on cotton when it is first processed or prepared for its finished form. It should be borne in mind that the processing tax is not paid by the textile industry nor is it paid by the farmer, but the processing tax is passed on to the consuming public. The amount of the processing tax is not deducted from the value that the cotton producer receives for his cotton. From the tax, about $115,000,000 was raised last year, or approximately 90 cents per capita.

That $115,000,000 went into a fund to pay cotton growers who signed contracts with the Secretary of Agriculture to adjust production. As most of you know, unusually large crops and reduced consumption due to the depression, had resulted in the accumulation of a huge cotton surplus, which will act as a force to depress prices until it is reduced to normal. The sensible way to pare the carry-over, in fact, the only practical way, is to raise less until the surplus has been consumed.

The processing tax is used to pay the cotton growers to reduce their acreage; but do not get the idea that the levy is charity or an outright gift at the expense of the American people.

For years some of our foremost leaders have realized that the farmer's prices were falling further and further below those for the manufactured articles he must buy. Our leaders have realized, too, that there must be steps to remove the disparity, and restore the equality between agriculture and industry. The grower paid more and more for the things he bought and got less and less for the things he sold. You know the result—bankruptcy, poverty, distress, resentment, despair. Eventually the farmer's inability to buy caused thousands upon thousands of city workmen to be "ploughed" out on the street.

The Agricultural Adjustment Act was passed to restore the relationship between farm and industrial products which existed in the 1909-14 period. There have been mistakes, of course, but on the whole it has worked, too well to suit many selfish people. Just compare the price of the major farm products with the price when President Roosevelt took office. There is your answer.

One reason, a primary reason, for effectiveness of the act is that the processing tax raises funds to pay the farmers to cooperate. It would not be fair to ask the growers, the victims of long years of economic injustice, to make still another sacrifice and bear all the cost of getting rid of their surpluses.

I wish to state emphatically also that the only sensible way to handle this farm problem is through controlled production. Some industrialists must believe the man who tills the soil is a gullible creature. The factory owners close their plants without hesitation when they have piled up a surplus which threatens to reduce their profits. They have done it since the industrial system began and have not been criticized for it. The farmer must do the same thing or he is at a hopeless disadvantage.

Heretofore the growers have been unable to cooperate. There was no mechanism to help and direct them. I recall during the various cotton-price crises that southern leaders would meet and confer. This would be proposed and that would be proposed, but there was no means of belling the cat. We got acquainted with some fine people during those conferences, but we went back home and continued to raise too much cotton.

The Adjustment Act, for the first time, gave the growers a way to get together and adopt the methods of big business. It has given the farmers a way to adjust their production to demand. Many persons do not seem to realize it, but the farmer cannot continue indefinitely to grow crops at a loss.

Anyone familiar with the textile industry knows that it has been having a series of ups and downs for years. This is particularly true of New England, where the trend has been steadily downward since 1920.

In 1921 there were 337 textile mills in operation in the New England States. There were only 194 in 1933. Statistics show that during the 12-year period, the period of Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover, that 95,505 workers lost their jobs in the textile mills; lost them permanently. Why not blame the processing tax for that?

If partisanship will insist upon saddling the Roosevelt administration with the troubles of the New England textile industry since March 1933, the Republicans must accept the blame for the loss of 143 mills and 95,505 jobs, representing wages of $110,754,000. The Republicans must accept the blame also for strange silence and complacency during the 12 years when this was taking place. Is it not peculiar that the realization came only after Franklin D. Roosevelt became President?

In the Washington Post of some days ago I read that Gov. Theodore F. Green, of Rhode Island "sprang a surprise on the President's Cabinet committee investigating the cotton-textile situation by suggesting wholesale changes within the industry itself to relieve distress."

The article adds that the Governor devoted scant attention to the "processing tax and the effect of Japanese imports" and that among other things he proposed a Federal commission to bring about reorganization of the industry.

Governor Green apparently realizes fully and knows there is nothing to be gained by an attempt to confuse the issue by talking about the processing tax. He knows that the sooner the questions which must be solved are tackled the sooner will real progress be made. I agree with him, and I am sure that every true friend of both the textile operators and the farmers does too.

The farmers of the cotton-growing sections do not have to be told what the Roosevelt administration and the agricultural programs have done for them. You know that the close of the Hoover administration found the cotton farmers in a condition that they had not approached since the end of the Civil War. We were nearing the end of our endurance; both town and country were prostrate.

We are told now that the forces of natural recovery are responsible for the improvement made thus far. But we are aware that the cotton program is primarily responsible for the rise in cotton prices, and we know, too, that increase in the staple's price is the lever that has had most to do with the lift back toward prosperity.

There are no figures more revealing than those on cotton income in my own great State. The total return from cotton grown in Georgia in 1932 was $34,642,000. That, as you well remember, was a year of despair.

In March 1933, the first year of the Roosevelt administration, the cotton program, and the processing tax, Georgia received $75,510,000 for her cotton. Quite a contrast with $34,642,000, is it not? Of that $75,510,000, $13,371,000 was in benefit payments which were raised through the processing tax. The income from Georgia cotton increased still more in 1934. The total was $88,212,000, and $9,969,000 was in benefit payments.

Georgia farmers have already received directly $23,340,000 through the processing tax, and that exclusive of the payments to be made in 1935.

The southern cotton farmer has received $228,565,000 in benefit payments, and before the end of this year the cash given them to adjust production in an effort to help themselves will total $350,000,000.

Think of what that $350,000,000 and the money that has been paid out to farmers because of the sharply increased price of cotton has meant to the South and in turn to the Nation. It is like a good soaking rain upon a field parched and blistered from drought.

If the cotton levy should be repealed, it would mean the end of the present adjustment plan. The Bankhead bill might remain in effect, theoretically, but it is actually a supplement to the present program, and even its most ardent supporters do not assert that it could stand alone. In my judgment, a compulsory cotton-control bill would be ruinous to the farmer unless some means were provided to pay him for curtailment.

The Government would be forced to abandon its present loan policy if the processing tax were abolished. The only reason the Commodity Credit Corporation can lend now and enable the farmer to receive higher prices is because the cotton program enables control of production. This gives assurance that the carry-over gradually can be reduced, and, with the reduction of the surplus, the price of the staple will tend to rise above the loan.

Abandonment of the adjustment program would mean almost inevitably a collapse of price and in turn expanding cotton acreages, for in an effort to get the money he needs so badly the farmer would plant more cotton and work overtime to raise and harvest it.

Anyone familiar with the cotton-growing South cannot deny that the Agricultural Adjustment Act's cotton program has been a success. Again the figures speak for themselves.

The cash value of the cotton crop for the entire belt, including rental and benefit payments, were: 1932-33—when no program was in effect—$464,330,000; and with the program in effect in 1933-34, $861,733,000; and 1934-35, $838,666,000 in spite of the worst drought in history.

The cotton-growing South, and most of the South is directly or indirectly dependent upon the staple, is just now in the condition of a man slowly gathering strength after a long illness. We are full of hope and confidence, but a relapse would have disastrous effects and the repercussions would be felt over the Nation and the world.

Although it may not be realized generally, the South's come-back during the past 2 years has been a genuine stimulus to the undoubted progress the Nation has made. Recovery in other agricultural sections, due, I believe, to the administration's farm programs, has helped in the rally. Agricultural income in 1934 was a billion dollars over that in 1933 and a good part of that billion went to buy the products of factories.

Removal of the processing tax on cotton probably would be followed by its removal on other farm commodities. If industry objects to the continuance of the farmer's tariff, it must be prepared for a vigorous effort to remove industrial protection.

The farmer cannot continue to buy in a protected market and sell in competition with the cheapest labor in the world. He is entitled to the same consideration and the same protection that the textile industry receives. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. Under the special order of the House, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN] is recognized for 7 minutes.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, it quite frequently happens in a street fight an innocent bystander gets the worst of it. The industry that I am going to talk about this afternoon finds itself in that position.

When the Silver Purchase Act was before the Congress it was considered entirely as a monetary measure, and no serious attention was given to the price those engaged in industry would be compelled to pay for silver. I am not going to talk today about either the merits or the demerits of the silver-purchasing policy of the administration.

In addressing you I do so for the purpose of bringing to the attention of this body an injustice and a hardship which, because of legislation enacted, threatens one of the country's oldest and most high-grade industries and its workers. It is in many respects a unique industry, depending, as it does, to a degree unusual in these times upon the individual artistic craftsmanship of the thousands it employs. I refer to the silverware industry, which, though already established in the day of Paul Revere, whose patterns have had recently a deserved revival, has continued to advance in step with general technical progress and stands with our important modern industries in its methods both of manufacture and distribution.

The making of silverware is, I want to emphasize at the outset, an American enterprise that eminently deserves to continue. Certainly under no conception of the public good does it merit extinction, and under no conception of that same good do its workers merit having their names added to the roll call of the unemployed. Yet both events are possible, indeed, inevitable, unless we address ourselves to finding some means whereby the silverware manufacturer, with other users of silver in the arts and industry, may be relieved from the inexorable increases in the price of silver forced by the provisions of the Silver Purchase Act.

Unfortunately, this act, drawn in a time of extraordinary stress, and, I fear, drawn hastily, made no distinction whatever between silver for currency purposes and silver for fabrication into commercial products. As the matter now stands, to whatever heights monetary silver may be skyrocketed, silver that I may here, for the purposes of the argument, call "commercial" must follow. The price of one has been inescapably tied to the price of the other.

The result is one that I am sure Congress, with its attention focused on other objectives, never intended, and one that I hope with some confidence Congress will now consider every means in its power to mitigate.

The core of the situation is this: The industry, by dint of alert manufacturing and merchandising methods, coupled with fair prices, had as its contribution to the recovery program obtained a very satisfactory acceptance for its goods, bought not so much by the wealthy as by those in very moderate circumstances, to whom it must look for volume. The proof that its energy and courage—much more marked in industry than we are sometimes led to believe—had produced one more item in the credit side of recovery lies in the fact that by 1934 the industry as a whole, despite many obstacles, held fairly well.

It wants to hold and, if possible, advance its level, and I believe the country wants it to. But how can it, if large and abrupt advances are made arbitrarily in the price of silver, when already such increases have forced silver out of its position relative to general commodity prices that it has held invariably for some score of years? To put it another way, while the silverware industry has thus far managed to make its adjustments, the further price increases dictated by the Silver Purchase Act are bound to force the prices of its completed product rapidly beyond the reach of the average purse. This means, first, a slowing up; next, paralysis—and another heavy burden upon our relief rolls.

I want to make this point very clear. The silverware industry, largest user by a wide margin of silver in the arts and industry, has been able on previous occasions when the silver price started an abrupt ascent to continue in business with little difficulty, for upon these previous occasions silver was not merely rising; it was following a rise in general commodity prices. In this case there is a complete disjointment. Silver is not following the line of commodity prices; it is outstripping that line in wild and erratic manner. Some indication that this must be so is seen in the fact that, though silver for many years has pretty generally held to a price around 60 cents per fine ounce, already, under the pressure of the Purchase Act, it has reached 77 cents and is proposed to be advanced to a dollar and twenty-nine cents—more than double the price at which industry had been long accustomed to acquire it for purposes of fabrication.

Thus far I have referred to those affected as the industry. This, however, I have done only as a matter of convenience. It seems so elemental as scarcely to need a reminder that when you start to consider the social implications of any industry you very quickly go far beyond any question of owners and stockholders; you find yourself contemplating the problem of an often unexpectedly large number of wage and salary employees and their dependents. So it is in the silverware industry. Dependent for food, clothing, and shelter upon the manufacturing branch alone are nearly 70,000 men, women, and children. But this is only the beginning of the story. Silverware is distributed through 20,000 retail jewelry stores in every section of the country, and dependent upon those stores are some 225,000 people. When you add also department-store and wholesale distribution, you find that upon the continued operation, on a favorable basis, of the silverware industry depends the support of more than 300,000 people.

At this point some will say, "Let the jewelry stores sell something else." But the facts do not justify such an observation; the price of silver is a vital matter for every retail jeweler, large or small, in the country. Let me read you from a statement made in Washington recently by Mr. William D. McNeil, president of the American National Retail Jewelers' Association:

In 1933 the volume of representative jewelry stores reporting was from one-half to as low as 20 percent of what it was in 1929. In normal times the sales of silverware in jewelry stores were about 15 percent of their total volume. Recent statistics indicate silver sales are from 25 to 30 percent of the volume. These figures clearly indicate what would happen to jewelers if high prices slowed down silver sales. They are in a precarious condition. With the constriction of their silverware sales, which constitute their bread and butter, many will be crowded to the wall.

Here again you see the possibility of further needless unemployment, which would touch every city and town in the country.

I have not the information, nor do I consider it within my province, to go into any question of comparative benefits, or of competitive benefits as against injuries. Yet, I think the Congress might do well to make a study to determine whether those of our citizens, aside from speculators, who are being benefited by the operations under the Silver Purchase Act are so numerous as to justify a continued threat to the livelihood of 300,000 citizens dependent upon one industry alone—and there are others.

Since this is admittedly and announced a time of experiment, it was inevitable that there should be some unforeseen casualties. But once these casualties have been demonstrated as imminent, is it not the part of common sense and of humanity to take steps against their occurrence?

I have talked with silverware people from my State and other States. I find in the industry no disposition, whatever they or I may think of the wisdom of the silver-purchase policy, to request that we consider abandoning this experiment. They do, on the other hand, very earnestly petition for a modification which will not affect the main purposes of the policy which Congress wrote into law, but which will make available to industrial users of silver a sufficient supply, under proper safeguards, at a price maintaining the former and accustomed relationship between silver and general wholesale commodity prices. In short, they petition for, and I urge upon you, the demarcation between silver for monetary use and silver for use in the arts and industries for which the Congress, in the press of an emergency program, failed to provide in the original legislation.

Senator WALSH, of Massachusetts, and myself expect shortly to introduce legislation, which we hope will be given favorable consideration by the Congress, to the end that we may solve this problem and divorce it from the monetary question and make it possible for one of the oldest industries in the United States to survive. [Applause.]

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Speaker, in order that it may appear in the RECORD along with the statement made by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON], I may say that we ought not to feel that we know more than the manufacturers themselves. In reply to questionnaires, most of the manufacturers say that they cannot pass on the processing tax by from 1 to 100 percent. One replied that he has had to absorb the definite amount of 43 percent of the tax. Why should we Congressmen think we know more than the manufacturers? When the price of cotton went up because of the devaluation of the dollar and the N. R. A. costs also added, then the processing tax was the last straw. This is why we continually say it is hard to pass on the processing tax, particularly because this was the last cost imposed, and makes it impossible to overcome the sales resistance since encountered, and has resulted in large curtailment of production.

BANKING ACT OF 1935

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 7617) to provide for the sound, effective, and uninterrupted operation of the banking system, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. WOODRUM in the chair.

The Clerk read the title and continued the reading of the bill, as follows:

SEC. 207. Subsection (b) of section 14 of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended, is further amended by changing the semicolon at the end thereof to a colon and adding the following: "Provided, That any bonds, notes, or other obligations which are direct obligations of the United States or which are fully guaranteed by the United States as to principal and interest may be bought and sold without regard to maturities."

SEC. 208. Section 16 of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended, is further amended in the following respects:

(1) By striking out the first 10 paragraphs and substituting therefor the following:

"SEC. 16. Each Federal Reserve bank may issue Federal Reserve notes, which shall be obligations of the United States, secured by a first and paramount lien on all of the assets of such bank. Federal Reserve notes shall be issued and retired by Federal Reserve banks under such rules and regulations as the Federal Reserve Board may prescribe and shall be legal tender for all purposes.

"Every Federal Reserve bank shall maintain reserves in lawful money (other than Federal Reserve notes or Federal Reserve bank notes) of not less than 35 percent against its deposits and reserves in gold certificates of not less than 40 percent against its Federal Reserve notes in actual circulation. Each Federal Reserve note shall bear upon its face a distinctive letter, which shall be assigned by the Federal Reserve Board to each Federal Reserve bank, and also a serial number.

"When received by the Treasurer of the United States from a source other than a Federal Reserve bank, Federal Reserve notes unfit for further use shall be canceled and retired; and, upon receipt of advice of such cancellation and retirement, the issuing Federal Reserve bank shall reimburse the Treasurer of the United States for the notes so canceled and retired. When received by a Federal Reserve bank, Federal Reserve notes unfit for further use shall be canceled and forwarded to the Treasurer of the United States for retirement; and, if issued by another Federal Reserve bank, such issuing bank shall reimburse the Federal Reserve bank which canceled such notes and forwarded them to the Treasurer of the United States.

"In order to furnish suitable notes for circulation as Federal Reserve notes, the Comptroller of the Currency, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall cause plates and dies to be engraved in the best manner to guard against counterfeiting and fraudulent alterations, and shall have printed therefrom and numbered such quantities of such notes of the denominations of $5, $10, $20, $50, $100, $500, $1,000, $5,000, and $10,000 as may be required to supply the Federal Reserve banks. Such notes shall be in form and tenor as directed by the Secretary of the Treasury and shall bear the distinctive letters of the several Federal Reserve banks through which they are issued. When such notes have been prepared, they shall be held in the Treasury subject to the order of the Comptroller of the Currency for delivery to the Federal Reserve banks. Federal Reserve notes unfit for circulation shall be returned to the Comptroller of the Currency for cancellation and destruction."

(2) By striking from the sixteenth paragraph the words "or Federal Reserve agent" where they occur in three different places, the words "or his", the words "at the Treasury or at the Sub-treasury of the United States nearest the place of business of such Federal Reserve bank or such Federal Reserve agent", the words "or any Assistant Treasurer", the words "or Assistant Treasurer", and the words "by the Treasurer at Washington upon proper advices from any Assistant Treasurer that such deposit has been made."

Sec. 209. The sixth paragraph of section 19 of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"Notwithstanding the other provisions of this section, the Federal Reserve Board, in order to prevent injurious credit expansion or contraction, may by regulation change the requirements as to reserves to be maintained against demand or time deposits or both by member banks in reserve and central reserve cities or by member banks not in reserve or central reserve cities or by all member banks."

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, section 209 gives the Federal Reserve Board as a board the right to change the requirements regarding the amount of reserves to be maintained against the demand and time deposits, or both, by member banks in the central reserve cities and reserve cities or by member banks not in reserve or central reserve cities or by all member banks.

At the present time the law provides the reserves that shall be maintained against deposits by banks in the various classes of cities, distinguished between central reserve cities, reserve cities, and other banks, the requirements being greater in the central reserve cities and tapering down to country banks.

At the present time reserves may only be changed as a matter of emergency. Five members of the Federal Reserve Board, by declaring an emergency, with the approval of the President, may make a change in the Reserve requirements.

Section 209 would give the right to a bare majority of a quorum, or three members—a quorum being five—of the Federal Reserve Board, to change Reserve requirements of all banks up or down as they see fit.

The theory of providing that the Federal Board may change the requirements in time of emergency is that there should be some little flexibility to the statutory requirements as to the reserves which should be maintained by the various classes of banks, it being felt that there were times when it might be wise that certain changes should be made, but that such change could not be made too easily or without due and proper consideration. It is necessary, however, that the five members of the Board act; that they declare an emergency; and that they get Presidential approval.

I suppose you all know what it means when the right is given to change the Reserve requirements. Naturally, to the extent that the Reserve requirements are increased, to that extent the lending functions of the banks are affected. A sudden increase will mean the calling of loans by the various banks; in other words, a deflationary movement which might be great or small, depending entirely on how large an increase was made in the Reserve requirements.

On the other hand, a great reduction in reserve requirements would be inflationary, because it would naturally give to the banks a much greater lending ability in that so much of their resources would not be tied up in keeping reserves at the Federal Reserve banks. I believe that this is one of the steps which we should keep very strictly under control and that there should not be given to the Federal Reserve Board the power to affect so quickly and so drastically the lending functions of the banks of the country. I ask Members to note that this is not a control solely over the Federal Reserve banks like some of the other objectionable provisions of this bill, but is a control over all of the member banks of the system. This gives to the Federal Reserve Board the right to dictate the lending policies, quickly and drastically, of all of the banks of the Federal Reserve System.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLLISTER. Yes.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Is it not a fact that under the proposed change in this bill the Federal Reserve Board would actually have greater independence of the Executive in the exercise of this power than it now has?

Mr. HOLLISTER. Greater power?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Would it not have greater independence so far as the Executive is concerned?

Mr. HOLLISTER. I do not think so, because I consider the Board is much controlled by the Executive.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Under the present law, before the reserves could be changed the Board would have to secure the approval of the President.

Mr. HOLLISTER. That is right.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Under the proposed law they would not have to declare to the world that an emergency was imminent.

Mr. HOLLISTER. That is correct; but under existing law it takes five members of the Board before it can be done, and that is quite different from the proposed law.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Is it not fair to conclude that under the proposed law it would require the action of a majority, which would mean five, and also that no action could be taken until the Board had conferred with a committee of the governors of the banks?

Mr. HOLLISTER. Not necessarily. Three members of the Board can act under the proposed law, and can act at once, without declaring an emergency and without the approval of the President.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Does the gentleman mean to say that under the proposed law three members of the Federal Reserve Board can control the action of eight?

Mr. HOLLISTER. They could if only five were present at the meeting.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. But does not the gentleman believe that the entire membership would, if possible, be present at a meeting when this important issue was to be considered?

Mr. HOLLISTER. I cannot tell who would be present, and neither can the gentleman. I am speaking of the possibilities of this proposal. As a matter of fact, it is generally known that there are certain members of the Board who are not very regular in their attendance at meetings.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. The gentleman recognizes that control, so far as the reserves are concerned, must be vested in some body.

Mr. HOLLISTER. I feel very strongly that it is much better to fix by law the reserve requirements and then make it a rather difficult matter, and only in time of emergency, to change those reserve requirements. I believe that the right to change them so quickly is dangerous and that it should not be granted to any board.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Does not the gentleman recognize that a situation might exist whereby the other powers conferred on this Board would be ineffective?

Mr. HOLLISTER. Ineffective for what?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. For controlling an emergency situation. In other words, the gentleman understands that a situation might exist whereby the other powers vested in this board would be ineffective to control a dangerous monetary situation unless they could resort to the power of regulating the reserves. For instance, suppose the Federal Reserve banks had a less amount of Government and other securities than the total amount of excess reserves of member banks. The rediscount rate would be ineffective and open-market operations could not absorb the reserves. Is not that correct?

Mr. HOLLISTER. It depends entirely on what the gentleman is trying to achieve. If the gentleman is a believer in the use by an administration-controlled board to manipulate to achieve a certain price level, then the gentleman is correct. I myself am not a believer in such manipulation.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Suppose we faced a serious and undesirable credit-expansion situation, and the Federal Reserve banks had only $2,000,000,000 in Government bonds and securities, and the excess reserves of the member banks were two and a half billion dollars, the gentleman will admit the rediscount rate would have little effect, and neither would the open-market operations, as a means of checking or controlling the situation in the public interest.

Mr. HOLLISTER. As a means of controlling inflation?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Yes.

Mr. HOLLISTER. I do not know of anything that could control inflation under some circumstances. There are plenty of provisions in the Federal Reserve Act today which give the right to the Federal Reserve Board to take certain steps to control credit inflation. Those steps were unfortunately not taken advantage of by the Federal Reserve Board in the past.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. By "inflation", of course, the gentleman means unjustified expansion.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HOLLISTER] has again expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HOLLISTER].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HOLLISTER) there were—ayes 44, noes 78.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 210. The first paragraph of section 24 of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"Sec. 24. Subject to such regulations as the Federal Reserve Board may prescribe, any national banking association may make real-estate loans secured by first liens upon improved real estate, including improved farm land and improved business and residential properties. The amount of any such loan hereafter made shall not exceed 60 percent of the appraised value of the real estate; but this limitation shall not prevent the renewal or extension of loans heretofore made and shall not apply to real-estate loans which are insured under the provisions of title II of the National Housing Act. No bank shall make such loans in an aggregate sum in excess of the amount of the capital stock of such association paid in and unimpaired plus its unimpaired surplus fund, or in excess of 60 percent of the amount of its time and savings deposits, whichever is the greater. The Federal Reserve Board is authorized to prescribe from time to time regulations defining the term 'real-estate loans' and other terms used in this section and regulating and limiting the making of real-estate loans by member banks, with a view of preventing an unreasonably large proportion of each bank's assets from being invested in real estate and real-estate loans, preventing such loans from exceeding a reasonable percentage of the appraised value of the real estate in view of the circumstances existing at the time, and otherwise requiring the banks to conform to sound practices in making real-estate loans."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which is at the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLANTON: Page 58, line 13, at the end of the section, add a new section numbered appropriately as follows: "Hereafter no officer or agent or employee of the Federal Reserve Board, Federal Reserve bank, or Federal Reserve System shall be paid a salary exceeding $15,000 per annum."

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, it is subject to a point of order if the gentleman insists upon it. I would like to have the gentleman reserve the point of order.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, the matter is not germane.

Mr. BLANTON. Very well, Mr. Chairman. I will withdraw the amendment.

The amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, there is always a means of doing what you want to do if you really want to do it. I want to call attention to the fact that the thing just now which is causing the greatest unrest in this country and the greatest dissatisfaction on the part of the people as a whole is the fact that a few men, comparatively, in the Nation are receiving tremendous salaries, beyond their just deserts, while the great mass of people are underpaid and many starving to death.

There is no reason in the world why certain officers and agents of the Federal Reserve System should receive salaries of $25,000, $30,000, $40,000, and $50,000 per annum. None of them earn these outrageous salaries. They are overpaid. I have been doing everything possible to stop it. I cannot do it. But this Congress can stop it if enough of my colleagues will make a determined fight.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BLANTON. I am sorry, but I cannot, as I have not the time.

Why should a Federal Reserve official receive $50,000 per year when the great Speaker of this House of Representatives receives a salary of only $15,000? He is the man who is next in authority to the President of the United States, and yet he receives only $15,000, while some Federal Reserve officials are paid several times that amount.

The Vice President of the United States, who presides over the Senate of the United States, receives a salary of only $15,000. Our distinguished friend, who may be the national leader of his party and the Republican candidate for President next year, the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], who formerly sat with honor in the United States Senate, then received a salary of only $10,000 as a United States Senator, and now receives a salary of $10,000 as a Congressman, yet there are some Federal Reserve and other officials who receive $50,000 per year. It is outrageous the salaries that these Federal Reserve officers and agents get under the bank bills that we continually pass in this House.

I am not going to let another one pass without raising my voice in protest against it.

Oh, they say that the officers of big corporations receive $100,000 and $200,000. And that is outrageous and disgraceful. I will tell you what the people are going to do hereafter. The people of the United States who invest their funds in the stocks of those companies are going to look up those facts about officers' salaries before they make their investment.

The Securities and Exchange Commission has just revealed that there are 41 executives who last year received salaries ranging from $50,000 to $100,000 each. This Commission showed that Francis B. Davis, chairman United States Rubber Co., received a salary of $125,000; that Edward G. Seubert, president of the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana, received a salary of $117,500; that Francis H. Brownell, chairman of the American Smelting & Refining Co., received a salary of $100,000. And that is one reason why this company could not pay any dividends worth mentioning to its stockholders last year. William E. Levis, president of the Owens-Illinois Glass Co., and George Horace Lorimer, editor of the Saturday Evening Post, each receive a salary of $100,000 per year.

The people who pay the bills are getting tired of it. I hope that Americans will stop investing their hard-earned savings in the stock of any of these corporations which pay their officials outrageous salaries. I want to suggest to the people of the United States that they require a statement from every corporation in which they own stock as to what salaries are paid, and that they quit supporting such corporations and get out of them just as fast as they can, unless this pernicious practice is stopped.

The people are going to find out what all the officers of these big corporations receive, and when they are paid these tremendous sums out of all reason they will not invest their money in any of their stocks. They are going to stop investing. Then what will become of the big corporate interests? They depend on the investing public for the money with which to operate.

Instead of paying the earned income in proper dividends to their investors, they vote it to themselves in big salaries and big bonuses. Then when they get in trouble they come to Congress and want to borrow from the P. W. A. great sums—millions of dollars. The American investing public is getting tired of it. Talk about trouble in this country. That is the thing that is causing more trouble than anything else.

I want to say again that when I came to this Congress the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL] was my leader on financial matters. He was the clearest and most logical thinker and speaker on this floor. I used to follow him here, but since he has been chairman of this great committee he has not been able to follow his own judgment altogether, and is forced to bring in bills here that I know he does not believe in all of their provisions. [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma motion.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma motion is withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit a unanimous-consent request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, following up the unanimous-consent request I made yesterday to insert in the RECORD an amendment to title I, I now ask unanimous consent to return to title I and consider the amendment.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, and I dislike very much to object, but I shall have to on account of commitments I have made to constituents of mine.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, will not the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Chairman, I withhold the objection for the moment, but I reserve the right to object.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, on yesterday, by unanimous consent, I inserted in the RECORD copy of an amendment to be added to the last subdivision of section 101 in title I of this bill. The amendment speaks for itself, and I assume that every Member present today has understood that this amendment would be offered for consideration by the House. The parliamentary situation was such yesterday that for a while none of us seemed to know where we were, or the procedure to be followed in amending the bill. I do not for a minute undertake to create the impression that there was anything wrong or unfair in connection with the motion of my good friend from Massachusetts; but it was rather an unusual thing to suspend the reading of 43 pages of a bill of this character. I have no excuse, for immediately after the reading of title I was suspended I offered another motion, which the House voted down.

Every Member here who has read the report filed by the Committee on Banking and Currency will know that in the supplemental views of Mr. BROWN of Michigan this language appeared:

The results desired can best be achieved by restoring section 23 of title I of H. R. 5357 (referring to the original bill), requiring insured nonmember banks within a reasonable time to join the Federal Reserve System, which will be offered on the floor by Representative HANCOCK of North Carolina—

And so forth.

The motion which I am asking unanimous consent to have the House consider at this point is, as all of you probably know, designed to bring about a unified system of banking for the United States. Under the liberalized provisions of this bill, if this amendment is adopted, all active banks which are members of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation on July 1, 1938, will be eligible for admission to the Federal Reserve System. Of course, their admission into the System would in the final analysis be left to the discretion of the Federal Reserve authorities; but under section 202 of title II of the bill all requirements for admission are expressly waived. Under existing law all banks that are members of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation as of July 1, 1937, would have to join the Federal Reserve System on or before that date if they are to continue to enjoy the benefits and protection of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation. Every proper means is provided in this bill to safeguard the rights of the smaller banks and to place them on a parity with the larger banks. If I were not convinced beyond the shadow of a doubt in my own mind that a unified system, under the direction and supervision of Federal authorities, would be to the advantage of the smaller banks, I would not advocate the adoption of the amendment which I am asking to be considered.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Certainly.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, this request grows out of a situation that developed yesterday, rather a peculiar situation, and nobody understands just why that procedure was taken. When the Clerk began reading the bill, some Member asked unanimous consent that title I in its entirety be passed over, 43 pages, a most unusual procedure.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Very unusual.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, I know nothing of the merits of the gentleman's proposed amendment. I do not know what I would do about it, but I do believe he was taken unawares. Everybody knew he was going to offer this amendment to the first title. I think, from the standpoint of fairness and sportsmanship, he ought to be granted this permission, for he had declared his intention to the House of offering the amendment.

I think this, it is an exceptional situation, and nobody ought to take advantage of it by objecting to the gentleman's request, because had anybody thought such a thing would have happened permission never would have been granted to pass over 43 pages of this great banking bill without even reading them in the Committee. Of course, I realize the move was made in good faith, but it was very unusual and naturally was not expected.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be fair to the gentleman from North Carolina, but I want also to be fair to the State banks of the State of Minnesota, and I therefore insist upon my objection.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, will not the gentleman reserve his objection further, that the gentleman from North Carolina may be heard?

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Chairman, I withhold my objection to give the gentleman from North Carolina an opportunity to express his views, but I reserve the right to object.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I want to say further that if this amendment should be carried we would have 3 years instead of 2 years as provided in the existing law within which to determine how much further we should go in the direction of bringing about a unified system of banking. My good friend the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], who has given considerable thought to this legislation and who is interested, as all of us are, in protecting and aiding the small banks throughout the country, referred to the fact that under this amendment, which I have proposed, many banks would not be permitted to come into the system on account of the fact that deferred certificates had been issued to waiving depositors. Under the provisions of this bill, which the House now has under consideration, even these banks could come into the Federal Reserve System without further material capital adjustment if they were members of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation.

This amendment has the hearty approval of the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board. His testimony regarding its merits may be found on page 286 of the hearings conducted by the committee. He was at the time being cross-examined or questioned by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

It has been the intention of the authors and framers of all banking legislation since 1933, or at least of those representing the administration viewpoint, that ultimately every bank enjoying the privileges and protection of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation should come into the Federal Reserve System. Those who have carefully analyzed the banking and financial situation as it is developing at this time, are obliged to realize that we cannot possibly have an effective Nation-wide monetary policy with half the banks in the system and half the banks out of the system. Under our present system, with 49 degrees of regulation, our banking system will never be strong, efficient, and effective to meet economic ups and downs.

I would very much appreciate it if the gentleman from Minnesota would withdraw his objection and let the House consider the amendment on its merits; if it is good, sound, and desirable adopt it; if it is not, vote it down; but at least let us be willing to face the proposition in the proper legislative way.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Gladly.

Mr. SISSON. Will the gentleman from Minnesota withhold his objection long enough for me to submit a unanimous-consent request to be heard on this matter for 3 minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. The matter is pending before the Committee on a reservation of objection by the gentleman from Minnesota to the unanimous-consent request submitted by the gentleman from North Carolina. Until the regular order is demanded the discussion may proceed, but the Chair feels that if another unanimous-consent request is to be submitted, the reservation of objection should first be disposed of.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Chairman, I further reserve the right to object to permit the gentleman from New York to make his statement.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Chair will recognize the gentleman for 5 minutes.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to make a brief statement in order to clarify the RECORD.

When title I of the bill was being read yesterday a unanimous-consent request was made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK] that the further reading of the bill be dispensed with and that it be printed in full in the RECORD. The Chair put that request to the Committee and it was agreed to by the Committee. The Chair then announced that the first section of the bill was open to amendment.

The gentleman from North Carolina offered an amendment to the section, which was debated and voted down. The Chair desires to make this statement because it would not be correct for the RECORD to show that there was any question about the regularity of the proceedings or the understanding as to exactly what was happening. The Chair now recognizes the gentleman from New York [Mr. SISSON] for 5 minutes.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer no criticism of the regularity of the proceedings of yesterday and I am sure the purpose of the Member who asked that the reading of title I be dispensed with had nothing to do with this particular provision. It was simply for the purpose of saving time. But in the confusion and noise that inevitably accompanies the proceedings, the matter escaped the attention of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HANCOCK], the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROWN], and myself. This proposition ought to be considered on its merits, as a matter of fairness.

Mr. Chairman, I am going to give what I say is the undisputed history of this legislation. I am not well enough versed in parliamentary rules to know whether the proposed amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HANCOCK] can be held to be germane except to title I of this bill, but the orderly way to consider it is to go back to title I. Here are the facts and they are undisputed.

In 1933, after a long fight, we passed a Federal deposit-insurance law as a part of the Banking Act of 1933, and I am telling you at this time it was fairly understood in the Banking and Currency Committee, of which I have been a member since that time, that we would consider on its merits the proposition of making it possible, easy, and desirable, in order to bring about the unification of the banking system of this country, to bring the nonmember State banks into the Federal Reserve System. Why? If you have read the supplementary report of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROWN], a very able report, you have the facts and figures why this should be done. It is not a partisan question. I can appeal to all Members, regardless of their party affiliation in this House, as a matter of information, public policy, and in the interest of the depositors, and in the interest of the control of the monetary policy of this country.

We understood this in 1933 and we wrote it into the law in 1933, that the nonmember State banks, in order to retain the benefits of Federal deposit insurance, should eventually be required to come into the Federal Reserve System. We again wrote it in the law of 1934. It is in the law now.

Mr. Chairman, what I am about to say I hoped I would not be obliged to say, but what this committee did was at a time when the House was in session. The Banking and Currency Committee took this vital provision out of the present law by a roll-call vote, a bare majority of a bare quorum. I had hoped that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HANCOCK] would get the consent of the committee to go back to title I and consider this amendment. It was done when I was not in the committee. It was done when other members were not in the committee. It was done by a roll call vote of the committee when the committee was sitting without permission to sit and when the House was in session.

On its merits and as a matter of fairness, no Member of this House has any moral right to object to going back and considering this amendment on its merits. That is the history of the matter, and it is undisputed. I challenge anybody to contradict one single statement which I have made.

And furthermore the Banking and Currency Committee is presenting in this bill a bill which in this respect has been emasculated, and which is absolutely contrary to the administration's plan to gradually but eventually unify our banking system in order to protect the depositors of the country and to place the control of our monetary policy in the Government rather than in the private bankers.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HANCOCK]?

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The Clerk read as follows:

TITLE III—TECHNICAL AMENDMENTS TO THE BANKING LAWS

Sec. 301. Subsection (c) of section 2 of the Banking Act of 1933, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following paragraph:

"Notwithstanding the foregoing, the term 'holding company affiliate' shall not include (except for the purposes of section 23A of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended) any corporation all of the stock of which is owned by the United States of America or any organization which, in the judgment of the Federal Reserve Board, is not engaged, directly or indirectly, as a business in holding the stock of, or managing or controlling, banks, banking associations, savings banks, or trust companies."

Sec. 302. The first paragraph of section 20 of the Banking Act of 1933, as amended, is amended by inserting before the period at the end thereof a colon and the following: "Provided, That nothing in this paragraph shall apply to any such organization which shall have been placed in formal liquidation and which shall transact no business except such as may be incidental to the liquidation of its affairs."

Sec. 303. (a) Paragraph (1) of subsection (a) of section 21 of the Banking Act of 1933, as amended, is amended by inserting before the semicolon at the end thereof a colon and the following: "Provided, That the provisions of this paragraph shall not prohibit national banks or State banks or trust companies (whether or not members of the Federal Reserve System) or other financial institutions or private bankers from dealing in, underwriting, purchasing, and selling investment securities to the extent permitted to national banking associations by the provisions of section 5136 of the Revised Statutes, as amended (U. S. C., title 12, sec. 24; Supp. VII, title 12, sec. 24): Provided further, That nothing in this paragraph shall be construed as affecting in any way such right as any bank, banking association, savings bank, trust company, or other banking institution, may otherwise possess to sell, without recourse or agreement to repurchase, obligations evidencing loans on real estate."

(b) Paragraph (2) of subsection (a) of such section 21 is hereby repealed.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to ask a question of the Chairman of the Banking Committee.

As I understand the situation under the present law, the executives of all national banks must liquidate their loans before the 15th of June of this year.

Mr. STEAGALL. That is correct.

Mr. SNELL. My understanding is, further, this bill extends that time 4 or 5 years.

Mr. STEAGALL. It is extended to 1938.

Mr. SNELL. What does the gentleman think would be the situation in country banks, where this applies especially, if this bill does not pass before the 16th of June?

Mr. STEAGALL. I call the gentleman's attention to the change that has just been suggested, and also in the pending bill there is a liberalizing provision which would permit loans to an executive officer not in excess of $2,500. This would take care of an officer in a small bank who might be in difficulty because of illness or some emergency which would make it necessary to secure accommodations. We believe the amendment to which I have referred would afford relief to a large extent in the case of officers of small banks and situations such as the gentleman seems to have in mind.

Mr. SNELL. I do not quite understand what the amendment is. I could not hear the gentleman when he referred to the amendment.

Mr. STEAGALL. It is that the executive officer of a bank may borrow $2,500 on his own obligation from the bank of which he is an officer.

Mr. SNELL. That is, under this bill?

Mr. STEAGALL. Yes; there is that liberalizing provision in the bill.

Mr. SNELL. What happens to whatever loans they happen to have at the present time?

Mr. STEAGALL. They may renew them with the approval of the directors of the bank.

Mr. SNELL. But only up to $2,500?

Mr. STEAGALL. No; there is no limitation as to renewals.

Mr. SNELL. What does the gentleman think would be the situation in a country bank where they have such loans and this bill is not passed by June 16?

Mr. STEAGALL. Well, there would be some difficulties, but I do not think they would be very serious.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman does not think they would be very disastrous, but, as a matter of fact, in the small country communities there is no possibility of their paying these loans and there is no place they can borrow the money.

Mr. STEAGALL. Provision is made for renewal of existing loans, and there is provision also authorizing a new loan in the amounts already indicated.

Mr. SNELL. Does the gentleman think anything serious would happen if this bill should not become a law by the 16th of June when the time expires?

Mr. STEAGALL. The matter of the definition of an executive officer is left open and the practical situation would be such that in many cases the matter involved could be worked out. It is highly desirable, I think, that this legislation should go through before the date indicated, and I do not doubt that the legislation will be passed within that time. I think that is the practical situation.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this measure is to regulate banking. It should provide a protection for those engaged in the banking business and at the same time protect those doing business with these institutions. There is nothing in this bill, nor has anything come from the Banking Committee, to put the Government out of the banking business. The Federal Government is now engaged in the banking business in competition with private capital. It is maintaining a banking business through the postal-savings deposits in the Post Office Department of practically every community in the United States. I have introduced H. R. 5286, which proposes to prohibit the acceptance of postal-savings deposits in communities where adequate banking facilities, members of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, are available.

It is high time the Government was getting out of the banking and other business. I am strongly opposed to the Federal Government engaging in business in opposition to citizens. [Applause.] There is no reason for the passage of stringent laws to encourage honest, legitimate banking business and at the same time maintain an agency in constant competition, such as the Postal Savings. Such a course seriously jeopardizes the welfare of the banking institutions of this country, especially the smaller banks. These small banks are not making any money; in fact, they are having a hard time to survive.

Money deposited in the Postal Savings of the Post Office Department practically goes out of circulation. No taxes are paid upon this money, no more help is employed, no loans from this source are ever made in the community and this Postal Savings bank does nothing to build up the community in which the deposits are accepted.

The emergency has passed when Postal Savings was a good thing for the country. Then banks were more or less shaky and people wanted to deposit their money where they knew it would be safe and guaranteed by the Federal Government. They wanted it with the Post Office Department because they knew they could get it at any time. Today the banks have their deposits guaranteed up to $5,000 for each depositor. My bill provides that only in communities where there is a bank member of the guaranty deposit system shall the Government be prohibited from maintaining a Postal Savings department. This provision should have been included in this bill.

Money deposited in Postal Savings is never kept in the community where deposited. As soon as it is deposited the postmaster sends it to the great banking centers, except possibly in the larger cities. Take a bank, for instance, with $25,000 capital; it can borrow this money through the Post Office Department, here in Washington, by putting up approved bonds and paying 2½-percent interest; the Post Office Department pays 2-percent interest for its postal savings and will accept deposits up to $2,500.

The history of Postal Savings shows that the Government is making no money from this source. You will not hear the big banks of the Nation wanting this law changed, because they are reaping a benefit from the present system. Take a bank of $500,000 capital stock; they take $100,000 of their money and buy that many Government bonds, borrow $100,000 in cash from the Postal Savings, then take this cash and buy more bonds, and multiply it until they get $500,000 in Government bonds, which is the amount of their capital stock, by the investment of $100,000 of their own money. Thus they are in the attitude of drawing interest on $500,000 in Government bonds with only $100,000 invested. For the big banking institutions of the country the Postal Savings System is a good thing, but it is sounding the death knell of 90 percent of the small banks of the Nation.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULLER. I yield.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I think the gentleman is perhaps correct in one statement, but I think the banks get their currency as incidental to their investment in the bonds, and they do not invest in the bonds for the purpose of getting currency issues, due to the fact that the banks today hold about $26,000,000,000 in Government obligations, when there is only about $5,600,000,000 of currency outstanding.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. FULLER. The gentleman is correct; but he is talking about something that I am not discussing at all and is not involved in this issue at all.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULLER. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. I have listened to the gentleman's statement, which is very interesting. Will this bill cure the situation in any way?

Mr. FULLER. No; but we should remedy this condition in this bill.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman from Arkansas has put his finger on the greatest danger involved in this legislation, and it is a matter that ought to be cured in some way.

Mr. FULLER. I shall offer my bill as an amendment, if they will not object to it; and I am satisfied the committee could not be opposed to it.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULLER. I yield.

Mr. SABATH. Does not the gentleman think we could cure the situation by providing that the money deposited in various post offices should remain in the districts or in the cities where such money has been deposited as Postal Savings?

Mr. FULLER. That would do some good and would be better than nothing.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULLER. I yield.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. In the first place, since the gentleman has received 5 additional minutes, I would like to call attention to two or three things in the present bill.

Mr. FULLER. I would not want the gentleman to take up my time on that. The gentleman does not mean that there is any remedy for this situation provided in the bill?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. In section 340 we legislate upon this subject.

Mr. FULLER. How does the committee legislate upon it?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. We have restricted the amount of interest that can be paid on postal savings to the same amount as that fixed by the Federal Reserve Board for payment of interest by the banks.

Mr. FULLER. Yes; but that would allow Postal Savings to pay as much interest on deposits as banks.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Second, I may say to the gentleman that under existing law the money deposited in a Postal Savings bank must be deposited in the nearest member bank of the Federal Reserve that will put up the proper security.

Mr. FULLER. Yes; I know that, but what about 7,000 banks not members of the Federal Reserve System but members of Deposit Insurance Corporation?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. And the first $5,000 can be taken care of by any member bank, because no security is required for the first $5,000 other than that required by the Deposit Corporation.

Mr. FULLER. The Government discriminates in favor of the Postal Savings department as against the banks of the country. Bank members of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation are required to pay a certain percentage for guaranteeing deposits; no such requirement is made of the Post Office Department. The Post Office Department is willing to accept postal-savings deposits which are withdrawable at any time without expense to those who withdraw, but when one makes a deposit in a bank for 6 months he cannot withdraw that money before the expiration of the 6 months' period under Government rules and regulations; another discrimination against private business. At this time there are $500,000,000 of postal-savings deposits loaned to the banks of the country, $600,000,000 invested in Government bonds and $20,000,000 surplus.

Stockholders of banks have a double liability for the stock they own unless it is common stock issued since June 16, 1933. In order for a banking institution to be successful, serve the community and the Nation, and honestly administer its affairs, it should be fairly treated by the Government, not discriminated against, as well as properly regulated. The only way the small banks are surviving is by making a charge for services, which they are required to do by the Federal Reserve System. In almost every small community having a small bank there is as much money in the Postal Savings department on deposit as in the bank.

I have no defense for unscrupulous, dishonest bankers, and they are not entitled to any sympathy, but no community can prosper without banking facilities. The history of this country is the history of banks assisting in building up communities. They pay taxes, hire men and women, take an active interest in local affairs, and their competitor, the Post Office Department, does nothing in this regard.

Mr. TRUAX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULLER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. TRUAX. The gentleman's statement about big banks collecting interest on $500,000, whereas they actually invest only $100,000 confirms the statement I have often made that these big banks do have a racket and practice a racket which has a disastrous effect on the small banks of the country.

(The time of Mr. FULLER having expired, he was given 5 minutes more.)

Mr. TRUAX. I want to ask the gentleman a question which was brought out in committee, that the big banks of the country have a direct subsidy whereby they collect to the amount of $350,000,000 a year by reason of tax-exempt securities. Is the gentleman in favor of that?

Mr. FULLER. I have always been opposed to it. I know the condition of the small banks and the obstacles they are required to overcome.

I have no brief and no defense for the men who have been connected with the banking business and have been dishonest, but many banks went down conducted by honest men and honest officials. The emergency has passed, and most all are now members of the guaranteed banking system. I hope my contention is written into this bill before it becomes a law, or at least the Postal Savings department reduces this rate of interest to 1 percent.

The maintenance of this Postal Savings System causes prejudice against and lack of confidence in the local banks. Those who now deposit in the Postal Savings are afraid of banks, and the Government encourages that fear and prejudice by being in the banking business. A bank can say "our deposits are guaranteed", but the uninformed or suspicious depositor sees that Uncle Sam is running a bank of his own; therefore, doubts this being true and deposits his money where he knows Uncle Sam is guaranteeing his deposits and will let him withdraw at any time.

If we want to help the banks survive by rules and regulations why not give them some encouragement.

It is not generally known that I have introduced such a measure, but in my own State, where it is known, the banks unanimously endorsed the measure as did the State banking commissioner. I have received hundreds of letters of endorsement from building-and-loan associations, banks, and bank associations all over the Nation. The bankers of the Middle West recently approved my bill.

What we lack is confidence; confidence in banks and individuals. How can we expect to help banks and restore and maintain confidence in them when the Government is in competition. [Applause.] People who are not well read and who do little, if anything, to build up a community or employ labor or pay taxes are the ones who deposit most in the Postal Savings. In one sense they are not to be criticized, but the emergency is passed, and they can now deposit their money in a bank and be guaranteed its safety. Most of them really do not know that their deposits in the banks would be as safe as in the Post Office Department. By its actions the Government seeks to inflame and encourage that fear and lack of knowledge. [Applause.]

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I rise to bring to the attention of the House a matter already suggested, found on page 78 of the bill. No executive officer can borrow from a member bank, and no member bank may loan to an executive officer of such bank. It has been asked if this bill does not pass before June 16, what will happen. We are referred to section 30 of the Banking Act of 1933, and the provisions of that section are rather frightening. Every day that nonpayment continues there is a violation and it is also a misdemeanor, and while many of us may think, if they cannot pay the indebtedness by that date, nothing much will be done about it, except to make a demand. It is fairly apparent that those executive officers are liable to lose their jobs as well.

Under this bill these loans may be extended for 5 years if, in the opinion of the directors, the executive officer has endeavored to pay and if there appears to be good reason for granting the extension. But later on in that paragraph you will read that no executive officer of any member bank, whether he borrows money of his bank or not, may borrow money of another member bank unless he first gives in writing to his own bank a statement of how much he borrows, the purposes for which he borrows it, the term of his borrowings, and the security he gives therefor. Think of the harassment of an executive officer of any importance in the business world if he is to be subjected to such conditions as those. I presume the members of the committee may have thought that if he did borrow $2,500, then perhaps he ought to give an account to that bank of all his transactions in any other bank. I hope that feature will be taken out of this bill. I warned of it a few days ago, and when that section is read I hope an amendment to strike out will receive approval. Will you not kindly study page 78 and decide whether you approve of that particular feature to which I have called attention?

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. We have heard so much argument pro and con that I am reminded of an expression used by Shakespeare, in which he said that—

Between the acting of a dreadful thing
And the first motion, all the interim is Like a phantasma, or a hideous dream:
The Genius and the mortal instruments
Are then in council; and the state of man,
Like to a little kingdom, suffers then
The nature of an insurrection.

Our feelings have gone through many insurrections as we have listened to this debate, and many are in doubt now as to how they should vote.

I rise to point out to you one danger with reference to this Federal Reserve law. When the Federal Reserve Act was first passed it gave the Board the power to expand or contract the currency, without the consent of the Congress, and I fear that you are writing the same iniquity into this bill.

You gentlemen who are afraid of inflation, or who shy when the words "expansion of the currency" are mentioned, overlook the fact that those same bankers who now presume to throw up their hands in affected horror at the mention of currency expansion began in 1914, with the passage of the Federal Reserve Act, to expand or inflate the currency. At that time we had $34.92 per capita in circulation or on the books. By 1920 we had $53 per capita on the books or in circulation, including Federal Reserve notes. That was inflation pure and simple. They expanded or inflated until they virtually doubled the amount of currency that was really in circulation.

The result was rising commodity prices. Cotton, wheat, hogs, lard, lumber, labor, manufactured articles—all went up. People contracted debts on that expanded currency and on those price levels. We floated bonds to fight the war. We floated bonds to cut our drainage canals. We floated bonds to build our roads and schoolhouses. We established our standard of living and fixed our wage scale and levied our taxes. What happened? In 1920, in my opinion, the most iniquitous conspiracy that ever transpired occurred between a group of Republican politicians and a Democratic Governor of the Federal Reserve Board.

I say that in order that you may take no more responsibility than we do for the contraction of the currency in 1920. What did they do? They called the loans and raised the rediscount rates and brought on the panic of 1920 and 1921 that wrecked the farmers of this country to an extent that they have never recovered. Farmers in the South plowed under a great deal of their cotton, because the price would not pay for picking and ginning it, while farmers in the West burned corn in their stoves because it was cheaper than coal. They deflated values, but they did not deflate the values of the holdings of those individuals who had been shrewd enough to invest their money in tax-exempt securities. That was one of the greatest crimes of all time. It brought rack and ruin to millions of our citizens.

That is the reason I say we ought not to delegate the power of Congress, vested in us by the Constitution, to coin money and regulate the value thereof to selfish individuals or to a group of selfish individuals.

Now, let us see further. In 1924 they saw there was going to be a revolt. It really took place in 1922, and almost overturned the administration.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] has expired.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. They began to reexpand and did it rapidly, until in 1926 they had brought commodity-price levels back to what we call the average between 1921 and 1929. At that time, however, this man Kemmerer, this Dr. Kemmerer, this self-appointed guardian of the gold standard that tries to tell Congress what to do, was on the pay roll of the House of Morgan, went into South America and started that great drive down there to get all South American countries on to the gold standard, and also to float these bonds that were brought back here and sold to you, which today are not worth the paper they are written on. They also induced the British Empire to force India on to the gold standard. Then they began to contract this currency in the same way they did in 1920, but not so precipitately. What was the result?

By 1929 they had us back down to $35 per capita, or almost where we were in 1914. I can see little difference between that machinery and the machinery you are setting up here. I cannot conscientiously sit here without protesting that more safeguards be thrown around this legislation and that Congress and the President retain the power that was vested in us by the Constitution, and for which we cannot escape responsibility.

Instead of using the powers of the Federal Reserve for the benefit of all the American people, they financed all the speculation on the stock market, at a time when the people in the agricultural States were losing their lands or having their homes swept away for debts or sold to pay their taxes, because they could not get money to carry on. That was the most diabolical and damnable proceeding of them all, in my opinion. Are we going to say that although they have done this in the past, and that they were both Republicans and Democrats, are we going to say that we are going to find a group of men who will carry out this responsibility and do justice to the American people?

I, for one, am not willing, unless there are more safeguards thrown around this bill, to trust that responsibility to private individuals who are likely to feel that they owe nothing to the American people, unless I thought there was a chance to get these changes made in the Senate.

The Goldsborough amendment was defeated yesterday. It contained a portion of the safeguards I am asking for. I am appealing to you Members, if you sow the seeds of another panic you may expect it, like the dragon's teeth, to produce another crop of disaster that may be more bitter than the panic through which we have just passed.

I consider this one of the most important bills that has come before the American Congress, and as far as I can see I fear we have not in it met the responsibility that rests upon us as representatives of the American people. [Applause.]

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I would like to say to the gentleman that if the previous question can be voted down on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HOLLISTER], my amendment will be offered as an amendment to the motion to recommit. [Applause.]

Mr. RANKIN. I understand that, and I want to say to the gentleman from Maryland, with whom I have served in this House many years and for whom, of course, I have a high regard, that I have seen him do some valuable things in this House, but he never rendered greater service to this country than he is rendering today in making this fight. I, for one, shall go with him to vote down the previous question and then vote to amend the motion to recommit it and insert the Goldsborough amendment. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has again expired.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 304. Section 22 of the Banking Act of 1933, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following sentence: "Such additional liability shall cease on July 1, 1937, with respect to all shares issued by any association which shall be transacting the business of banking on July 1, 1937: Provided, That not less than 6 months prior to such date, such association shall have caused notice of such prospective termination of liability to be published in a newspaper published in the city, town, or county in which such association is located, and if no newspaper is published in such city, town, or county, then in a newspaper of general circulation therein. If the association fail to give such notice as and when above provided, a termination of such additional liability may thereafter be accomplished as of the date 6 months subsequent to publication, in the manner above provided."

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which is at the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment proposed by Mr. Brown of Michigan: Page 60, between lines 20 and 21, insert the following new section, and renumber the succeeding sections of the bill accordingly:

"SEC. 305. Paragraph (c) of section 5155 of the Revised Statutes, as amended [U. S. C., Supp. VII, title 12, sec. 36], is amended (1) by inserting after the first sentence thereof the following new sentence: 'In any State in which State banks are permitted by statute law to maintain branches within county or greater limits, if no bank is located and doing business in the place where the proposed agency is to be located, any national banking association situated in such State may, with the approval of the Comptroller of the Currency, establish and operate, without regard to the capital requirements of this section, a seasonal agency in any resort community within the limits of the county in which the main office of such association is located, for the purpose of receiving and paying out deposits, issuing and cashing checks and drafts, and doing business incident thereto: Provided, That any permit issued under this sentence shall be revoked upon the opening of a State or national bank in such community; and (2) by striking out the first word in the second sentence of such paragraph (c) and inserting in lieu thereof the following: 'Except as provided in the immediately preceding sentence, no.'"

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, there is no objection to the amendment on the part of the committee.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, because of the confusion and noise existing, I would like to ask the author of the amendment some questions.

As I gather from hearing the amendment read, it has for its purpose the establishment of branch banks, in effect, in the small towns in those States which permit branch banking.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I may say to the gentleman from Texas that after some considerable controversy in the committee and some discussion since that time I have decided not to press the branch-banking amendment at this time. I have been convinced by some members of the committee that it is too controversial a subject to bring up in connection with this bill and that we ought to legislate separately upon that subject.

Mr. McFARLANE. What are the limitations of this amendment?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. This amendment will provide for banking services in resort communities during the season when those communities are busy.

Mr. McFARLANE. Does it apply to resort communities only?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. It applies only to resort communities. It provides for seasonal agencies in resort communities for the purpose of receiving deposits and paying them out.

Mr. McFARLANE. Where those communities have no banking facilities?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Where there is no bank; and if a bank should be established in such a community after this agency has been established and commences operation, the Comptroller of the Currency must thereupon revoke the permit given for the establishment of this agency. Does that satisfy the gentleman?

Mr. McFARLANE. Yes.

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFARLANE. I yield.

Mr. HEALEY. The idea behind the amendment is to provide banking facilities to persons who are on vacation at resorts.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. It is for the establishment of agencies at resort communities for the resort season, nothing more.

Mr. McFARLANE. It applies, then, only to resort communities and does not apply to the country generally.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. The gentleman is right.

Mr. McFARLANE. Would it apply to State banks as well as to national banks?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. That, of course, would be a matter of State law. We can legislate only with respect to national and member banks.

Mr. McFARLANE. I understand, but I thought we could take care of the matter of regulations whether a State or national bank member of the Federal Reserve System was to be installed.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. State member banks of the Federal Reserve System would be covered by this amendment, but not nonmember State banks.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DOBBINS: On page 60, lines 10 to 20, after the figures "1937", in line 10, strike out the colon, insert a period, and strike out the remainder of the section.

Mr. DOBBINS. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to make the law with reference to the liability of stockholders in national banks uniform throughout the country. Evidently this was the thought in the mind of the committee when they brought in the amendment which they propose in this section, because at the present time, under the law as it stands, those stockholders who acquired their stock after the enactment of the banking law of 1933 are not doubly liable, whereas the old stockholders are. This amendment, as the committee brings it in, would require that a bank which wishes to have all of its stockholders treated alike must first publish notice in the newspaper. Six months after such notice relief from the double liability will inure to all of the bank's stockholders.

The objections to the plan are quite obvious. In the first place, it amounts to a delegation to each national bank of the power of choice as to what the law shall be with reference to that particular bank. This Congress itself should say whether or not stockholders in all national banks are to be held doubly liable to their depositors and to the creditors of the bank, and not leave it to each bank to say whether or not its old stockholders shall be thus liable. I insist that this would be an unlawful delegation of authority against which we have heard so much condemnation here on the floor of this House. But this delegation is not proposed to be made to another elected official of the Government; it is delegated to the banks themselves.

Here is what I foresee if this law should be adopted in its present form: A strong bank in a community, or a bank that professes to be strong, or one where the question of the liability of its stockholders is not of much concern, is going to advertise to prospective depositors in that city: "We spurn this offer from the Congress; we are going to continue to have our directors and our stockholders doubly liable to you. The Government has left it to us to say whether or not our stockholders shall be held for double liability. We are not going to take advantage of this opportunity the Government has given us; our stockholders stand back of this bank; they have confidence in it; and they will manifest that confidence by continuing to assume their double liability to our depositors."

The result, as to those other banks that wish to take advantage of this privilege, is going to be to their disadvantage, if a competing bank wishes to reject the offer to elect for themselves what the law shall be with reference to their banks. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Brown], in response to an interrogation on this question the other day, said he could not conceive that any bank would refuse to take advantage of this provision. If it will not, why not assume that, and make the law certain and uniform?

It was suggested that this may be necessary in order to make the law constitutional. It is ridiculous to say that constructive notice in a newspaper given 6 months before the event by a bank is any more notice to the depositors in that bank than notice given by an enactment of this Congress at this time. Why, men are hung under laws as to which they have only constructive notice; their personal rights and liberties are frequently taken away from them on constructive notice necessarily implied from the fact of the enactment of a statute by the Congress. Actual notice to depositors is not contemplated by the proposed act, as reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency. It provides for constructive notice only. Constructive notice depends entirely for its effectiveness upon the statute which authorizes it and can certainly add nothing to such effectiveness. When we know now what that notice is going to be and when it is to be given, why do we not give it definitely in this statute that we are now enacting?

To say that mere constructive notice in a newspaper, the form of which is not even prescribed in this bill, can have the effect of modifying a contract between the bank and its depositors, if an act of Congress could not have that effect, is ridiculous, it seems to me.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the purpose of section 304 of the bill before us for consideration is to clear up an uncertain condition that exists at the present time relative to the liability of stockholders in national banks. In 1933 we passed a banking act which provided in substance that the stockholders whose stock was issued after the effective date of that act, should not be liable to the depositors. This left a condition in which the owners of all stock issued prior to 1933 were responsible up to the amount of 100 percent of the investment in the stock. In this act we eliminate that double liability in what I consider the only constitutional way in which it can be eliminated.

The courts of most of the States of the Union have held that there is a contractual relationship between the depositor and the bank and we on the committee feel that we cannot change that contractual relationship between the depositor and the bank without giving notice to the depositor; therefore we have provided in the law that up to July of 1937 the double liability shall continue in all cases where it now exists, and that if 6 months prior to that time any bank shall give newspaper notice to the effect that double liability shall cease 6 months thereafter, such liability will then cease.

The purpose of the provision which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DOBBINS] would strike out is to give to all persons who have deposited their money in the bank the right to decide whether or not they will continue to leave their money in those banking institutions, and in my judgment, and in the judgment I think of most of the lawyers on the Banking and Currency Committee, such notice is necessary in order to enact a valid statute.

Mr. DONDERO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. DONDERO. How does the gentleman answer the question raised by the gentleman from Illinois as to a situation in a town where one bank chooses to do that very thing and the other bank does not choose to do it?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I think that is a question for each bank to decide for itself. If elimination of double liability is a bad thing the bank must, of course, suffer the consequences of its refusal to act.

Mr. DONDERO. What is the real objection to terminating the double liability by statute as to all banks where they come under this law as long as we have insurance on deposits?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I do not think that we can affect the contractual relationship as between the depositor and the bank by statute. I think it is necessary to give notice to the depositor so that he may terminate the relationship if he so desires.

Mr. DONDERO. Is not the passage of this law notice to the depositor?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I do not think it is.

Mr. DONDERO. I think it is.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. That is the reason why we have a constitutional provision against impairment of contract. Under the circumstances, we felt notice must be given. I may say to the gentleman, having some practical knowledge of the situation, I do not think any bank is going to fail to give that notice. I believe it will establish a uniform rule throughout the country.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DOBBINS].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sec. 305. Section 4 of the act entitled "An act to amend section 12B of the Federal Reserve Act so as to extend for 1 year the temporary plan for deposit insurance, and for other purposes", approved June 16, 1934 (48 Stat. 969), is amended to read as follows:

"Sec. 4. So much of section 31 of the Banking Act of 1933, as amended, as relates to stock ownership by directors, trustees, or members of similar governing bodies of any national banking association or of any State bank or trust company which is a member of the Federal Reserve System is hereby repealed."

Sec. 306. Effective January 1, 1936, section 32 of the Banking Act of 1933, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"Sec. 32. No officer, director, or employee of any corporation or unincorporated association, no partner or employee of any partnership, and no individual, primarily engaged in the issue, flotation, underwriting, public sale, or distribution, at wholesale or retail, or through syndicate participation, of stocks, bonds, or other similar securities, shall serve at the same time as an officer, director, or employee of any member bank except in limited classes of cases in which the Federal Reserve Board may allow such service by general regulations when in the judgment of the Federal Reserve Board it would not unduly influence the investment policies of such member bank or the advice it gives its customers regarding investments."

Sec. 307. (a) The second sentence of paragraph seventh of section 5136 of the Revised Statutes, as amended (U. S. C., Supp. VII, title 12, sec. 24), is amended to read as follows: "The business of dealing in securities and stock by the association shall be limited to purchasing and selling such securities and stock without recourse, solely upon the order, and for the account of, customers, and in no case for its own account, and the association shall not underwrite any issue of securities or stock: Provided, That the association may purchase for its own account investment securities under such limitations and restrictions as the Comptroller of the Currency may by regulation prescribe. In no event shall the total amount of the investment securities of any one obligor or maker, held by the association for its own account, exceed at any time 10 percent of its capital stock actually paid in and unimpaired and 10 percent of its unimpaired surplus fund, except that this limitation shall not require any association to dispose of any securities lawfully held by it on the date of enactment of the Banking Act of 1935."

(b) The fourth sentence of such paragraph seventh is amended to read as follows: "Except as hereinafter provided or otherwise permitted by law, nothing herein contained shall authorize the purchase by the association for its own account of any shares of stock of any corporation."

Sec. 308. Section 5138 of the Revised Statutes, as amended (U. S. C., Supp. VII, title 12, sec. 51), is amended by adding the following sentence at the end thereof: "No such association shall hereafter be authorized to commence the business of banking until it shall have a paid-in surplus equal to 20 percent of its capital: Provided, That the Comptroller of the Currency may waive this requirement as to a State bank converting into a national banking association."

Sec. 309. The last paragraph of section 5139 of the Revised Statutes, as amended (U. S. C., Supp. VII, title 12, sec. 52), is amended to read as follows:

"After the date of the enactment of the Banking Act of 1935 no certificate evidencing the stock of any such association shall bear any statement purporting to represent the stock of any other corporation, except a member bank or a corporation existing on such date engaged primarily in holding the bank premises of such association, nor shall the ownership, sale, or transfer of any certificate representing the stock of any such association be conditioned in any manner whatsoever upon the ownership, sale, or transfer of a certificate representing the stock of any other corporation, except a member bank or a corporation existing on such date engaged primarily in holding the bank premises of such association: Provided, That this section shall not operate to prevent the ownership, sale, or transfer of stock of any other corporation being conditioned upon the ownership, sale, or transfer of a certificate representing stock of a national banking association."

Sec. 310. (a) The first paragraph of section 5144 of the Revised Statutes, as amended (U. S. C., Supp. VII, title 12, sec. 61), is amended to read as follows:

"Sec. 5144. In all elections of directors each shareholder shall have the right to vote the number of shares owned by him for as many persons as there are directors to be elected, or to cumulate such shares and give one candidate as many votes as the number of directors multiplied by the number of his shares shall equal, or to distribute them on the same principle among as many candidates as he shall think fit; and in deciding all other questions at meetings of shareholders, each shareholder shall be entitled to one vote on each share of stock held by him; except that (1) this shall not be construed as limiting the voting rights of holders of preferred stock under the terms and provisions of articles of association, or amendments thereto, adopted pursuant to the provisions of section 302 (a) of the Emergency Banking Act of March 9, 1933, as amended, (2) in the election of directors, shares of its own stock held by a national bank as sole trustee, whether registered in its own name as such trustee or in the name of its nominee, shall not be voted by the registered owner unless under the terms of the trust the manner in which such shares shall be voted may be determined by a donor or beneficiary of the trust and unless such donor or beneficiary actually directs how such shares shall be voted, (3) shares of its own stock held by a national bank and one or more persons as trustees may be voted by such other person or persons, as trustees, in the same manner as if he or they were the sole trustee, and (4) shares controlled by any holding company affiliate of a national bank shall not be voted unless such holding-company affiliate shall have first obtained a voting permit as hereinafter provided, which permit is in force at the time such shares are voted, but such holding-company affiliate may, without obtaining such permit, vote in favor of placing the association in voluntary liquidation or taking any other action pertaining to the voluntary liquidation of such association. Shareholders may vote by proxies duly authorized in writing; but no officer, clerk, teller, or bookkeeper of such bank shall act as proxy; and no shareholder whose liability is past due and unpaid shall be allowed to vote. Whenever shares of stock cannot be voted by reason of being held by the bank as sole trustee, such shares shall be excluded in determining whether matters voted upon by the shareholders were adopted by the requisite percentage of shares."

(b) The first sentence of the third paragraph of such section 5144 is amended to read: "Any such holding-company affiliate may make application to the Federal Reserve Board for a voting permit entitling it to vote the stock controlled by it at any or all meetings of shareholders of such bank or authorizing the trustee or trustees holding the stock for its benefit or for the benefit of its shareholders so to vote the same."

Sec. 311. Section 5154 of the Revised Statutes, as amended (U. S. C., title 12, sec. 35), is amended by adding at the end thereof the following paragraph:

"The Comptroller of the Currency may, in his discretion and subject to such conditions as he may prescribe, permit such converting bank to retain and carry at a value determined by the Comptroller such of the assets of such converting bank as do not conform to the legal requirements relative to assets acquired and held by national banking associations."

Sec. 312. Section 5162 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 12, sec. 170) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following paragraph:

"The Comptroller of the Currency may designate one or more persons to countersign in his name and on his behalf such assignments or transfers of bonds as require his countersignature."

Sec. 313. Section 5197 of the Revised Statutes, as amended (U. S. C., Supp. VII, title 12, sec. 85), is amended by inserting after the second sentence thereof the following new sentence: "The maximum amount of interest or discount to be charged at a branch of an association located outside of the States of the United States and the District of Columbia shall be at the rate allowed by the laws of the country, territory, dependency, province, dominion, insular possession, or other political subdivision where the branch is located."

Sec. 314. Section 5199 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 12, sec. 60) is amended to read as follows:

"Sec. 5199. The directors of any association may, semiannually, declare a dividend of so much of the net profits of the association as they shall judge expedient; but each association shall, before the declaration of a dividend on its shares of common stock, carry not less than one-tenth part of its net profits of the preceding half year to its surplus fund until the same shall equal the amount of its common capital."

Sec. 315. Section 5209 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 12, sec. 592) is hereby amended by inserting after the words "known as the Federal Reserve Act", the words "or of any insured bank as defined in subsection (c) of section 12B of the Federal Reserve Act"; and by inserting after the words "such Federal Reserve bank or member bank", wherever they appear in such section, the words "or insured bank"; and by inserting after the words "or the Comptroller of the Currency" the words "or the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation."

Sec. 316. Section 5220 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 12, sec. 181), is amended by adding at the end thereof the following paragraph:

"The shareholders shall designate one or more persons to act as liquidating agent or committee, who shall conduct the liquidation in accordance with law and under the supervision of the board of directors, who shall require a suitable bond to be given by said agent or committee. The liquidating agent or committee shall render annual reports to the Comptroller of the Currency on the 31st day of December of each year showing the progress of said liquidation until the same is completed. The liquidating agent or committee shall also make an annual report to a meeting of the shareholders to be held on the date fixed in the articles of association for the annual meeting, at which meeting the shareholders may, if they see fit, by a vote representing a majority of the entire stock of the bank, remove the liquidating agent or committee and appoint one or more others in place thereof. A special meeting of the shareholders may be called at any time in the same manner as if the bank continued an active bank and at said meeting the shareholders may, by vote of the majority of the stock, remove the liquidating agent or committee. The Comptroller of the Currency is authorized to have an examination made at any time into the affairs of the liquidating bank until the claims of all creditors have been satisfied, and the expense of making such examinations shall be assessed against such bank in the same manner as in the case of examinations made pursuant to section 5240 of the Revised Statutes, as amended (U. S. C., title 12, secs. 484, 485; Supp. VII, title 12, secs. 481-483)."

Sec. 317. Section 5243 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 12, sec. 583) is amended by striking out the semicolon therein and all that precedes it and substituting the following:

"Sec. 5243. The use of the word 'national', the word 'Federal' or the words 'United States', separately, in any combination thereof, or in combination with other words or syllables, as part of the name or title used by any person, corporation, firm, partnership, business trust, association, or other business entity, doing the business of bankers, brokers, or trust or saving institutions is prohibited except where such institution is organized under the laws of the United States, or is otherwise permitted by the laws of the United States to use such name or title, or is lawfully using such name or title on the date when this section, as amended, takes effect;"

Sec. 318. (a) Section 5 of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended, is amended by striking out the last three sentences thereof and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "When a member bank reduces its capital stock or surplus it shall surrender a proportionate amount of its holdings in the capital stock of said Federal Reserve bank. Any member bank which holds capital stock of a Federal Reserve bank in excess of the amount required on the basis of 6 percent of its paid-up capital stock and surplus shall surrender such excess stock. When a member bank voluntarily liquidates it shall surrender all of its holdings of the capital stock of said Federal Reserve bank and be released from its stock subscription not previously called. In any such case the shares surrendered shall be canceled and the member bank shall receive in payment therefor, under regulations to be prescribed by the Federal Reserve Board, a sum equal to its cash-paid subscriptions on the shares surrendered and one-half of 1 percent a month from the period of the last dividend, not to exceed the book value thereof, less any liability of such member bank to the Federal Reserve bank."

(b) Section 6 of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended, is amended by striking out the last paragraph thereof.

SEC. 319. The fifth paragraph of section 9 of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following sentence: "Such reports of condition shall be in such form and shall contain such information as the Federal Reserve Board may require and shall be published by the reporting banks in such manner and in accordance with such regulations as the said Board may prescribe."

SEC. 320. (a) The first sentence of paragraph (m) of section 11 of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended, is amended by inserting before the period at the end thereof a colon and the following: "Provided, That with respect to loans represented by obligations in the form of notes secured by not less than a like amount of bonds or notes of the United States issued since April 24, 1917, certificates of indebtedness of the United States, or Treasury bills of the United States, such limitation of 10 percent on loans to any person shall not apply, but State member banks shall be subject to the same limitations and conditions as are applicable in the case of national banks under paragraph (8) of section 5200 of the Revised Statutes, as amended (U. S. C., Supp. VII, title 12, sec. 84)."

(b) Paragraph (8) of section 5200 of the Revised Statutes, as amended (U. S. C., Supp. VII, title 12, sec. 84), is amended by inserting after the comma following the words "certificates of indebtedness of the United States", the words "or Treasury bills of the United States."

SEC. 321. The third paragraph of section 13 of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended, is amended by changing the words "indorsed and otherwise secured to the satisfaction of the Federal Reserve bank" in that paragraph to read "indorsed or otherwise secured to the satisfaction of the Federal Reserve bank."

SEC. 322. Subsection (e) of section 13b of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended, is amended by striking out "upon the date this section takes effect", and inserting in lieu thereof "on and after June 19, 1934"; and by striking out "the par value of the holdings of each Federal Reserve bank of Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation stock", and inserting in lieu thereof "the amount paid by each Federal Reserve bank for stock of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation."

SEC. 323. (a) The first paragraph of section 19 of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 19. The Federal Reserve Board is authorized for the purposes of this section, to define the terms 'demand deposits', 'gross demand deposits', 'deposits payable on demand', 'time deposits', 'savings deposits', and 'trust funds', to determine what shall be deemed to be a payment of interest, and to prescribe such rules and regulations as it may deem necessary to effectuate the purposes of this section and prevent evasions thereof: Provided, That, within the meaning of the provisions of this section regarding the reserves required of member banks, the term 'time deposits' shall include 'savings deposits'."

(b) The tenth paragraph of such section 19 is amended to read as follows:

"In estimating the reserve balances required by this act, member banks may deduct from the amount of their gross demand deposits the amounts of balances due from other banks (except Federal Reserve banks and foreign banks) and cash items in process of collection payable immediately upon presentation in the United States, within the meaning of these terms as defined by the Federal Reserve Board."

(c) The last two paragraphs of such section 19 are amended to read as follows:

"No member bank shall, directly or indirectly, by any device whatsoever, pay any interest on any deposit which is payable on demand: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed as prohibiting the payment of interest in accordance with the terms of any certificate of deposit or other contract entered into in good faith which is in force on the date on which the bank becomes subject to the provisions of this paragraph; but no such certificate of deposit or other contract shall be renewed or extended unless it shall be modified to conform to this paragraph, and every member bank shall take such action as may be necessary to conform to this paragraph as soon as possible consistently with its contractual obligations: Provided further, That this paragraph shall not apply (1) to any deposit of such bank which is payable only at an office thereof located outside of the States of the United States and the District of Columbia; (2) to any deposit made by a mutual savings bank or a savings bank as defined in section 12B of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended; (3) to any deposit of public funds made by or on behalf of any State, county, school district, or other subdivision or municipality, or to any deposit of trust funds if the payment of interest with respect to such deposit of public funds or of trust funds is required by State law; or (4) to any deposit of funds by the United States, any Territory, District, or possession thereof (including the Philippine Islands), or any public instrumentality or agency of the foregoing, with respect to which interest is required by law to be paid."

"The Federal Reserve Board shall from time to time limit by regulation the rate of interest which may be paid by member banks on time and savings deposits; may classify time and savings deposits according to maturities, locations of banks, conditions respecting receipt, withdrawal, or repayment, or otherwise, as it may deem necessary in the public interest; and may prescribe different rates for deposits of different classes. No member bank shall pay any time deposit before its maturity except upon such conditions and in accordance with such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Federal Reserve Board, or waive any requirement of notice before payment of any savings deposit except as to all savings deposits having the same requirement: Provided, That the provisions of this paragraph shall not apply to any deposit which is payable only at an office of a member bank located outside of the States of the United States and the District of Columbia."

(d) Such section 19 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"Notwithstanding the provisions of the First Liberty Bond Act, as amended, the Second Liberty Bond Act, as amended, and the Third Liberty Bond Act, as amended, member banks shall be required to maintain the same reserves against deposits of public moneys by the United States as they are required by this section to maintain against other deposits."

SEC. 324. Section 21 of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following paragraph:

"Whenever member banks are required to obtain reports from affiliates, or whenever affiliates of member banks are required to submit to examination, the Federal Reserve Board or the Comptroller of the Currency, as the case may be, may waive such requirements with respect to any such report or examination of any affiliate if in the judgment of the said Board or Comptroller, respectively, such report or examination is not necessary to disclose fully the relations between such affiliate and such bank and the effect thereof upon the affairs of such bank."

SEC. 325. (a) Subsection (a) of section 22 of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended, is amended by inserting in the first paragraph thereof, after "No member bank", the following: "and no insured bank as defined in subsection (c) of section 12B of this act"; by inserting before the period at the end of the first sentence of such paragraph "or assistant examiner, who examines or has authority to examine such bank"; and by inserting after "any member bank" in the second paragraph thereof "or insured bank"; by inserting before the period at the end thereof "or Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation examiner"; and by adding at the end of such subsection a new paragraph, as follows:

"The provisions of this subsection shall apply to all public examiners and assistant examiners who examine member banks of the Federal Reserve System or insured banks, whether appointed by the Comptroller of the Currency, by the Federal Reserve Board, by a Federal Reserve agent, by a Federal Reserve bank, or by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, or appointed or elected under the laws of any State; but shall not apply to private examiners or assistant examiners employed only by a clearing-house association or by the directors of a bank."

(b) Subsection (b) of such section 22 is amended by inserting therein after "no national bank examiner" the following: "and no Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation examiner"; and by inserting after "member bank" the following: "or insured bank"; and by inserting after "from the Comptroller of the Currency" the following: "as to a national bank, the Federal Reserve Board as to a State member bank, or the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation as to any other insured bank."

(c) Subsection (g) of such section 22 is amended to read as follows:

"(g) No executive officer of any member bank shall borrow from or otherwise become indebted to any member bank of which he is an executive officer, and no member bank shall make any loan or extend credit in any other manner to any of its own executive officers: Provided, That loans made to any such officer prior to June 16, 1933, may be renewed or extended for periods expiring not more than 5 years from such date where the board of directors of the member bank shall have satisfied themselves that such extension or renewal is in the best interest of the bank and that the officer indebted has made reasonable effort to reduce his obligation, these findings to be evidenced by resolution of the board of directors spread upon the minute book of the bank: Provided further, That with the prior approval of a majority of the entire board of directors, any member bank may extend credit to any executive officer thereof, and such officer may become indebted thereto, in an amount not exceeding $2,500. If any executive officer of any member bank borrow from or if he be or become indebted to any bank other than a member bank of which he is an executive officer, he shall make a written report to the board of directors of the member bank of which he is an executive officer, stating the date and amount of such loan or indebtedness, the security therefor, and the purpose for which the proceeds have been or are to be used. Borrowing by, or loaning to, a partnership in which one or more executive officers of a member bank are partners having either individually or together a majority interest in said partnership, shall be considered within the prohibition of this subsection. Nothing contained in this subsection shall prohibit any executive officer of a member bank from endorsing or guaranteeing for the protection of such bank any loan or other asset which shall have been previously acquired by such bank in good faith or from incurring any indebtedness to such bank for the purpose of protecting such bank against loss or giving financial assistance to it. The Federal Reserve Board is authorized to define the term 'executive officer', to determine what shall be deemed to be a borrowing, indebtedness, loan, or extension of credit, for the purpose of this subsection, and to prescribe such rules and regulations as it may deem necessary to effectuate the provisions of this subsection in accordance with its purposes and to prevent evasions of such provisions. Any executive officer of a member bank accepting a loan or extension of credit which is in violation of the provisions of this subsection shall be subject to removal from office in the manner prescribed in section 30 of the Banking Act of 1933: Provided, That for each day that a loan or extension of credit made in violation of this subsection exists, it shall be deemed to be a continuation of such violation within the meaning of said section 30."

SEC. 326. The third paragraph of section 23A of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"For the purpose of this section, the term 'affiliate' shall include holding-company affiliates as well as other affiliates, and the provisions of this section shall not apply to any affiliate (1) engaged primarily in holding the bank premises of the member bank with which it is affiliated or in maintaining and operating properties acquired for banking purposes prior to the date this section, as amended, takes effect; (2) engaged solely in conducting a safe-deposit business or the business of an agricultural credit corporation or livestock loan company; (3) in the capital stock of which a national banking association is authorized to invest pursuant to section 25 of this act, as amended, or a subsidiary of such affiliate, all the stock of which (except qualifying shares of directors in an amount not to exceed 10 percent) is owned by such affiliate; (4) organized under section 25 (a) of this act, as amended, or a subsidiary of such affiliate, all the stock of which (except qualifying shares of directors in an amount not to exceed 10 percent) is owned by such affiliate; (5) engaged solely in holding obligations of the United States Government or obligations fully guaranteed by the United States Government as to principal and interest, the Federal intermediate credit banks, the Federal land banks, the Federal home-loan banks, or the Home Owners' Loan Corporation; (6) where the affiliate relationship has arisen out of a bona fide debt contracted prior to the date of the creation of such relationship; or (7) where the affiliate relationship exists by reason of the ownership or control of any voting shares thereof by a member bank as executor, administrator, trustee, receiver, agent, depository, or in any other fiduciary capacity, except where such shares are held for the benefit of all or a majority of the stockholders of such member bank; but as to any such affiliate, member banks shall continue to be subject to other provisions of law applicable to loans by such banks and investments by such banks in stocks, bonds, debentures, or other such obligations. The provisions of this section shall likewise not apply to indebtedness of any affiliate for unpaid balances due a bank on assets purchased from such bank or to loans secured by, extensions of credit against, or purchases under repurchase agreement of, obligations of the United States Government or obligations fully guaranteed by the United States Government as to principal and interest."

SEC. 327. Section 24 of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"Loans made to establish industrial or commercial businesses (a) which are in whole or in part discounted or purchased or loaned against as security by a Federal Reserve bank under the provisions of section 13b of this act, (b) for any part of which a commitment shall have been made by a Federal Reserve bank under the provisions of said section, (c) in the making of which a Federal Reserve bank participates under the provisions of said section, or (d) in which the Reconstruction Finance Corporation cooperates or purchases a participation under the provisions of section 5d of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, shall not be subject to the restrictions or limitations of this section upon loans secured by real estate."

SEC. 328. Effective January 1, 1936, the act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes", approved October 15, 1914 (38 Stat. 730), as amended, is further amended (1) by striking out section 8A thereof and (2) by substituting for the first three paragraphs of section 8 thereof the following:

"Sec. 8. No director, officer, or employee of any member bank of the Federal Reserve System shall be at the same time a private banker or a director, officer, or employee of any other bank, banking association, savings bank (other than a mutual savings bank), or trust company except in limited classes of cases in which the Federal Reserve Board may allow such service by general regulations when in the judgment of the Federal Reserve Board such classes of institutions are not in substantial competition."

SEC. 329. (a) Section 1 of the act of November 7, 1918, as amended (U. S. C., title 12, sec. 33; Supp. VII, title 12, sec. 33), is amended by striking out the second proviso down to and including the words "to be ascertained" and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "And provided further, That if such consolidation shall be voted for at said meetings by the necessary majorities of the shareholders of each of the associations proposing to consolidate, any shareholder of any of the associations so consolidated, who has voted against such consolidation at the meeting of the association of which he is a shareholder or has given notice in writing at or prior to such meeting to the presiding officer that he dissents from the plan of consolidation, shall be entitled to receive the value of the shares so held by him if and when said consolidation shall be approved by the Comptroller of the Currency, such value to be ascertained as of the date of the Comptroller's approval."

(b) Such section 1 is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following paragraphs:

"Publication of notice and notification by registered mail of the meeting provided for in the foregoing paragraph may be waived by unanimous action of the shareholders of the respective associations. Where a dissenting shareholder has given notice as above provided to the association of which he is a shareholder of his dissent from the plan of consolidation, and the directors thereof fail for more than 30 days thereafter to appoint an appraiser of the value of his shares, said shareholder may request the Comptroller of the Currency to appoint such appraiser to act on the appraisal committee for and on behalf of such association.

"If shares, when sold at public auction in accordance with this section, realize a price greater than their final appraised value, the excess in such sale price shall be paid to the shareholder. The consolidated association shall be liable for all liabilities of the respective consolidating associations. In the event one of the appraisers fails to agree with the others as to the value of said shares, then the valuation of the remaining appraisers shall govern."

SEC. 330. (a) Section 3 of the act of November 7, 1918, as amended (U. S. C., Supp. VII, title 12, sec. 34 (a)), is amended by striking out the first sentence following the proviso down to and including the words "to be ascertained" and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "If such consolidation shall be voted for at said meetings by the necessary majorities of the shareholders of the association and of the State or other bank proposing to consolidate, and thereafter the consolidation shall be approved by the Comptroller of the Currency, any shareholder of either the association or the State or other bank so consolidated, who has voted against such consolidation at the meeting of the association of which he is a stockholder, or has given notice in writing at or prior to such meeting to the presiding officer that he dissents from the plan of consolidation, shall be entitled to receive the value of the shares so held by him if and when said consolidation shall be approved by the Comptroller of the Currency, such value to be ascertained as of the date of the Comptroller's approval."

(b) Such section 3 is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following paragraph:

"Where a dissenting shareholder has given notice as provided in this section to the bank of which he is a shareholder of his dissent from the plan of consolidation, and the directors thereof fail for more than 30 days thereafter to appoint an appraiser of the value of his shares, said shareholder may request the Comptroller of the Currency to appoint such appraiser to act on the appraisal committee for and on behalf of such bank. In the event one of the appraisers fails to agree with the others as to the value of said shares, then the valuation of the remaining appraisers shall govern."

SEC. 331. The act entitled "An act to prohibit offering for sale as Federal farm-loan bonds any securities not issued under the terms of the Farm Loan Act, to limit the use of the words 'Federal', 'United States', or 'Reserve', or a combination of such words, to prohibit false advertising, and for other purposes", approved May 24, 1926 (U. S. C., Supp. VII, title 12, secs. 584-588), is amended by inserting in section 2 thereof, after "the words 'United States'", the following: "the words 'Deposit Insurance'; and by inserting in said section, after the words 'the laws of the United States', the following: "nor to any new bank organized by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation as provided in section 12B of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended,"; and by striking out the period at the end of section 4 and inserting the following: "or the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation."

SEC. 332. The act entitled "An act to provide punishment for certain offenses committed against banks organized or operating under laws of the United States or any member of the Federal Reserve System", approved May 18, 1934 (48 Stat. 783), is amended by striking out the period after "United States", in the first section thereof, and inserting the following: "and any insured bank as defined in subsection (c) of section 12B of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended."

SEC. 333. Section 5143 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, is hereby amended by striking out everything following the words "Comptroller of the Currency", where such words last appear in such section, and substituting the following: "and no shareholder shall be entitled to any distribution of cash or other assets by reason of any reduction of the common capital of any association unless such distribution shall have been approved by the Comptroller of the Currency and by the affirmative vote of at least two-thirds of the shares of each class of stock outstanding, voting as classes."

SEC. 334. Section 5139 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, is amended by adding at the end of the first paragraph the following new paragraph:

"Certificates hereafter issued representing shares of stock of the association shall state (1) the name and location of the association, (2) the name of the holder of record of the stock represented thereby, and (3) the number and class of shares which the certificate represents, and (4) if the association shall issue stock of more than one class, the respective rights, preferences, privileges, voting rights, powers, restrictions, limitations, and qualifications of each class of stock issued shall be stated in full or in summary upon the front or back of the certificates or shall be incorporated by a reference to the articles of association set forth on the front of the certificates. Every certificate shall be signed by the president and the cashier of the association, or by such other officers as the bylaws of the association shall provide, and shall be sealed with the seal of the association."

SEC. 335. The last sentence of section 301 of the Emergency Banking Act of March 9, 1933, as amended, is amended to read as follows: "No issue of preferred stock shall be valid until the par value of all stock so issued shall be paid in and notice thereof, duly acknowledged before a notary public by the president, vice president, or cashier of said association, has been transmitted to the Comptroller of the Currency and his certificate obtained specifying the amount of such issue of preferred stock and his approval thereof and that the amount has been duly paid in as a part of the capital of such association; which certificate shall be deemed to be conclusive evidence that such preferred stock has been duly and validly issued."

SEC. 336. The additional liability imposed by the act of April 26, 1922, as amended (D. C. Code, title 5, sec. 300; Supp. I, title 5, sec. 300a (b)), upon the shareholders of savings banks, savings companies, and banking institutions and the additional liability imposed by section 4 of the act of March 4, 1933 (D. C. Code, title 5, sec. 361), upon the shareholders of trust companies, shall cease to apply on July 1, 1937, with respect to such savings banks, savings companies, banking institutions, and trust companies which shall be transacting business on such date: Provided, That not less than 6 months prior to such date, the savings bank, savings company, banking institution, or trust company, desiring to take advantage hereof, shall have caused notice of such prospective termination of liability to be published in a newspaper published in the District of Columbia and having general circulation therein. In the event of failure to give such notice as and when above provided, a termination of such additional liability may thereafter be accomplished as of the date 6 months subsequent to publication in the manner above provided. Each such savings bank, savings company, banking institution, and trust company shall, before the declaration of a dividend on its shares of common stock, carry not less than one-tenth part of its net profits of the preceding half year to its surplus fund until the same shall equal the amount of its common stock.

SEC. 337. The second paragraph of section 9 of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended, is amended by striking out the period at the end thereof and adding thereto the following: "except that the approval of the Federal Reserve Board, instead of the Comptroller of the Currency, shall be obtained before any State member bank may hereafter establish any branch and before any State bank hereafter admitted to membership may retain any branch established after February 25, 1927, beyond the limits of the city, town, or village in which the parent bank is situated."

SEC. 338. Section 5234 of the Revised Statutes, as amended (U. S. C., title 12, sec. 192), is amended by striking out the period after the words "money so deposited" at the end of the next to the last sentence of such section and inserting in lieu of such period a colon and the following: "Provided, That no security in the form of deposit of United States bonds, or otherwise, shall be required in the case of such parts of the deposits as are insured under section 12B of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended."

SEC. 339. Section 61 of the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, as amended, is amended by inserting before the period at the end thereof a colon and the following: "Provided, That no security in form of a bond or otherwise shall be required in the case of such part of the deposits as are insured under section 12 (b) of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended."

SEC. 340. Section 8 of the act entitled "An act to establish postal savings depositories for depositing savings at interest with the security of the Government for repayment thereof, and for other purposes", approved June 25, 1910, as amended (U. S. C., title 39, sec. 758; Supp. VII, title 39, sec. 758), is amended by striking out the first sentence thereof and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "Subject to such regulations as the Postmaster General may prescribe, any depositor may withdraw the whole or any part of the funds deposited to his or her credit with the accrued interest after the expiration of 60 days after giving notice in writing of intention to withdraw, and any depositor may withdraw the whole or any part of such funds without such notice only on condition that there be deducted from the funds to his or her credit derived from interest an amount equivalent to interest for a period of not less than 3 months on the amount withdrawn. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, no interest shall be paid on any deposit in any postal savings depository office at a rate in excess of that which may lawfully be paid on savings deposits under regulations prescribed by the Federal Reserve Board pursuant to the Federal Reserve Act for member banks of the Federal Reserve System located in or nearest to the place where such depository office is situated. Postal savings depositories may deposit funds on time in member banks of the Federal Reserve System subject to the provisions of the Federal Reserve Act and the regulations of the Federal Reserve Board regarding the payment of time deposits and interest thereon."

Mr. STEAGALL (interrupting the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all of title III may be considered as read and printed in the RECORD in full, with the right to any Member to offer amendments to any section of title III.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. CROSS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Cross of Texas: On page 70, strike out all of section 318 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Sec. 319. Section 7 of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended, is amended by striking out said section and inserting in lieu thereof the following: 'The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to purchase the stock held by the member banks in the Federal Reserve banks at par, plus accrued dividends not in excess of 6 percent, and that after the passage of this act, and after all necessary expenses of a Federal Reserve bank shall have been paid or provided for, the net earnings shall be paid into the surplus fund of the Federal Reserve bank.

"Should a Federal Reserve bank be dissolved, or go into liquidation, any surplus remaining, after the payment of all debts or other requirements as hereinbefore provided shall be paid to and become the property of the United States, and shall in the discretion of the Secretary, be used to supplement the gold reserve held against outstanding United States notes, or shall be applied to the reduction of the outstanding bonded indebtedness of the United States under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

"Federal Reserve banks, including the capital stock and surplus therein and the income derived therefrom, shall be exempt from Federal, State, and local taxation, except taxes upon real estate."

"Sections 5 and 6 of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended, as well as every provision of law in conflict with this provision, is hereby expressly repealed."

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane.

Mr. CROSS of Texas. Will the gentleman withhold his point of order?

Mr. HOLLISTER. I withhold the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CROSS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of my amendment is to give the Treasury Department the authority to purchase the stock now owned by member banks in the Federal Reserve banks, and, Mr. Chairman, as I see it, the amendment is clearly pertinent to this section. In discussing the amendment I wish to bring out these facts.

The Congress, in setting up the Federal Reserve System, not being able itself to act directly in regulating the value of money, established this agency to function in its place.

If you will notice the report of the papers in New York and the banks of New York, you will observe that 19 banks Saturday had on deposit eight and one-quarter billion dollars. There is not over $5,000,000,000 of congressional money or legal-tender money in the Nation, and yet these 19 banks had on deposit eight and one-quarter billion dollars. This is bank money, this is phantom money, created out of debts, and this money affects the purchasing power of the dollar just as much as if it were legal-tender or congressional money.

The mints of this country and the Bureau of Engraving and Printing combined have put out about $5,500,000,000 of congressional money or legal-tender money. The banks, private institutions organized for a private gain, are so many mints or so many Bureaus of Engraving and Printing, creating money out of debt, inflating, and deflating, which has a direct effect upon the value of money that, under the Constitution, you are commanded to regulate the value of.

You have set up this agency of the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks to regulate this inflating and deflating of bank money which directly affects the value of congressional or legal-tender money. As it is, these institutions that create this bank money can inflate and inflate and then, overnight, deflate. They can cheapen the purchasing power of your dollar until it is one-half, and then they can turn around and by deflating they can multiply its purchasing power overnight. By such a process they bring about more injustice, do more robbing within the law and within a few months than all the crooks and robbers in this country can perpetrate in 100 years. [Applause.]

Mr. CROSS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HOLLISTER] desire to press his point of order?

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order and shall ask to be recognized in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. CROSS of Texas. This institution you have set up, the Federal Reserve System, ought to be purely a congressional institution, with no foreign entanglements entering into it. What are the facts? These 12 Federal Reserve banks that are to carry out your will, that are organized for no profit-making purposes, but to see that under the Constitution the people of this country are supplied with an adequate medium of exchange and that the value of money is regulated, have directors, two-thirds of whom in every one of these banks are put on there by the very institutions, these private institutions, organized and operating for profit, and these directors always fight to do that which the Federal Reserve System is or should be struggling not to do.

Let me read you some testimony of Governor Harrison, of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, in 1932, when he said:

It is almost inevitable that the Federal Reserve System or any central bank will always have to be going contrary to what the banks are doing. When they are inflating we have to put pressure on them, and when they are deflating we have to boost them up.

So you have here in your set-up two-thirds of all the directors from member banks who, when inflation is going on, with rising prices, are rampant to inflate further and further, and then when the turn comes, they become frightened, crazy to liquidate, and deflate and deflate and struggle further to deflate.

This is putting into your organization a bunch of directors that go contrary to what this organization of the Federal Reserve System should do. Your organization should be organized to prevent overinflation and to prevent overdeflation; in other words, stabilize and regulate the value of money.

There is no obligation upon the member banks to do these things. They have no command from the Constitution to stabilize or to regulate the value of money. You have that command and your agency through you should have that command, yet you bring into this set-up the very bunch of people you are supposed to try to regulate and you practically turn it over to them.

This amendment would correct this evil. This amendment would let the Federal Government buy this stock. Now, you pay them 6 percent upon the stock that they own in these banks.

Mr. CROSS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 more minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. CROSS of Texas. The testimony before the committee was that the Government could borrow the money for 2½ percent, and the Government would then own the stock and save the difference between the 2½ percent and 6 percent.

Why, the very people you regulate should be permitted to come in is more than I can understand. Is there opposition to this? Why, of course there is opposition to it—not by the great majority of our right-thinking, patriotic bankers but by that small group who have been manipulating the purchasing power of money in this country for years, and the members of this small group are the ones who are inspiring opposition to anything that will give the Congress the right or the power to regulate the value of money.

That group whose brain and vision are so blinded by Mammon that they cannot sense the chasm that yawns to engulf them—that group, unless they wake up, unless they cease to punish the people by poverty and distress—the time will come when the people, like some powerful, puissant beast, vexed to desperation, will turn in their desperation upon their tormentors; and when they do, woe be unto them and theirs. [Applause.]

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CROSS of Texas. I yield.

Mr. MAY. Does the gentleman's amendment provide that the capital stock in the Federal Reserve banks be turned into the Treasury?

Mr. CROSS of Texas. It provides that the capital stock shall be bought by the Treasury, owned by the Government, and that the profits—and it is not a profit organization—that the profits, over and above the running expenses, shall go into the surplus of the Federal banks, and that if and when they are dissolved all the money shall go to the Treasury.

Mr. PATMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CROSS of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. PATMAN. I have an amendment which I propose to offer to the gentleman's amendment which will cause the profits to go into the United States Treasury, and I hope the gentleman will not oppose it.

Mr. CROSS of Texas. Not a bit.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CROSS of Texas. I will yield.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. In case your amendment is adopted, the directors of the Federal Reserve banks will be the direct agents of the people and not of the banks.

Mr. CROSS of Texas. Absolutely. [Applause.]

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, the chief thing in the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Cross] is the requirement that the Government shall purchase at par the stock in the Federal banks, which is owned by member banks, irrespective of the advisability, which is an entirely different question, of having a Government-owned Federal Reserve System. Putting the Government into the central banking business is highly unwise. If anyone will compare the central banks of other countries, they will come to this conclusion.

This amendment is, on the face of the thing, entirely unconstitutional. There is after all, I suppose, something left of the Constitution. The member banks of the Federal Reserve System have invested their money under statutory authority and have acquired the stock in the Federal Reserve banks. This amendment provides that the Government shall acquire this stock at par.

The gentleman from Texas does not state in what way the member banks might be compelled to sell their stock at par if they thought it was better for them to retain it. I am unable to see, notwithstanding the blows that have been aimed at the Constitution—I am unable to see the slightest constitutionality in such a provision.

There is no way that I know of that anybody's property can be taken away without due process of law. I see no way in which member banks who own stock in the Federal Reserve System for which they have paid can be taken away without due process of law. If they think the stock is worth more than par, how can the Government compel them to sell it at par?

Mr. McFARLANE. Would there be any objection to the Government buying this stock should the holders of the stock want to sell it?

Mr. HOLLISTER. If the gentleman had listened to the early part of my statement, he would have heard me say that I think it is unwise that the Government should own the stock in the Federal Reserve banks, but there would be nothing constitutionally against having the Government acquire the stock in case the holders wanted to sell it. The way I understand the amendment is drafted, the Government is required to purchase it at par.

Mr. McFARLANE. But the amendment is permissive and not mandatory.

Mr. HOLLISTER. If that is so, the constitutional point that I raise is of no avail.

Mr. FORD of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLLISTER. Yes.

Mr. FORD of California. In case a Federal Reserve bank desires to liquidate or withdraw from the Federal Reserve System, does it get more than par for the stock that it surrenders?

Mr. HOLLISTER. No; because then it is performing a voluntary act in withdrawing, and it may get only that for its stock. That is quite a different matter as the gentleman must recognize.

Mr. McFARLANE. The amendment reads:

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to purchase the stock—

And so forth.

Mr. HOLLISTER. At par.

Mr. McFARLANE. It is not a mandatory requirement.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Then I misunderstand the gentleman's amendment. I shall merely say that we are faced with the question of the wisdom of the Government acquiring stock in the Federal Reserve banks. The constitutional question is not raised, if it is not mandatory.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment to the Cross amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. PATMAN to the Cross amendment: Strike out the words "surplus fund of the Federal Reserve bank" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "the Treasury of the United States."

Mr. CROSS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas accepts the amendment of his colleague [Mr. PATMAN]. Does the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] desire to debate the matter?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes; I would like to debate it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for 5 minutes.

EARNINGS OF FEDERAL RESERVE BANKS

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, the Cross amendment provides that after all necessary expenses have been paid or provided for, the net earnings shall be paid into the surplus fund of the Federal Reserve bank. My amendment provides that the surplus earnings shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States. It is true that if the amendment is adopted and we should eventually own this stock in the Federal Reserve bank, the earnings, of course, would belong to the Government, although in the surplus fund of the 12 Federal Reserve banks, but I would like to see these excess earnings go into the Treasury annually so as to have some restraint upon the expenditures of the Federal Reserve bank officials. As it is now they pay themselves salaries up to $30,000 and $40,000 and $50,000 a year and they justify it on the ground that the money comes out of the earnings of the bank and does not come from the Treasury, which is all right, but if you put the law back as it was in the beginning and fix the law so that the excess earnings shall go into the Treasury, then Congress will begin to ask why they are paying thirty and forty and fifty thousand dollars a year salaries from money that would otherwise go into the Treasury of the United States were these salaries not paid.

CROSS AMENDMENT FAVORED

I am very much in favor of the Cross amendment. There is a big principle involved in that. Here we have 12 Federal Reserve banks, and in each Federal Reserve district the member banks own that bank. The people do not own one dollar of the stock, the Government of the United States does not own one dollar of the stock. Each Federal Reserve bank is owned by private banking corporations. Therefore you have one supercorporation, the Federal Reserve bank in that district, which is owned by private corporations, and that Federal Reserve bank has the power to issue money on the faith and credit of the United States Government. The big question is, and it is a serious question, Do you believe that a corporation owned by private corporations should be allowed the privilege of issuing blanket mortgages on all the property of all the people of this Nation? That is the present system. They get all the earnings. They pay no taxes on any transaction, not a penny of taxes. They are exempt from every form of tax except, of course, the actual real-estate tax on the building which they own where the banking house is located. That is the only tax they pay.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes.

LXXIX—457

Mr. SNELL. I want to know if I am right in my understanding of the present law that after they have paid the stockholders 6 percent, the remainder goes into the Treasury?

JOKER AMENDMENT

Mr. PATMAN. No; that used to be the law, but there was what I call a joker amendment passed, and I am not criticizing the distinguished gentlemen on the Banking and Currency Committee when I say that; but I want to tell you the price you paid for Federal deposit insurance in connection with this joker.

A bill was brought in here, which was later enacted into law, to insure bank deposits. It contained a provision that all excess earnings of the Federal Reserve bank should go into the surplus of the banks. The law at that time required all excess earnings to be paid into the Treasury. I made a motion to strike out the provision that diverted these excess earnings from the Treasury to the banks, and the House almost unanimously struck it out; but when the bill went to conference at the other end of the Capitol a certain Member of that body insisted that it be put back or there would be no guarantee of deposits in any of the banks of this country, and he made our conferees agree to it or that body would kill the deposit guarantee law. Am I right or am I wrong, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] has expired.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. If I am wrong about that statement, I hope the Chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency will rise in his place and say that I am wrong. That is the price we paid to have Federal deposit insurance. The provision was put back. It is in the law, that not one penny of those profits will go to the Government. They go to the surplus fund of the Federal Reserve banks.

PERPETUAL CHARTERS

It will be a sad day in this country when the argument of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HOLLISTER] prevails that these banks have in effect a perpetual charter; that they have a right that you cannot divest them of; that they own the Federal Reserve banking system and you cannot acquire their stock unless they want to give it up and pay their price for it. The saddest day in the history of our country will be when that argument prevails. The charters of those Federal Reserve banks are worth billions of dollars. Why should they not be? They can issue money upon the credit of this Nation. They have subject to their disposal all the money that is printed by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing in Washington; at least, all they want.

Five thousand five hundred people work for them in this great city of Washington, at the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, printing money, night and day, when they need it. For what purpose? To be turned over to the Federal Reserve banks. What does the Government get for that money? Every bill is a blanket mortgage on all your property. The taxing power of the Government may be used to redeem it. It is written on the note that it is guaranteed by the United States. What does the Federal Reserve bank pay for that privilege? Not one penny on earth. It pays the actual cost of printing the currency, about 27 cents a thousand dollars, and no more. It pays not one penny of tax. It has control of and uses the seal of our Government. No person or corporation ever had a more valuable and profitable privilege.

Mr. REILLY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mr. REILLY. Could not Congress abolish the Federal Reserve System, and all the profits it ever made go to the Government?

Mr. PATMAN. Certainly; but the gentleman from Ohio contends it would be unconstitutional unless we pay the member banks their price for the stock they own; that we have given them such a grip upon the throats of the American people that it would be unconstitutional to do that without paying them their price for the stock they own.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Now that the gentleman has mentioned my name, I suppose he will yield to me?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HOLLISTER. I think the gentleman has misquoted me. What I said was that there was no way that I could see by which they could be required to sell their stock at any particular price.

Mr. PATMAN. That is the way I understood it.

Mr. HOLLISTER. But the gentleman has said that I said that gave them a perpetual franchise.

Mr. PATMAN. If you must pay their price, it is the same as that.

Mr. HOLLISTER. I did not say that at all.

Mr. PATMAN. Because their price will be awfully high.

Mr. HOLLISTER. But I assume it would be possible for Congress to abolish the Federal Reserve System.

Mr. PATMAN. And take all the profits over and above their stock.

Mr. HOLLISTER. And that would leave the banks with certain amounts which were due them. The Federal Reserve System would then cease to be in existence; but the gentleman has misquoted me and should say so.

Mr. PATMAN. I hope I have not misquoted the gentleman, but if I have I shall be very glad to correct it. The gentleman said we could not take this stock from the Federal Reserve banks unless we paid them their price.

Mr. HOLLISTER. I think that is correct; but the gentleman went further and said that I had stated there was a perpetual franchise in the Federal Reserve banks, and I made no such statement.

Mr. PATMAN. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon if he understood it that way. The gentleman did not understand it correctly, because I said it would amount to a perpetual charter. Any time you have to pay the other fellow's price you are not going to buy any such valuable franchise.

Mr. HOLLISTER. The gentleman is not very accurate in figuring amounts.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] has again expired.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Does not the gentleman think it is much more important that the Government exercise control over the regional banks than it is that they shall own the stock in the banks; and does not the gentleman think that the emphasis should be placed upon the control rather than the ownership, especially where the ownership does not carry with it control?

THE 12 FEDERAL RESERVE BANKS

Mr. PATMAN. I feel that in this case both ownership and control are necessary. This is a question of issuing and distributing currency. That is the question involved in these 12 Federal Reserve banks. It does not involve the 15,000 small banks of this Nation. It only involves the 12 Federal Reserve banks. Those 12 Federal Reserve banks are dispensing Government credit. They are dispensing Government money, that is guaranteed by the Government of the United States. The question is, Are you going to let a corporation that is owned by private corporations continue to exercise this function, which the Constitution says Congress shall exercise? The Constitution says that Congress shall coin money and regulate the value of it. Under the present law it is not doing it. It has farmed out, it has given as an absolute free gift the privilege to these 12 Federal Reserve banks to exercise that great function of government—to issue and distribute money. The question is, Do you want them to continue to enjoy that privilege, or are you willing to take it away from them and put it back under the supervision and control of Congress, where the Constitution of the United States says it really belongs?

BANKING SYSTEM REFERRED TO

Something was said a while ago about the little banks. I know that every bank is a great asset in a community. I would not do anything to destroy an individual bank, and what I say about banks and bankers is said with reference to a system, not particular banks or individuals.

PRIVILEGES OF NATIONAL BANKS

I desire to discuss the privileges given by our Government to national banks.

First. Every national bank has a charter that is worth a great deal; it has the Government of the United States to protect it from competition unless the competition is needed, in its immediate locality; that is a great privilege.

Second. For many years they have enjoyed the privilege of depositing Government bonds and getting new money in return for those bonds and continuing to draw interest on the bonds, which was a bonus amounting to a large sum annually.

Third. Such a bank is allowed to lend on an average of $10 for every $1 it has; in other words, collect interest on $10 for every $1 possessed; that is a great privilege, too.

Fourth. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation has purchased half the stock in most of the national banks of this country, and that portion of the capital stock held by the R. F. C. is tax exempt. This means that the banks have gotten a 50-percent tax reduction the last 2 or 3 years. They have not fared so badly.

Fifth. The Government guarantees the deposits of these banks.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 4 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. Who pays the premium for this insurance? The Government of the United States put up $300,000,000 of the premium, and the banks put up only $39,000,000 of it to guarantee the deposits in their own institutions.

Sixth. Double liability has been taken off their stockholders.

Seventh. They are no longer required to pay interest on demand deposits. In fact, it is a violation of the law.

While they are paying $39,000,000 into the Federal Deposit Insurance fund, they are being saved approximately $200,000,000 a year interest on demand deposits that they had been paying heretofore. This is of great benefit to them and saves them an enormous sum of money. They have their deposits guaranteed, a big saving on demand deposits, and have had their taxes reduced in some cases 50 percent.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Can the gentleman inform the Committee whether or not, as a result of the alleged benefits he has just recited, the net earnings of the banks have increased?

Mr. PATMAN. No; because they have ceased to do a banking business; they have gone into the Government bond brokerage business, and are discouraging accounts with service charges. They are rapidly becoming Government-bond brokers and commercial bookkeepers.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Could they help it?

Mr. PATMAN. They are just buying Government bonds, and will continue to as long as we put them out. Why should they want to risk commercial loans when they can buy bonds that are guaranteed by the Government and make their earnings in this way and on service charges?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Can they help buying the bonds?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes; they could put their money out into the channels of trade and commerce if they had the incentive.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Where?

Mr. PATMAN. Investigations have disclosed that the banks generally have refused to make loans even on good security. I realize that there is much to be said on the side of some of these banks in certain localities. We are encouraging them to make their investments in Government bonds by continuing to issue them.

MONEY-ISSUING PRIVILEGE

In concluding I want to ask the Members of this House to consider this: A great principle is involved here. Do you want this great privilege of issuing and distributing money farmed out to a corporation that is owned by private corporations, not one dollar of the stock owned by the Government, not one dollar of the stock owned by the people, corporations which pay no taxes, corporations which enjoy privileges no person enjoys? If you want to bring that power back to the Congress of the United States, the best and the longest step in that direction that you can take is to vote for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Cross].

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Cross].

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. As I understand the situation now, the House has adopted the Patman amendment but not the Cross amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. That is correct.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. The Cross amendment has not yet been disposed of.

The CHAIRMAN. That is correct.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I have listened in vain to the debate on this bill and have read in vain the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in an effort to find something of benefit to accrue through the enactment of this bill to the people who deposit the money in the banks of this country.

I agree with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] that this amendment goes a long way toward curing the evil of the international bankers' operations in this country. I expect, therefore, to support the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Cross]. I hope to have the opportunity of supporting the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH]. If these two amendments are adopted, this bill should receive the support of every liberal in this House. If these two amendments are voted down, the bill should receive the opposition of every friend of the people in this House.

I for one believe that the time has come when this Government should cease to throw its protecting arm about the racketeering bankers of this country. [Applause.] The time has come when this Congress should assert its constitutional prerogatives and take away once and for all time the unconstitutional and illegal privilege enjoyed by the bankers of this country of issuing the currency. [Applause.]

Whenever I think of these racketeering bankers I am reminded of one of them who was driving his big Rolls-Royce automobile out in the city streets. His chauffeur ran over a little boy and he dumped the boy into the automobile and rushed him to the hospital. The surgeon stated that the little boy would have to have a blood transfusion, so they took the blood from the banker and they transfused the banker's blood into the little boy. Inside of 30 minutes the little boy froze to death from the banker's blood. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, if you have a thief in the House, why keep him there longer? Throw him out, the same as we did with the Capones and the Dillingers. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HOLLISTER] stated that you could not take away the banker's property without due process of law. However, that is what the bankers did with the poor farmers. That is what they are doing today with the poor home owners. It took the Government of the United States, Mr. Chairman, to provide the necessary funds and to enact legislation to protect these home owners and farmers from further losing their homes and farms.

This bill does not inflate the currency nor expand the people's money to their needs. It does make it possible to jam down the throats of an unwilling people millions more of tax-exempt bonds. We are asked to enact more laws for bankers and are threatened at the same time with a veto for the Patman bonus bill, legislation designed not only for the benefit of the World War veterans but for the masses of our people as well, as it places more than $2,000,000,000 of new currency in circulation and thereby reduces credit inflation or bond inflation to that same extent.

Why ask us to pass additional legislation to help the bankers and then expect us to oppose legislation that will help the soldier, the farmer, the war veteran, and the small-business man. I do not propose to make fish of one and fowl of another. I do not propose to vote for measures that will produce meat for bankers and will act as poison to the great numbers of our people who want more money and demand more money.

What did the boasted Federal Reserve System do for these millions of our people who are in need today? What did the Federal Reserve System do for them during the panic and Hoover depression? The Federal Reserve Board deliberately wrecked the welfare of American agriculture. They started to deflate agriculture and continued that drastic inflation policy for 9 long years until in 1929 a bankrupted agrarian population was the forerunner to the business panic and depression starting in 1929, aided and abetted by the supercredit inflation permitted, sanctioned, and condoned by this same Federal Reserve Board. When they expanded the currency they took enormous profits. When they contracted the credit for the farmer and wage worker and small business man they took hundreds of thousands of farms and homes.

Their activities, their speculations, and their atrocities are played like the old army game—heads, I win; tails, you lose. They made billions of dollars going up on their orgy of unwarranted credit inflation. They made billions of dollars on their way down in their unjustified saturnalia of credit contraction. The farmer, the small business man, the independent manufacturer, and producer—they lost. The private bankers, owners of the Federal Reserve System, made their millions.

This bill still permits the bankers to control the money and fiscal policies of the United States. We are told that if this bill is enacted the Government will control the currency policies. That might be true. That is exactly what President Hoover did during his administration. The Federal Reserve banks at his behest and urge approved a terrific spree of speculation, gambling, and pyramiding credit. This was known as the "Hoover bull market", which finally pulled the whole Nation down in the ensuing ruins.

Some say that the present banking machinery is all right if only the present machinists who are operating the machinery will do a better job. I say the machinery is all wrong. This bill does not change that machinery. It only perpetuates the illicit banking machinery which we have found to be the most expensive machinery in the world.

Mr. Chairman, I am becoming a little tired of voting for legislation that is solely for the benefit of the banking fraternity of this country. If the Goldsborough amendment is adopted, I shall vote for the bill. If the Patman-Cross amendment that proposes to buy the stock in the Federal Reserve banks owned by private bankers by the Government is adopted, I will support this bill. If these two amendments written in the interest of all the people instead of the benefit of the overprivileged bankers are not adopted, I will vote against the bill.

I hear Democratic Members say that if these two amendments are defeated they will hold their noses and vote for the bill anyway. I do not propose to do any such thing. It is high time that this House of Representatives at least, who are elected by the people for 2-year terms, who are responsible and answerable every 2 years to their constituents, followed the wishes of the majority of those constituents and supported legislation not to further enhance these special favors enjoyed by the greedy and selfish bankers but to call a halt once and for all upon their nefarious practices.

This bill distinctly does not do. Its passage only means a continuation of that system which has brought the Nation to its knees. It is that system which I condemn and deplore and which I shall vote against unless the Goldsborough and the Patman-Cross amendments are adopted.

I do not mean to say that banking is all rotten nor bankers all bad. We have some good bankers as well as lots of bad bankers. We even have honest, well-meaning bankers in Congress. It is the system under which they operate that I condemn and deplore. It was that system which caused the banks to collapse and fall flat on their backs when Herbert C. Hoover walked out as the thirty-first President of the United States of America. It was that system which made it necessary for Franklin D. Roosevelt to close all the banks—his first official act upon assuming office, to sort out the wheat from the chaff and to keep the big racketeer bankers from stealing all the depositors' money. It was that system which impelled the Seventy-third Congress to guarantee bank deposits without which there would not have been a single solvent bank open and doing business today. It was that system which enabled them to show a book deposit of $44,000,000,000 when the crash came when only 5½ billion dollars of money actually was in existence—a system that permitted them to indicate a book deposit of $59,000,000,000 at the peak of the highest tide of credit inflation the country has ever known, the so-called "Hoover bull market" which collapsed and fell with the thunderous shock that rocked the universe in October 1929. That is the system which robbed widows and orphans of their all, which stole the home of the unemployed workman, filched from the farmer his homestead that had taken him a lifetime to build, and set small business men back 40 years to the zero point from which he started.

What we should do with the banking, financial, currency, and credit structure of the country instead of further permitting the bankers, the money lenders, and the Shylocks to exploit the people to the tune of $10,000,000,000 per year—that is the amount of interest that is collected annually—instead of further allowing them to work their racket of illegally and unconstitutionally issuing currency and charging interest on $10 whereas actually they own only $1, instead of collecting 50 to 60 percent interest on every dollar that they actually own, instead of receiving money from the Government and then hoarding it instead of loaning it, we should tear off these shackles and barriers to progress and prosperity and operate the banks, issue the currency, and allot the credit for the rights and benefits of all the people instead of the favored few.

One of the greatest rackets in the country today is the unconstitutional National Bank Act passed during the Civil War over the resistance of President Lincoln. Lincoln's Secretary of the Treasury, Salmon P. Chase, who afterward became a member of the United States Supreme Court, showed extreme penitence for his part in jamming it through a docile and bewildered Congress when it was too late.

This Congress should repeal it. Better still, it should be challenged in the courts. I do not doubt that the Supreme Court would throw it out on stronger grounds than they threw out the section of the N. R. A. Act dealing with "hot-oil" shipments, since it is patently more unconstitutional than the 1933 measure.

Under the National Bank Act Congress abrogates its constitutional powers to coin money and regulate its value. The amazing thing about it is that our Supreme Court has just said Congress cannot check its constitutional rights to another branch of government.

How, then, could the principle of the Congress giving its power to private bankers be sustained? The answer is that it cannot.

Mr. Chairman, if you want to prove the fallacy of so-called "inflation hurting the common people", just turn to the market reports in the newspapers of today. I find in the Washington Post, under date of May 8, the following:

A dispatch from New York says stocks today indulged in a rousing surge that was surprising even to the bulls. Gains of 1 to 4 percent were chalked up throughout the list. The Associated Press reports a "brisk advance features the curb market." It states the curb market moved spiritedly upward today to the tune of heavy demand in virtually all categories.

Some of the larger life insurance companies record new highs. On May 8 from Minneapolis press reports say "peak insurance sales in 50 years' business" and that the largest April sales of new life insurance in its history are reported by Northwestern National Life Insurance Co. of Minneapolis with a total of $6,002,373 for the month. This is an increase of 15 percent over April 1934 and of 60 percent over the same month of 1933. The best previous April in the company's 50 years of business was in 1930, with a total of $5,721,670.

From the sun-kissed shores of San Francisco comes the following: "Coast stocks soar in surge of buying. Speculative fever broke out on the stock exchange here today, apparently inspired by the passage of the Patman bonus bill." From New York again comes a report from one of the large chain-store outfits of the country. J. C. Penney Co. announces that their sales were up 13.7 percent in April. They go on to say that the sales of J. C. Penney Co. during April totaled $17,596,845, compared with $15,475,133 in the same month last year, an increase of 13.71 percent. Sales for the first 4 months were $58,073,173, compared with $56,141,346 in the same period in 1934, an increase of 3.44 percent. Sales of Lerner Stores Corporation in April amounted to $2,902,327, compared with $2,225,702 in the same month last year.

Back to the Chicago Board of Trade and grain markets we find that the renewal of inflation talk, coupled with reported moves toward possible overriding of a Presidential veto of the Patman bonus bill, accompanied higher grain prices today. It was asserted that submitting the bonus bill to President Roosevelt would be delayed until friends of the measure had mustered full strength in the Senate and would be able perhaps to nullify an expressed intention on his part to exercise veto power. Another bullish factor was evidence of growing belief that there would be a notable shortage of domestic hard winter wheat production this season. Wheat closed firm, ½ to 1 cent above yesterday's finish, July 95½ to 95¾; corn, ½ off to ¾ up, July 81¾ to 87½; oats, ½ to ¾ advance; and provisions unchanged to a rise of 7 cents. Corn and oats prices averaged higher, responsive to tightening up of premiums for Chicago May delivery of corn. Provisions reflected grain rallies, as well as strength shown by the cottonseed-oil market.

Is it not apparent to any sound-minded, clear-thinking man or woman that if these forecasts of so-called "inflation measures", if all that inflationary talk has such stimulating and buoyant effects upon selling markets of commodities, stocks, and securities, that the enactment into law of real inflationary legislation, such as the Patman bill, the Frazier-Lemke refinance bill, and others, would not have even more lasting and beneficial effects as to commodity prices? Is that not what we want? Is that not what we have been fighting for—to get back to the level of 1926, as we proposed to do under the Goldsborough amendment? Why, of course, it is. But, instead of letting this distinct trend for the better continue, we attempt to throttle and strangle it by enacting this legislation and by opposing the Patman bonus bill.

Is the banking system sound today? Only as the United States Government makes it sound. Had it not been for Government guaranty of deposits the banks would be the most unsound financial institutions in our midst today. If it is a sound credit system for the farmer it is because of the Government's activities to provide funds by separate lending agencies known as "the Farm Credit Administration." If the credit system today is sound for owners of homes, then it is only sound through Government activity in legislating and authorizing appropriations of nearly $5,000,000,000 to be loaned to distressed home owners under the provisions of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation—a Government institution created and owned by all the people instead of a few selfish, greedy bankers.

Why not go all the way? Why must the Government bear the load of refinancing homes and farms and then permit these pirates of high finance—namely, Federal Reserve bankers, to continue as overlords of the money and currency, to rob and plunder the taxpayers and to still enjoy the illegitimate privilege of issuing currency, regulating the value thereof, and charging interest for $500,000 when they actually own only $50,000 of currency. This bill does not stop these vicious and unforgivable practices; therefore, I cannot support the bill. I will support—today, tomorrow, or at any time in the future—a real, honest bill that proposes to nationalize the banks, take them all over, and destroy once and forever the throttling of the racketeering bankers.

Whenever I talk about inflation of the currency the bankers, the capitalists, the rich, and the near-rich commence to yell, "fiat money", greenback money, printing-press money. The money lenders who have the pawnshop complex have their intellectual facilities wholly concentrated on interest; naturally they, too, oppose inflation.

Inflation to the average banker is like a pound of putty in the stomach of a miserable dyspeptic. The vast numbers of people who can be affected favorably by currency inflation know that a piece of green paper money has the same purchasing power as that of a yellow bond with gold back of it. Theoretically the yellow paper may be worth more than the green paper, but in practice it does not work out that way. The green paper money of the United States Government is worth just as much and will buy just as much as the yellow bonds of the United States Government.

Since President Roosevelt so nobly and heroically took us off the gold standard, yellow bond paper covers no more ground today than green currency paper. Both are guaranteed by the Government and have the Government's promise to pay that makes them valuable. The property, the incomes, the earnings of all the people are back of United States currency whether it be yellow or green paper.

When we try to inflate or expand the currency the bankers and other calamity howlers hold up the so-called "terrible example" of Germany. Germany and other foreign nations inflated their currency because their resources and credit were exhausted. They wiped the slate clean, however, repudiating debts, and today are in an enviable position economically and financially speaking.

Call it "fiat money", "greenbackism", if you will. The indisputable fact remains, nevertheless, that all our currency, even though it be Federal Reserve bank notes, is not worth a damn without the guaranty and promise to pay of the Government of the United States. National-bank notes signed by John D. Rockefeller or Andy W. Mellon are not worth a cuss unless countersigned by the Government of the United States. The Government money is better money than that of all the millionaires of this country or of the world, because all the people of the United States and their holdings and their properties and their wealth stand squarely back of that Government money.

Proponents of this bill assert that the Federal Reserve System functioned well during the World War. Why not? The country was prosperous; commodity prices were high; the majority of our people had money; they had property; they had incomes. The depression, if not actually induced, was at least aggravated by the credit inflation. When commodity prices fell, farm values toppled; then the System was powerless to stop the flood of deflation and depression.

If we are to have a financial dictatorship, then let us at the same time take over the banks and make them function in the interest of all the people.

Proponents of this bill further state that the credit system is a "delicate system." That has not been my experience, I beg to observe. When the banks failed to function, instead of being delicate they were hard-boiled and foreclosed with ruthless abandon upon the debtor classes.

Others state that the banks are full of money; that they are bursting with money; that their walls are about to fall down because of too much money. If that be true, then why do they not lend that money to those who are in need of it? The fact is banks have outlived their day of usefulness unless guaranteed by the Government which they exploit. Members of the Banking and Currency Committee during this debate have stated that the banking system will never be strong and efficient with half the banks in and half the banks out in the depository-insurance feature. Yet in this very bill you permit nearly half of them to remain out of the Federal Reserve System, and you permit approximately 6,000 out of the 15,000 banks in operation to be owned by the Government. Then why not let the Government take them all over and receive the profits recorded instead of the private bankers?

I state without fear of successful contradiction that the system which we condemn stands indicted and convicted in the minds of men and women. Instead of driving the money changers from the temple, we actually intend to further protect them, when they should have been indicted on the following misdeeds:

First. They permitted war loans of billions of dollars, all for profit and gain for themselves.

Second. They caused the wrecking of thousands of small banks by loading these banks up with rotten securities and stocks.

Third. They steadfastly refused to supply the people with more and adequate currency to properly take care of their own currency needs.

Fourth. By expanding credit subject to their whims and desires they have taken billions of dollars of profits away from the people.

Fifth. By contracting credit once available to farmers, small business men, producers, and home owners, they have taken thousands of homes and farms by the uncalled-for and unjustified forced sales of these properties.

Sixth. They have exploited, plundered, and ruined hundreds of smaller banks.

Seventh. They have concentrated and centralized billions of dollars of ill-gotten wealth in the hands of the few by their promotion of trusts, monopolies, and mergers of big business.

Eighth. They promulgated, sponsored, and perpetuated a Government of the rich, for the rich, and by the rich.

Immediate expansion of the currency is necessary. All economists and even the thick-headed professors of the "brain trust" admit that most of our economic troubles are caused by what they call a "money famine."

How, then, can this money famine be dissolved except by the Government issuing more currency or the bankers issuing more currency? If we should give the national bankers the special privilege of issuing five billions in new currency instead of permitting Congress to go back to the Constitution and issue it in the name of the Federal Government, we would have no hue and cry against currency expansion.

We have to expand the currency. We must call in some of those tax-exempt bonds and pay them off before they are repudiated. Instead of financing relief work with bond issues, which only relieves the bankers in the long run, we must do that with non-interest-bearing Treasury certificates.

With the supply of gold and silver bullion now in the vaults of the Treasury Department we could justify an additional issue of $20,000,000,000 in currency and put it in circulation.

Let us judge the merits of inflation by the process of elimination. Whom will it hurt? Will it hurt the farmer, who is down and out and has lost nearly $40,000,000,000 in the diminished value of his properties?

Will new currency hurt the soldier, who now, in most cases, is without property, without income, and without a job?

It cannot hurt him, but, on the other hand, if we pass the Patman adjusted-compensation measure its benefits will be observed not only in the ex-soldiers' own homes but in every avenue of trade and in every line of commerce that comes in contact with the World War veteran—the butcher, the baker, and the candlestick maker.

The third distressed class is the wage earners who are receiving barely enough to eke out existences. Inflation cannot hurt them. They have everything to gain and nothing to lose by it.

The small business man and the independent producer constitute the fourth class of people who are in distress. Will inflation hurt them? No. On the other hand, it will assist them in every way possible.

It will mean that the independent factories which are now flat on their backs because of the lack of financing can open up once more and put millions of our idle to work. These industries cannot now borrow money from the bankers. They cannot borrow money from the Government agencies, as was so amply demonstrated when we reauthorized the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to continue in existence.

Under the National Bank Act, and now under this act, Congress abrogates its constitutional powers to coin money and regulate its value. The amazing thing about it is that our Supreme Court has just said Congress cannot check its constitutional rights to another branch of the Government.

How, then, could the principle of the Congress giving its power to private bankers be sustained? The answer is that it cannot.

Under this special privilege national bankers, by a process thoroughly explained in the July 1934 issue of Plain Talk, make a profit of from 9,583 to 13,333 percent on their money. This profit comes out of the pockets of the American taxpayers.

This racket makes the activities of the Capones and Dillingers, and even of the Dawses and Insulls and Mitchells, pale into insignificance.

This banking bill, H. R. 7617, does not abolish nor eliminate the racket of the national bankers. If it in the slightest measure or manner corrected that iniquitous evil, then I would gladly support the bill; but the leopard does not change his spots, the skunk never loses his smell, so why dress up these bank racketeers in a new suit of clothes, wrap around them a protecting cloak of additional Government protection and security which means nothing more nor less than more exploitation and plundering of the people's earnings, their property, their homes, and their farms?

I for one propose to say and have it known by the whole world that my efforts are not directed to promoting the interests and aims of bankers, but to protect the welfare of the millions of common people who have suffered long and keenly by the milking and duping of the Federal Reserve Banking System and the vested interests which they serve. [Applause.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I do not expect to match either in eloquence or knowledge the gentleman who has just preceded me on this question.

Let us look at this thing in a sensible way. What does it mean? The adoption of this amendment would simply mean the destruction of the Federal Reserve System. There would not be any such thing as a national banking system at all if this amendment is adopted. There is not any question about that proposition. We have the proposal here that the Government purchase the stock of the member banks in the System. If that is done, it is the end of our banking system. We have not anything left. Where would the members be if you bought their stock? Where would you have any members in the Federal Reserve System if you bought the stock that is now owned by them? There is absolutely no machinery set up, and all you could do under the law would be to annul their charters and reorganize them.

Mr. Chairman, the argument has been made here that you cannot compel these member banks to sell their stock. You cannot do that. You cannot make them sell their stock because they have bought the stock and they have paid their money. There is not any doubt about that proposition; still it is proposed here to buy stock in the banks.

Not only that, but may I say, in my judgment, if that could be done, it is not a desirable thing to do. Of course, it cannot be done. There are those who believe that there is too much power placed in the Board under the additional powers given here. This amendment will put the Board not only in control of the monetary policy and the credit administration of this country—and I am in favor of that—but this amendment will, in addition to that, absolutely start them in the banking business for the Government of the United States. This is an entirely different proposition, and I think everybody recognizes that fact.

It is one thing for the Government to control the monetary system and the credit policy of the country and another thing entirely for the Government to go into the details of banking. If there is objection to this proposition on the ground that it places too much power in the Federal Reserve Board, where are we going to be if we buy out the Federal Reserve System and place the Board directly in charge, not only of the credit policy and expansion and contraction of the currency, as well as the credit policy of the country, but in the business of making loans to the various banks and individuals throughout the country? In that event we have absolutely abandoned the principle of keeping the Government out of business, and there is no more reason why the Government should be in the banking business than in the railroad business, in the manufacturing business, or in any other enterprise. [Applause.]

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I think the Members of the House ought to have some idea of the origin of the Federal Reserve System in considering this amendment. When the Federal Reserve System was established the law provided that its stock might be allotted to the Government of the United States. The idea of the Congress when this System was set up was that the national banks and such State banks as desired to join the System would provide a portion of the capital of the institution. It was also provided in the law that the Government itself might subscribe to the stock. The section of the law relative thereto is very brief. It is still the law of this land and has not been repealed. It reads as follows:

Stock of a Federal Reserve bank allotted to the United States shall be held by the Secretary of the Treasury and disposed of for the benefit of the United States in such manner, at such time, and at such prices, not less than par, as the Secretary of the Treasury shall determine (sec. 284, title 12, U. S. C.).

There is nothing in the law at the present time, and I have examined it rather carefully, that would prevent an increase in the stock of Federal Reserve banks and the allotment of that increase to the Treasury of the United States today. There is nothing to prevent that at the present time.

The amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Cross], as has been brought out by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. McFARLANE] in connection with the questions he asked of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HOLLISTER], does not in any way compel the banks of the United States to sell their stock. If the United States Treasury or the Government, because the Treasury is the Government, desires to acquire stock in Federal Reserve banks they may do so by the process of adding to the total capital stock of those institutions by action of the Federal Reserve Board and then subscribing for the stock. If we adopt the Cross amendment we shall do nothing but authorize the Treasury to buy stock in the Federal Reserve banks.

They have this right now. They can under the law now acquire stock in the Federal Reserve banks. I do not believe it is necessary to adopt the Cross amendment in order to accomplish this result. I say it will be a futile and a useless thing.

Let me call your attention to the fact that there is nothing in the amendment which requires the banks to sell their stock, and if such a provision were in the Cross amendment, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HOLLISTER], who is a thorough constitutional lawyer, has told you, it certainly would be unenforceable under the Constitution of the United States, because you cannot compel a private individual or a corporation to sell his stock or his property.

As the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WILLIAMS] well said, if you want to abolish the Federal Reserve System as it exists today, there is a way you can do it. Revoke the charters by law.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 3 more minutes.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, I hope the gentleman will answer one question. The gentleman, I believe, stated there is nothing to prevent the Government from acquiring member-bank stock at this time. The gentleman certainly does not refer to the $146,000,000 outstanding now.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. They could not acquire that stock.

Mr. PATMAN. The gentleman is exactly right. This amendment applies to the $146,000,000 outstanding now, and this amendment would be required before the Government could acquire that stock.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Does the gentleman believe that under this amendment any bank in the country could be compelled to divest itself of its Federal Reserve stock?

Mr. PATMAN. Under this amendment, it could not, but this is a good, long step in the right direction.

Mr. FIESINGER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman what will happen now if we vote on the Cross amendment? The Cross amendment includes the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN], which we have adopted.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. FIESINGER. How can we get a separate vote on the Patman amendment?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. We have already taken a vote on the Patman amendment to the Cross amendment.

Mr. FIESINGER. If we vote down the Cross amendment now, that will also vote down the Patman amendment.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. That is right; but if you want a vote on the Patman amendment, it could be obtained by reoffering it if the Cross amendment is rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. May I ask what return the member banks receive as owners of this stock?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I am pleased the gentleman has asked that question, and I think the committee ought to hear this. All that the member banks in the Federal Reserve System have ever received is 6 percent interest on their stock, and the amount of stock that any bank can hold in the Federal Reserve System is illustrated by the fact that a bank with $100,000 capital and surplus has $6,000 stock, in round figures, in the Federal Reserve System, which means a return to them of $360 per year.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a correction? As the gentleman knows, they only paid in half their capital stock, or $180 a year; therefore, they will get 6 percent on $3,000.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Yes; and they get 6 percent only on the one-half that they paid in, which in the case given is on $3,000 paid in.

Mr. FIESINGER. Does the gentleman agree with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] that the Patman amendment was in the original Federal Reserve Act?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. No; not the Patman amendment. In the original Federal Reserve Act there was a provision which authorized the Government to purchase stock in the Federal Reserve banks. The Federal Reserve Board could allot such portion of the stock to them as they desired.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAWFORD. What steps could we take to reduce the return on the stock which they now hold?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. That could be done by statute law, reducing the amount from 6 percent to 4 percent or 3 percent, or any figure that may be provided by law.

Mr. CRAWFORD. If it were reduced to 3 or 4 percent, would not the banks very likely desire to sell the stock?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I do not think so, but possibly it could be done in that way.

I desire to say in line with the assertion made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], and also calling attention to the statement of the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. PIERCE] made last Saturday upon this floor, it is a fact that at the present time the bankers of the country have been tremendous losers and not gainers by the fact they have held bank stock during the past 5 years. It seems to me we are in a condition of mind at the present time where we think that these men have reaped an enormous profit from the people of the country, which is not the fact. Bank deposits were an excellent investment, but bank stock was generally a burden.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in favor of the Cross amendment as amended by the Patman amendment.

I believe this amendment goes a long way in the right direction in permitting the Government to properly control the credit of the Government of the United States, and it permits the Congress to carry into effect article I of section 8 of the Constitution, which directs the Congress to assume its constitutional duties and coin money and regulate its value.

The amendment does no more or less than this. This is a directory amendment. There is nothing mandatory about it. It simply authorizes the Federal Reserve to buy this $146,000,000 of outstanding stock that is now owned by the Federal Reserve member banks all over the Nation. Why should we not own this stock, so that we can properly control our monetary system as we should control it?

Under the original Federal Reserve Act the Government was authorized to purchase stock in these banks—and these banks have bought only one-half of the stock they were authorized to purchase. I believe it will work out for the best interests of all concerned to buy the stock from these bank members, so that they would then have no legitimate claim to the continued free use of the Government's credit and other supposed claims they are making to rights and privileges they are not entitled to have under the law. If they do not wish to sell, they need not.

Just remember this. I make this prediction, and it will not be long until it happens, just like it happened in the last Congress: There will be a bill brought into this Congress, with both Houses passing it, in which they are going to amend this law and slip a joker in giving at least all existing profits made out of the Federal Reserve System to the holders of the Federal Reserve bank stock. You will remember that we had just such an amendment put over on us in the last session of Congress when the committee put back in free conference an amendment the House struck out which required all excess earnings of the System to go into the Treasury of the United States.

So I say we ought not to tempt them to do that. We ought to take away from them as far as we can through legitimate means and pay them for the value of their stock. They do not have to sell their stock if they do not want to. Let us buy all we can of this stock. If the Government owns it, we will secure excess profits that really belong to the Government but which are now being withheld under the law just mentioned which amounts to now about $300,000,000.

Mr. PATMAN. One hundred and forty-seven million dollars, but they gave it back to the Federal Reserve banks' surplus in the law to encourage Federal Reserve banks to make direct loans to industry.

Mr. McFARLANE. The gentleman, I believe, has in mind the money contributed by this fund to the guaranty deposit insurance fund out of Federal Reserve earnings. We have taken a part of it. Now the balance of the profit made from the Federal Reserve System ought to go into the Treasury of the United States, and if we adopt this amendment you are going a long step in the right direction, not only of placing the surplus of profit made from using the credit of the Government by this private corporation but we will be taking a proper step toward taking over the System so that we can properly manage it and properly control the credit of the Nation for the future. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Texas, as amended by the amendment of Mr. PATMAN, will be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CROSS], as amended by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. STEAGALL) there were 61 ayes and 112 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 88, commencing with line 18, strike out all through line 23, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Sec. 336. The additional liability imposed by section 4 of the act of March 4, 1933, as amended (D. C. Code, Supp. I, title 5, sec. 300a), upon the shareholders of savings banks, savings companies, and banking institutions, and the additional liability imposed by section 734 of the act of March 3, 1901 (D. C. Code, title 5, sec. 361)."

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, the reference in section 336 of the act of the District of Columbia respecting the liability of stockholders in District banks is wrong. The amendment perfects section 336 and refers to the right statute. I have taken the matter up with the legislative counsel, and he has prepared the amendment to section 336 which I have offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina: On page 90, in line 13, change the period to a comma and insert the following before the quotation marks: "That no part of the deposits of any bank, banking association, savings bank, or trust company which is not a member of the Federal Reserve System shall be or remain insured under section 12B after July 1, 1938."

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. It seems to me that this is a matter that has already been disposed of. It is not germane to this section.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I do not think there is any question at all about the germaneness of the amendment. The amendment contained in the bill relates to a class of deposits which are insured under section 12B of the Federal Reserve Act and contemplates the substitution of insured deposits for the security contemplated by the deposit of securities as previously required. The proposed amendment to the section also relates to deposits which are insured under section 12B of the Federal Reserve Act, and is therefore germane to the present bill. The proposed amendment is in effect a limitation upon the preceding provision contained in the bill, in that it provides that the deposits of a bank, banking association, savings bank, or trust company which is not a member of the Federal Reserve System shall not be or remain insured under section 12B after July 1, 1937, and therefore bonds will have to be pledged as security by such banks after that date if deposits of the class referred to are made. It might also be argued that the proposed amendment to section 338 would add additional security to the deposits of funds authorized through the maintenance of sound conditions in such insured member banks by the exercise of the supervisory power vested in the Federal Reserve System.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the amendment is an additional limitation and is germane. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen of the Committee, this amendment speaks for itself. In my effort to secure unanimous consent for the consideration of an amendment to title I of the act, I undertook in a general way to explain the purpose of the amendment. If you adopt this amendment, on July 1, 1938, we will have in this country a unified system of banking. This amendment changes the existing law merely by extending the time within which nonmember State banks will come into the Federal Reserve System to July 1, 1938, instead of July 1, 1937. In my judgment this legislation, which we are certain to pass today, cannot hope to accomplish in the fullest measure the desirable objectives without a unified banking system. I shall try to avoid repetition in discussing the merits of this amendment. I want you to realize, however, that arguments which heretofore have been directed against a unified system by membership in the Federal Reserve System are no longer applicable. Until the Federal Reserve System could be reorganized and liberalized, I would not have been able to support enthusiastically the amendment which I am asking you to adopt. I do not deem it necessary to review the statistical record of banks during the past 15 years or to make comparisons between banks in the System and banks out of the System with respect to failures. A picture of the operations of the different types of banks is very effectively portrayed in the supplemental opinion of Mr. Brown of Michigan as a part of the report filed by the House Committee on Banking and Currency. I cannot, however, refrain from emphasizing the importance of the adoption of this amendment, if we hope to accomplish by this legislation stable economic conditions throughout the Nation. I realize that there is serious objection to any program which looks to forcing small banks into a Federal system, and I want to go on record here and now that I would not advocate any plan which I did not conscientiously believe would be for the best interests of the small banks in the outlying districts, and particularly those banks which are really community service stations. I believe, however, that the time has come when we should consider the banking situation from a national standpoint rather than from a local viewpoint. Remember that this is the philosophy behind the heart of the bill which we are now considering. You should also bear in mind that without this viewpoint we could not justify setting up a permanent system of Federal deposit insurance which carries with it the right of the Corporation to make assessments against the entire deposit liabilities of all the banks within the system rather than against the insured liability.

I also fully realize that many big banks are not particularly enthusiastic about this proposal for the reason that it would tend to restrict their business by a removal of the deposits of the smaller banks from the larger correspondent banks to the Federal Reserve System. I am also fully conscious of the fact that many of the small banks are dependent upon their exchange fees for profits. I believe, however, that with the unified system the advantages which would accrue to the smaller banks would greatly offset the loss of this income. We should not forget that in time of stress and strain there is no source other than the Federal Reserve System to which the smaller banks can turn for real financial assistance. I trust you will give me your attention for just a few minutes in my effort to present as effectively as possible the reasons why I think it is desirable for all banks to belong to the Federal Reserve System.

Out of a total of about 16,000 active banks in the United States today, between 6,500 and 7,000 are members of the Federal Reserve System.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Yes.

Mr. MAY. Under the gentleman's amendment, every one of the other 9,000 banks, regardless of size, would be required to come into this system?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. That is correct.

Mr. MAY. Then what would happen to the small State banks that might not be able to qualify under the provisions of this bill relating to the guaranty of deposits?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. If they were able to qualify for continuing membership in the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, they would, on July 1, 1938, be eligible for admission to the Federal Reserve System. Of course there is a provision in the bill which would permit the Federal Reserve authorities to require banks admitted to the System to improve their capital structure within a reasonable time. Such changes would depend upon the relation between unimpaired capital structure and the deposit liabilities of the bank.

Mr. MAY. But if they could not qualify under the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, they would go out of business?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. I expect they would have already gone out of business.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Can the gentleman state how many banks are now included in the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation that are not members of the Federal Reserve?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. About 8,500. The exact number is available by reference to the able report of Mr. Crowley.

Mr. DONDERO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. I yield.

Mr. DONDERO. And how many are outside the Federal Deposit Insurance?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. I think there are about 1,100 in all.

Mr. DONDERO. Outside the Deposit Insurance? State banks and other banks I refer to.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. There are about 1,100.

Mr. DONDERO. Only 1,100 in the country?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Outside of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation; that is correct.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. If I understood the gentleman correctly, he said that all State banks would be eligible to membership in the Federal Reserve System. If they did not carry Federal deposit insurance the business would flow from them, would it not?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. I expect the tendency would be that way if they were not able to qualify for membership. That is really the way it should be—

Mr. CRAWFORD. Would they then, under any circumstances, with this amendment, be permitted to receive the benefits of the insurance unless they became members of the Federal Reserve System?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. No; they would not.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. I yield.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I understood the gentleman to say there are about 700 banks now that do not come under the insurance system. Is that correct?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. No; I think there are about 1,100 banks that are not members of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation for one reason or another.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. There seems to be a feeling around here that if the gentleman's amendment is adopted there will be about 3,000 more banks eliminated. That seems to be the feeling among the members.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. I regret that an erroneous impression of that kind has gained ground in the House, because the provisions for admission to the Federal Reserve System are as liberal as they could possibly be made. Of course, if they are not in position to qualify for insurance, they could not expect to be admitted to the System. In this connection you should remember that membership in the F. D. I. C. under existing law depends only on solvency rather than soundness.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. All those that are in the System now could remain in, even if the gentleman's amendment is adopted?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. That is correct. They would be eligible for admission.

I wish to make this point: If we believe that the time has come in this country when we must have conscious control of the monetary powers vested in a governmental body, and if we believe that through the exercise of those powers we can accomplish the objectives set out so definitely and clearly in the mandate on page 51, it will be absolutely impossible for these powers to be exercised effectively when half of the banks are in the system and half are out. Banks are under our monetary system creators of credit. Remember that 90 percent of the money that we use in this country is check money.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. I yield.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. The purpose of the gentleman's amendment, then, is to put every bank in the United States, State as well as National, under the thumb of the Federal Reserve Board?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Yes; for the purpose of helping the banks and protecting the depositors.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. In other words, the gentleman would practically destroy whatever authority the State banking departments now have over State banks?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. By this amendment we would do away with 49 degrees of regulation that exist in this country, which has always produced competition in laxity rather than effective regulation and profitable community service.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has again expired.

Mr. Sisson. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed to proceed for 15 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. I yield.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Does not the gentleman, sitting as he does on the Democratic side of the aisle, believe that we should retain at least some vestige of State rights in this country?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. I am a strong believer in private ownership and State rights, but it is my candid opinion that if the Federal Government is to extend its authority in any direction whatever in behalf of the protection of the people, it should be in the matter of proper regulation and supervision of our banking and monetary systems. [Applause.]

Mr. PEARSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. I yield.

Mr. PEARSON. Does the gentleman concede that the adoption of this amendment will mean the immediate closing and involuntary liquidation of some five or six thousand small State banks throughout this Nation?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. No such construction could possibly be fairly placed upon this amendment.

Mr. PEARSON. Would it not necessarily follow that on account of their inability to meet the restrictions placed upon them by the Federal Reserve System, they would be compelled to liquidate, and be unable to proceed further with the conduct of their business?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. That conclusion is perfectly incorrect.

Mr. PEARSON. Does the gentleman think that a small bank, with a small capital structure, which is having a struggle to exist even under present conditions, could comply with such restrictions as the Federal Reserve System might place upon it, and still be able to function?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. I think so. I want to call your attention to this fact: That when the banking crisis came in this country in 1933 all lines were wiped out so far as classes of banks were concerned, and the Federal Reserve System was opened up to every nonmember bank in the United States. These banks were permitted, notwithstanding the fact they were not members, to bring their sound assets to the regional Reserve banks and secure currency, and lest you forget from now on, Mr. Chairman, the only place a bank can get currency in times of distress and emergency in this country will be from the Federal Reserve System. To be a member of the System will inspire confidence and carry assurance of safety and protection to every depositor and borrower.

Mr. COLDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. I yield.

Mr. COLDEN. Is not the gentleman's amendment very much in the interest of the depositors in the small banks?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Yes; and I want to again emphasize that point, although I think perhaps the distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Brown], a member of the committee, is better prepared to discuss it than I am; but if you will examine the record of bank failures throughout this country during the past 15 years, you will not hesitate to advise your little bank to come under the wing and protection of the Federal Reserve System as quickly as possible. I must again confess that up until the present time I could not see the real benefits of such requirements, but with the liberalized eligibility provisions of this bill, together with the fact that we are changing the entire monetary system, due to the radical changes in economic conditions, my viewpoint has altered, and personally I cannot understand why the small banks will not welcome the privilege of coming into the Federal Reserve System.

Mr. FIESINGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. I yield.

Mr. FIESINGER. I believe the chairman of the committee said that if this provision were put into effect by 1937, it would put out of business 2,100 banks. Under the gentleman's amendment the time is extended 1 year. Am I correct in my statement about the 2,100 banks?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. The chairman of our committee always is able to take care of himself and to speak his own opinions. He and I differ widely about this amendment. He has been, as the House knows, against this plan for a long time; all of us appreciate, too, that he is conscientious in his opposition. But in this respect I think that he is wrong and that I am right. I have a mind and he has one, too. As a member of the committee, I do my own thinking. I think the House knows this by now. May I now proceed without interruption to present my proposed argument in favor of the amendment? Reverting to my statement at the beginning, I am satisfied that this bill will not accomplish what we want and expect it to do unless you have a unified system of banks in this country.

The division of authority between the 48 States and the Federal Government over the chartering and supervision of banks has been a source of weakness in the banking structure. It has resulted in excessive ease in granting bank charters, has interfered with the effective supervision of banks, and has fostered unsound banking legislation. Moreover, the fact that so much banking power is represented by institutions which are not members of the Federal Reserve System is an important limiting factor upon the possibility of the Federal Reserve System's assuming responsibility for national monetary policies.

When the national banking system was established during the Civil War, its sponsors believed that by imposing a prohibitive tax on State bank-note issues these banks would be put out of business and a unified banking system under Federal jurisdiction would result. This expectation, however, was not realized, largely because the rapid development of deposit banking enabled State institutions to operate profitably without issuing notes. When the Federal Reserve System was established in 1914, it was hoped that unification of banking would be attained through its membership. All national banks were required to become members of the System and eligible State banks could become members if they wished.

Soon after its organization the Federal Reserve Board expressed the hope that a unified system of banking would develop through the Federal Reserve System, and stated that—

There can be but one American credit system of Nation-wide extent, and it will fall short of satisfying the business judgment and expectation of the country and fail of attaining its full potentialities if it rests upon an incomplete foundation and leaves out of its membership any considerable part of the banking strength of the country.

The Board extended liberal terms of admission to State banks, but no more than a small fraction of them ever became members of the System.

Before the beginning of this century it had become evident that State banks had many competitive advantages over national banks, notably in the matter of lower minimum capital and other requirements for receiving charters and in more extensive powers and privileges. The granting of similar powers and privileges to national banks tended to remove some of the restrictions previously imposed by the National Bank Act. Thus it was that about the beginning of the present century, or somewhat earlier, there began between the national and the several State systems a form of rivalry which has been described as a competition in laxity. To meet State bank competition the minimum capital requirements for national banks were reduced in 1900, and many other examples of liberalization in the National Bank Act since that time were the direct expressions of a desire to make national-bank charters attractive as compared with State charters.

Bank officials and directors are likely to resent criticism, and the ease with which they may escape existing supervision by changing from one system to another greatly reduces the effectiveness of examining authorities. Effective supervision has been handicapped largely by two factors. In the first place, supervisory authorities, whether national or State, have not been granted adequate powers; and in the second place, they have been unable to make full and effective use of such powers as have been given them. To what extent the failure of legislative bodies to grant adequate powers is due to the dual system is difficult to determine, but the inability of supervisors to make full and effective use of such powers as they have arises out of the fact that banks are able to avoid the supervision of one system by leaving it and entering the other.

Banks which do not belong to the Federal Reserve System and contribute nothing to its support nevertheless are strengthened by the stability which the System gives to the banking structure. During the recent banking crisis when the banks were subjected to the strain of wholesale withdrawals and liquidation, all classes of banks turned for assistance to the Federal Government. Measures taken by the Government to cope with the crisis cut across the lines of distinction between national and State banks and between members and nonmembers of the Federal Reserve System. Distinction between the various classes of banks was of little importance when public confidence was undermined by disclosure of serious weakness anywhere within the System. As a consequence the essential unity of the commercial banking structure has been increasingly recognized, and the movement for overcoming the difficulties arising out of dual control has gained momentum.

The broadening of membership in the Federal Reserve System would be advantageous to the banks and would enable the System to function more effectively. In the past nonmember banks have benefited indirectly from the operations of the System through their contacts with member correspondent banks. Correspondent relationship is not, however, an adequate substitute for membership in the System. It does not give to the nonmember banks the same assurance of credit and currency accommodations in time of need as would actual membership or make available to them direct access to the other services through which the System facilitates the operations of member banks. It does not place the Federal Reserve banks in direct contact with nonmember banks, which are a source of demand for credit and currency accommodation, or afford them an opportunity to examine or supervise such banks, notwithstanding the fact that the condition and operation of these banks affect the strength of the banking system as a whole.

Members of the Federal Reserve System must conform to rules and regulations which make for sound banking, while nonmembers are subject to different regulations of a varying degree of soundness or laxity; yet these nonmembers, without making contribution to the support of the System, benefit from the stability afforded by it. If all banks were required to be members of the Federal Reserve System, standards of banking conduct could be established to place banking in this country on a much higher plane than it has ever attained. Competition between the two banking systems, resulting in an overbanked condition and lax standards, has materially hampered the effective functioning of Federal instrumentalities; that is, the national banking system and the Federal Reserve System. This has been in some measure responsible for the development of unsound banking practices, the ineffectiveness of supervision, and the serious banking difficulties during the past decade.

BUSINESS FLUCTUATIONS AND CREDIT ADMINISTRATION

At the suggestion of the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board the Committee on Banking and Currency of the House of Representatives would impose upon the Federal Reserve System, as provided in section 11 as amended, a responsibility:

To exercise such powers as it possesses in such manner as to promote conditions conducive to business stability and to mitigate by its influence unstabilizing fluctuations in the general level of production, trade, prices, and employment, so far as may be possible within the scope of monetary action and credit administration.

The report of the Committee on Banking and Currency on this bill states in this connection:

In view of the added powers proposed to be conferred on the Federal Reserve Board, and to insure that these powers will be exercised in the public interest, it is desirable for Congress to lay down as definite instructions as are practicable. The present objective, the accommodation of commerce, industry, and agriculture, is inadequate as an expression of the will of Congress. It is felt that what the people really expect of monetary management is that it should be directed toward promoting business stability.

This objective is unequivocally specific and definite as to aims and yet leaves to the Federal Reserve Board discretion as to the choice of means. It would furnish a criterion by which the public and its Representatives in Congress could assess the merits of monetary policy. It would provide an added assurance that monetary control would be exercised in the interest of the Nation as a whole.

In order to work toward the objectives described in this language, the Federal Reserve System will be expected consciously to attempt to influence not only the quality of bank credit but its quantity as well. With a large number of banks of deposit outside the System and its control, its effectiveness in this connection will be limited. For example, at the beginning of this year banks which were not members of the Federal Reserve System, including mutual savings banks, had aggregate deposits of about $16,000,000,000, a figure almost half as large as the deposits controlled at that time by members of the Federal Reserve System. It is apparent from these figures to what extent it would be possible to have an extensive increase in bank credit over which the Federal Reserve System would have no control. Such an increase might result at one time or another in serious instability.

If the Federal Reserve System is to be charged with taking action in the monetary and credit fields looking to mitigation of unstabilizing fluctuations, every effort should be made to bring all banks of deposit in this country under its jurisdiction. It would be unfair to the Federal Reserve System and dangerous for the country to increase the powers of the System, to impose upon it additional responsibilities, and yet to continue our haphazard, conflicting, and unwieldy plan of having banks under 49 different jurisdictions which have the power to influence the volume of money available to transact the Nation's business. [Applause.]

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from North Carolina in presenting his amendment with his usual clarity has created the impression that all requirements for membership in the Federal Reserve System are waived in order to allow all State nonmember banks to come in. This is true with certain restrictions and within certain limitations. Section 202 of the bill, appearing at page 47, provides that—

Upon application to the Federal Reserve Board by any nonmember bank which at the time of such application has been admitted to the benefits of insurance by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation under section 12B of this act, the Federal Reserve Board, in its discretion, in order to facilitate the admission of such bank to membership in the Federal Reserve System, may waive in whole or in part the requirements of this section relating to the admission of such bank to membership: Provided, That if such bank is admitted with a capital less than that required for the organization of a national bank in the same place and its capital and surplus are not, in the judgment of the Federal Reserve Board, adequate in relation to its liabilities to depositors and other creditors, the Federal Reserve Board may, in its discretion, require such bank to increase its capital and surplus to such amount as the Board may deem necessary within such period prescribed by the Board as in its judgment shall be reasonable in view of all the circumstances: Provided, however, That no such bank shall be required to increase its capital to an amount in excess of that required for the organization of a national bank in the same place.

Thus, the Federal Reserve Board, if this amendment is adopted, is given jurisdiction of every State nonmember bank in every four corners of this country, and a situation is created whereby the Federal Reserve Board can compel any State nonmember bank to increase its capital as it, the Federal Reserve Board, within its discretion, may deem necessary.

Those of us who represent communities where there are a few small State banks, which are not members of the Federal Reserve System, realize what yeoman service these little banks are doing in these communities. They have not the perspective of Wall Street; they have not the objectives of the banks in the big urban communities; they serve that little community and they grow with that community, and the community grows with the banks. They are there for a specific purpose, to give credit to that little community; and their sphere of activity is restricted to the limits of the community; they have no relationship whatsoever with Wall Street, Detroit, Chicago, or any other big city. They are doing a strictly local banking business, and the Federal Reserve Board has no more right to come in there and establish for them their policy than it has to establish the policy to be followed by some merchant trying to do a little business in the community.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield.

Mr. KNUTSON. I have received several communications from small bankers expressing apprehension that if something along the line of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from North Carolina is inserted in this bill it will put the little banks of the country out of business. Is that right?

Mr. WOLCOTT. The Federal Reserve Board will have the authority to put that bank out of business by establishing an arbitrary and unwarranted capital requirement up to which that bank must build.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield.

Mr. SISSON. In this connection, I ask the gentleman if it is not his construction of the legislation, that is, the present legislation and the legislation proposed by the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr.

HANCOCK], that if a bank can qualify to become or remain a member of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation and have for its depositors the benefit of the Federal insurance of deposit, that automatically it will become eligible to be a member of the Federal Reserve System?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Not necessarily, because the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation and the Federal Reserve System should be as completely divorced as are the Treasury of the United States and the treasury of the city of Port Huron, Mich.

Mr. SISSON. Should be, but are not under present law.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I cannot yield further.

The Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation to me is so much bigger and more important than the Federal Reserve System and I am so concerned that it operate successfully that I do not want to see the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation used as a club to force these banks into the Federal Reserve System.

What we are creating here is just that situation whereby you force all of the State banks to come into the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation. They are forced in because of public sentiment, and you gentlemen are taking advantage of the public sentiment behind the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation to compel these small banks to come into the Federal Reserve System. I repeat that there is no more comity of interest between the Federal Reserve System and the small banks in my district in Michigan than there is between the Treasury of the United States and the treasury of my home city. I hope the House in its wisdom will not force these small banks into a situation where they may be forced out of existence by being compelled to increase their capital to the extent that the bank will cease to become the agency by which our small merchants and our farmers get the necessary credit to carry on business in those communities.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MAY. As a matter of fact, the Federal Reserve System will have power not only to say what amount of capital they shall have, but they can make other rules and regulations?

Mr. WOLCOTT. My fear, as expressed the other day, is if we force a situation whereby all of these banks come under the jurisdiction of the Federal Reserve Board, it will not be more than 2 years before the Federal Reserve Board at Washington, under political control, will be establishing the loan policies of every bank in the United States, and I think I am justified in saying in that connection that the President of the United States will be dictating that policy. So far as I am concerned, I shall never vote to uphold a situation whereby Wall Street, Washington, or any other banking center is going to tell the small independent banks in what manner and to whom they shall lend money and extend credit, to the prejudice of the farmers and the small industries in my district.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, there are approximately 8,800 State banks in the United States. Just fasten that number in mind. Of that number 7,700 are now insured, which means that of the 8,800 State banks in the United States there are only 1,100 that are not now carrying insurance. There are only 980 State banks out of the 8,800 that are members of the Federal Reserve bank. You may wonder why only such a small percentage has joined the Federal Reserve System. The reason is that the Federal Reserve has never wanted them to join and has not invited them particularly to join. Here comes an amendment which, through indirection, seeks to force them into the Federal Reserve System.

Mr. SISSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SISSON. I know the gentleman does not want to mislead the House, but does not the gentleman know that under existing law they must eventually become members of the Federal Reserve System in order to participate in the benefits of the Federal deposit insurance?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I appreciate that; but the fact is we struck that provision out of the bill in committee, and this is merely an attempt to reinsert it in the bill at this time.

Mr. SISSON. We struck it out of the bill in committee against the recommendation of every monetary authority and against the advice coming from every Government and every administrative representative. We struck it from the present law, so the gentleman should not speak of it as a change in existing law. Does not the gentleman concede also that the nonmember State banks will never come into the Federal Reserve System if they can get all of the benefits of the Federal deposit insurance without coming in, in order to have strength in the structure and afford that protection to their depositors?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I may say to the gentleman from New York that there has never been any occasion for the little banks to come into the Federal Reserve System. The fact of the matter is that 43 percent of all the little State banks, somewhere around four or five thousand, are situated in towns of less than 1,000 population. They are scattered all through the Western and Southern States. There has never been anything more than an academic contention here on the floor as to why these little banks should join the Federal Reserve System. I think the gentleman from New York [Mr. Sisson] will agree that in the present bill we provide that the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation may terminate the insurance of an unsound bank.

Mr. SISSON. Does not the gentleman think the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation ought to have that power?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Why, certainly. I am only elaborating upon the powers we have conferred on the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation for the purpose of protecting the depositors and the soundness of these various banks participating in the insurance.

Secondly, the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation can regulate the interest payments, insofar as nonmembers are concerned, on time deposits precisely as the Federal Reserve does it, insofar as the member banks are concerned.

Next, the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation can require burglary and fidelity insurance, so that there will be no difficulty attending a bank in case there is a hold-up of some kind.

Fourth, the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation must give approval for any kind of a merger or consolidation or for a reduction in the capital of one of these State banks.

Here are 7,700 banks that have insurance at the present time, and they have qualified under all the provisions of the law.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 3 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. I am very much interested in the argument which the gentleman is making. I know he is sincere in making the argument, but he has referred to small banks all over the country, and I would like to know whether the gentleman would be willing to support an amendment which would tend to bring into the System all nonmember banks with deposits of $500,000 or more?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I may say to the gentleman that that matter is not pending now. We are discussing the pending amendment, and I would rather not be led astray.

Let me continue for just a moment. The Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation can require reports of conditions from all these State banks. So there is not a thing left undone in this law to insure the solvency and the soundness of every bank that participates in insurance. There is careful scrutiny at all times, and yet, under this amendment, you are going to say arbitrarily that on the first of July 1938 this insurance shall be taken away unless they join the Federal Reserve, irrespective of whether they have any use for the Federal Reserve or not. How much use does a little bank in a town of 600 or 1,000 people have for the rediscount facilities of the Federal Reserve System? Very little, if any, and yet they will have to subscribe for 6 percent of their capital stock and surplus and pay half cash, although they have no use for it whatsoever, because they are amply protected under this law.

It has been said that the record of failures so far as State banks are concerned is a bad one. Let us look at the capital investment of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in all banks at the present time. The R. F. C. has a capital investment in 5,412 banks right now and this capital investment amounts to $810,000,000. How is this classified? First of all, 1,759 national banks, 296 State member banks and 3,357 nonmember banks. How much does the R. F. C. have invested in these respective banks?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 more minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Of the 1,759 national banks, the R. F. C. has a capital investment of $440,000,000 and the average is $250,000 for the national banks.

Of the 296 State member banks, it has $175,000,000 invested, or approximately $580,000 per bank.

In the 3,357 nonmember State banks, the R. F. C. capital investment, right now, is $204,000,000, or an average of only $61,000 as against $250,000 for the national banks and $580,000 for the State member banks.

This indicates pretty well what kind of banks have to have the most capital help from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and the figures that have been adduced heretofore to show how bad was the State banking structure, I think, are fully dissipated by the figures of the R. F. C., and the thing for this committee to remember is that if this amendment passes you arbitrarily cover over 7,000 State banks into the Federal Reserve System and if they do not come in you say to them, "We are sorry, but on the first of July 1938 your insurance will be automatically terminated."

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last five words.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Do I understand that debate has been limited?

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is always limited in Committee of the Whole to 5 minutes on the side on each amendment, and there has been 30 minutes' debate on this amendment.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I hope before the members of the Committee decide this important question they will at least read the supplemental report of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Brown], which is attached to the committee report and which contains, I believe, an unanswerable argument in support of what is substantially the present law and in support of the Hancock amendment. The report contains the figures which are indisputable of the banking history of this country for the period of 1921 to 1933 before we had Federal deposit insurance.

This shows the enormously greater losses to the depositors of America who had their deposits in nonmember State banks than those who had their deposits in either national banks or member State banks.

I am in entire sympathy with the argument of men like my friend the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. CHRISTIANSON] and others who have spoken about wanting to take care of the small State banks and not lose to the business life of these little communities their present banking facilities, and the Hancock amendment is not going to cause them to close up at all. Such a statement is entirely misleading and without foundation.

What is the present legislative status? Under existing law these banks, as a part of the consideration for having their deposits insured up to the extent of $5,000 per deposit through the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, must, by the 1st of July 1937, come into the Federal Reserve System. In addition to this, the present law, together with the Hancock amendment, brings it about that if they are qualified to remain in the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation and have this benefit, they are automatically qualified to come into the Federal Reserve System.

This is the whole purpose, and the committee ought to come out frankly and tell the House the history of it and not mislead the House by statements such as have been made, I am sorry to say, by my friend from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], because it does not mean that these seven-thousand-and-odd nonmember State banks are going to be put out of business. If they are qualified to remain in the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, then they automatically are made eligible to go into the Federal Reserve System. And, if they are not qualified to remain in the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, do you think they ought to continue? If they are qualified, they automatically become qualified to go into the Federal Reserve System, and all we are asking is that they shall come in and strengthen the whole banking structure and protect depositors all over the country. This is what I am arguing for. [Applause.]

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, the House will remember the circumstances under which the law establishing the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation was enacted. On two separate occasions this House expressed itself against the proposal that would require nonmember banks to become members of the Federal Reserve System in order to join the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation. A compromise was worked out in conference because of the practical situation that had to be met if the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation Act was to be adopted.

Now, what is the situation? We have 960 banks joining the Federal Reserve System voluntarily. They are State banks that came in of their own motion.

That is the number that joined the Federal Reserve System in 20 years.

The Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, just as did the Federal Reserve Act, automatically covered into its benefits every national bank and every State member bank; 7,638 State nonmember banks have voluntarily joined the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation in less than 1½ years.

It is a sad commentary that the Federal Reserve System, after failing for 20 years to induce State banks to join the System, unable to persuade nonmember banks to enter the System for business reasons, are now seeking to drive them in. [Applause.] It means no more nor less than that. You who are informed of this situation know not only that the Federal Reserve officials want to enlarge the System and get control of the entire banking structure of the Nation, but that they do not believe there is any justification for many of the small community banks.

It is also well known, deep down in their hearts they feel that many State banks should be destroyed, and that is exactly what is involved in the proposal to drive them into the Federal Reserve System. They do not wish to join the System because the connection is not desirable. They would be denied compensation for services rendered in remitting checks, and subjected to other requirements and regulations obnoxious to them. It would curtail their earnings, and no bank can operate safely that cannot make profits. The Deposit Insurance Act provides that nonmember banks shall be permitted to participate in the benefits of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation upon terms of equality with member banks and without regard to capital. Any bank with capital of $25,000 is eligible to membership in the Federal Reserve System if its deposits are insured. The bill before the House proposes to liberalize the requirements for membership as to nonmember banks. But there is a provision that would authorize the Federal Reserve Board to raise the capital requirements above those prescribed in the Banking Act of 1933. These requirements would exclude many non-member banks.

The Chairman of the Board of the Federal Insurance Corporation, in a statement 1 week ago, said that 2,314 State banks in the United States were unequipped to meet the technical requirements for membership in the Federal Reserve System. This proposal would destroy those banks. These banks could not live without deposit insurance, and if this number had to close, it would inevitably result in closing hundreds of others. These community banks, built up out of community spirit and community pride, for the advancement of community life are the foundation of the Nation's progress and development. They have weathered the storms of these distressing years and are still serving their communities. Many were destroyed by the collapse of the big banks in 1933, but nearly 9,000 are still carrying on. They constitute the mud sill of the Nation's banking structure. Mr. Chairman, this proposal is an effort to standardize our economic life, to centralize all power and all authority over these institutions. It is not necessary to do this in order to effectuate any policy adopted by the Federal Reserve Board. These banks have only 15 percent of the bank deposits of the country. Fifteen hundred of these banks have only $100,000,000 of deposits. Most of them do not deal in securities that are handled in open-market operations. This proposal is a cruel, destructive, indefensible thing. It ought not to be done. [Applause.]

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last six words. I hesitate very much to cross swords with the eloquent chairman of our committee. So far, upon the main provisions of this bill, I have been in agreement with him and in agreement with the majority of the committee; but I have a very pronounced and deep conviction upon this subject of unified banking in the United States. I think there is something inconsistent in the position of the majority of my committee. The entire purpose of this bill is to establish a unified national banking system, to establish a Government policy in regard to money and banking. It cannot be accomplished under 49 banking systems. By the action of the committee in striking this provision from the original Steagall bill, introduced by the chairman of this committee, our committee no longer followed the administration. Their action tends to break down the banking system proposed by Governor Eccles, Comptroller O'Connor, and I believe I have the right to say the Chairman of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, Mr. Crowley.

The adoption of this measure, as amended in committee, will tend to drive many banks out of the national banking system and out of the Federal Reserve System. This is directly contrary to the purpose of the bill as first introduced—H. R. 5357. Changes in committee, certainly not in line with the desire of the administration, if the original bill expressed that desire, were made. No one ventured to assert in committee that the changes made, which I will discuss, were desired by the President, the Comptroller, or the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, or the Federal Reserve Board, but many times the committee was informed that the bill as introduced—H. R. 5357—had the approval of the various agencies affected.

A fairly well unified banking system could be brought about by legislation which would encourage the chartering and extension of national banks and inclusion of State banks in the Federal Reserve System. This bill, together with the existing law unaffected by it, will discourage national banking. It will break down and reverse the policy of our last two banking bills which encouraged a unified, democratic form of banking where each bank was independent in the matter of local credit and at the same time was able to call on the system for aid in extending credit and for aid in time of financial stress.

Under existing law the nonmember banks of the country were admitted as insured banks in the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation with the understanding that in 1937 such insured banks would have to join the Federal Reserve System or terminate their membership in the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation. Under this bill the committee definitely abandons this policy and permits for all time non-member banks to participate in the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation without membership in the Federal Reserve System. Every act of Congress heretofore passed relating to this subject has announced the policy that insured banks must become members of the Federal Reserve System. In my judgment, if this provision is repealed as is contemplated in H. R. 7617, the pending bill, a unified system of banking with individual autonomy and control of the separate banks is gone.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR. As I understand it, the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HANCOCK] was in the original bill, was intended to be left in there, and is a part of the program, probably as vital a part as any other part of the program from the administration's standpoint.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. The gentleman is absolutely correct.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. But is it not a fact that the chairman of the Board of the Corporation testified before the Senate committee about a week ago that he was not in favor of the Hancock amendment, and that the effect of it would be to close about 2,300 State banks in the country.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I do not know whether it is a fact or not. I have not read the hearings in the Senate, but if my friend says so, it must be so.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I say to my friend that it is a fact.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I know that the first Steagall bill came from a committee of the three departments of the Government, the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, the Treasury Department, and the Federal Reserve Board, and the bill was the united work of those three departments of the Government, and it contained the provision now offered by Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina.

Mr. SISSON. And is it not a fact that Mr. Crowley, the Chairman of the Board of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, testified at length before this committee, the House Banking and Currency Committee, and recommended that the provisions of the existing law remain?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. The Chairman of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation recommended the passage of the original Steagall bill, which contains the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. And is it not a fact that if this amendment is adopted it will greatly strengthen the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. It certainly will, in my estimation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Is it not a fact that Mr. Crowley, Chairman of this Board of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, testified before our committee that he thought Congress had more sense than to force out of existence some 2,300 State banks?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. The record will show what the testimony of Mr. Crowley is. I know that Mr. Crowley advocated the passage of the original bill, which contained the substance of the Hancock amendment.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. MOTT. As I get it here, the great issue seems to be whether a standing committee of the House had any moral right to change a bill coming in from the executive departments.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. That may be so, but I am for the amendment, because it is right, and the administration is usually right. I call the attention of the House to the fact that we have not talked very much about the safety to depositors. If you have read the report filed by myself, you will find an amazing record in that respect. I am going to give you a very few of those figures.

Now, we are talking about the most vital thing there is in the banking business; that is, safety to depositors.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I yield.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Will the gentleman give the total amount of money involved in that?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I am about to do so.

One cannot contemplate the record of the past without realizing that National and Federal control is highly desirable from the standpoint of the depositor, whose interest is paramount. Let us look at the record.

The record of national, State member, and nonmember banks from 1921 to 1932 shows the superior safety of national banks. Mutual savings banks are not included in these figures with nonmember banks, as they are of a different character. The figures are based on the 1933 report of the Federal Reserve Board.

In 1921 there were 8,150 national banks, with total deposits of $12,991,000,000. There were 1,595 member State banks, with deposits of $7,646,000,000. There were 20,181 nonmember banks, with deposits of $9,529,000,000. In 1932 open national banks had diminished in number from 8,150, 12 years before, to 6,080; the State member banks from 1,595 to 824; the nonmember banks from 20,181 to 11,296.

During the 12-year period just before the abnormal situation of 1933 the average annual number of national banks closing per year were 138, or 1.6 percent of the 1921 total; State member banks, 35 per year, or 2.2 percent; nonmember banks, 732 per year, or 3.6 percent.

In the matter of deposits, the 12-year period shows that the total deposits in national banks suspended was $1,187,000,000; in State member banks, $680,000,000; and in nonmember banks, $3,017,000,000.

When one stops to consider that the 1932 member banks' deposits were three and one-half times the nonmember deposits, and that the deposits in suspended nonmember banks for the 12 preceding years were practically twice the amount of deposits in suspended member banks, it is plain and apparent that a unified system is immensely superior in safety to depositors. The National and Federal Reserve Systems have proven their superiority in the commercial banking field. Figures for the period from 1933 to date are not available, but I am assured, on authority I consider reliable, that the record, when written, will fully sustain the conclusions here reached.

These figures demonstrate that a unified system such as we have should be continued, encouraged, and perfected. This bill will break it down. Give national banks the same rights and privileges State banks have and no more. Give the little bank the same right as you do the big bank, and extend insurance of deposits to all banks that will join the Federal Reserve System and you will assist in the general unification and strengthening of our banking structure.

If we take the record of the closed insured banks, we find experience pointing in the same direction. Up to the 2d of May this year we have had 16 failures of banks in the Federal Deposit Insurance System. Two of them were members of the Federal Reserve System and 14 were nonmembers. The two member banks had total deposits of $360,000. The 14 nonmember banks had deposits of over $3,000,000. Expressed in another way, aside from deposit insurance, if your money was in a member bank of the Federal Reserve System, your chance of getting it back was about as 300,000 to 1, but in a nonmember bank, based on the experience of the insured nonmember banks, your chances were about 1,500 to 1. In other words, your money was 200 times safer in the Federal Reserve System. Remember that this indicates the additional risk the Deposit Corporation undertakes when it insures nonmember banks based on the experience of the past 16 months, the only experience we have. The figures are based on the official reports of the F. D. I. C.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Does the gentleman believe that was due to the fact that they were nonmembers or that the nonmember banks were smaller banks in smaller communities and did not have as widely diversified portfolios and were not able to withstand the strain?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I believe it was due to the superior safety provided by the Federal Reserve System.

I am for the Hancock amendment because, first, it will assure greater safety; second, it will enable the people of the Nation to control its cash and credit money. These, I think, are the main purposes of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has again expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HANCOCK].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last five words.

Mr. Chairman, in a few minutes the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union will rise, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HOLLISTER] will offer a motion to recommit the bill. He will then move the previous question on his motion. Those who are in favor of the Goldsborough amendment should vote against the previous question. If the previous question is defeated, I will then offer to amend the motion of the gentleman from Ohio to recommit, by striking it out and substituting the Goldsborough amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask recognition in opposition to the pro forma amendment. I am a member of the committee.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Very well, Mr. Chairman. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last six words.

Mr. Chairman, I am asking recognition for a few moments, inasmuch as the gentleman from Maryland has raised the question of the motion to recommit, to explain what the motion to recommit will be. I expect, if recognized by the Speaker, to offer a motion to recommit the bill to the Committee on Banking and Currency with instructions to return the same forthwith, striking out sections 201, 203, 205, and 209 of title II. Those are the four steps which build up additional power in the Executive; first, over the Federal Reserve Board, and through the Federal Reserve Board, over the operations of the Federal Reserve banks, over the activities of the Federal Reserve banks, and, with respect to some matters, over the member banks. Those are the mandatory provisions to which I have heretofore referred, as distinguished from the permissive provisions. Some of these permissive provisions are not correct, but they are at least purely permissive with respect to the banks, and are not mandatory, and I have, therefore, not included them in the motion to recommit.

I urge every Member who feels that there should not be an extension of power over the operation of the Federal Reserve banks and of the member banks, in any body which may be politically controlled, irrespective of any administration which may be in power, to join in supporting the motion to recommit.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HOLLISTER. I yield.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. The four sections to which the gentleman refers constitute the heart of title II, do they not?

Mr. HOLLISTER. These four sections constitute the extension of administration power over the Federal Reserve System of the country.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FULLER: On page 91, after line 25, insert the following as a new section:

"Sec. 341. That no postal-savings depository located in a city, town, or village in which is located a banking institution which is not closed or in process of liquidation if such banking institution is a member bank of the Federal Reserve System or if its deposits are insured by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation shall, under the provisions of the act entitled 'An act to establish postal-savings depositories for depositing savings at interest with the security of the Government for repayment thereof, and for other purposes', approved June 25, 1910, as amended and supplemented (U. S. C., title 39, ch. 20), (a) permit a new postal-savings account to be opened, (b) accept any deposit from any person having a postal-savings account (but interest may be allowed and credited on any such deposit), (c) accept any postal-savings stamps for the purpose of making a postal-savings deposit, or (d) sell any postal-savings stamps."

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Chairman, I have given some little thought to the preparation of this amendment and have consulted the legal staff of the House, which approved the language. All that is sought by this amendment is to provide that in those communities where there is a bank which is a member of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, that the Post Office Department cannot accept postal savings.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I have moved to strike out the last word in order to answer the "lecture" of the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR], on the right of the Membership of this House to vote on the motion to amend the motion to recommit.

I do not presume to be any bigger than any other Member of this House, but I contend that every Member has rights and responsibilities here and that no Member needs to be dictated to by any man who assumes that duty on this floor. I drop this mild hint at this point of the argument.

On the motion to recommit we have the right to vote down the previous question. Then we have the right to vote to amend the motion to recommit, and any argument to the effect that we are taking away anybody's rights is nonsense. Under the rules of the House any member of the committee handling the bill who is opposed to the measure, whether he be on the minority side or on the majority side, has the right to make a simple motion to recommit, and that will take precedence over all other motions to recommit. The only recourse the Membership of the House then has is to vote down the previous question on the motion to recommit, and then amend the motion.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The gentleman stated that any Member of the majority or minority side could move to recommit a bill. The gentleman knows that under the established practice of this House the motion must be made by a Member on the minority side.

Mr. RANKIN. Not at all. The gentleman from Mississippi knows what he is talking about without having to ask the gentleman from New York. Any member of the committee who is opposed to the bill under consideration has the right to be recognized to make a motion to recommit. I have seen situations where every member of the committee from the minority side were in favor of a bill, when no man on the minority side who was a member of the committee could make the motion to recommit, but some member of the committee from the majority side, a member who was opposed to the bill, would make the motion to recommit.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield.

Mr. HOLLISTER. But as a matter of custom and practice the minority side is recognized to make the motion to recommit.

Mr. RANKIN. Of course; but that does not shut off the rest of the Members of the House from voting down the previous question and amending the motion to recommit. If this were not the rule, if we were not permitted to give the Membership of the House the right to vote on the previous question, and then, if it were voted down, the right to amend, then we should amend the rules of the House so as to provide that the previous question shall be considered as ordered, as is so frequently done in rules brought in by the Rules Committee.

I submit that we are within our rights in this matter, and I for one expect to vote against ordering the previous question. If it is voted down, then I shall vote to amend the motion to recommit to include the Goldsborough amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WOODRUM, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 7617) to provide for the sound, effective, and uninterrupted operation of the banking system, and for other purposes, pursuant to House Resolution 205, he reported the bill back to the House with sundry amendments adopted by the Committee.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the previous question is ordered.

Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en gros.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HOLLISTER moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Banking and Currency with instructions to strike out sections 201, 203, 205, and 209 and report the bill back immediately as thus amended.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH) there were—ayes 196, noes 91.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 221, nays 159, not voting 51, as follows:

LXXIX—458

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania, Mr. LESINSKI, and Mr. BUCKBEE changed their votes from "yea" to "nay."

Mr. HENNINGS changed his vote from "nay" to "yea."

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Speaker, my colleagues, the gentleman from New York, Mrs. O'DAY, the gentleman from New York, Mr. KENNEDY, and the gentleman from New York, Mr. BUCKLEY, are unavoidably detained. If they were present, they would vote "yea."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HOLLISTER] to recommit the bill.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 117, nays 261, not voting 54, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. STEAGALL, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

JOINT COMMITTEE TO GREET REAR ADMIRAL BYRD

The SPEAKER. Pursuant to the provisions of Public Resolution No. 16, the Chair appointed as members of the joint committee to greet Rear Admiral Richard E. Byrd upon his arrival at the navy yard on May 10, 1935, the following Members of the House of Representatives: Mr. ROBERTSON, of Virginia; Mr. SCRUGHAM, of Nevada; Mr. DARDEN, of Virginia; Mr. MARTIN, of Massachusetts; and Mr. HANCOCK, of New York.

EXTENDING THE TIME DURING WHICH DOMESTIC ANIMALS WHICH HAVE CROSSED THE BOUNDARY LINE MAY BE RETURNED DUTY FREE

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 6143) to extend the time during which domestic animals which have crossed the boundary line into foreign countries may be returned duty free.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That notwithstanding the provisions of subparagraph (c) of paragraph 1606 of title II of the Tariff Act of 1930, horses, mules, asses, cattle, sheep, and other domestic animals, straying across the boundary line into any foreign country, or which have been driven across such boundary line by the owner for temporary pasturage purposes only, or which may so stray or be driven before November 1, 1935, and the offspring and increase of any such animals, shall be admitted free of duty under regulations heretofore or to be hereafter prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, if brought into the United States at any time before June 30, 1936.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 10, after the word "animals", insert "whether or not accompanying the parent animals."

Page 2, line 2, after the word "regulations", strike out "heretofore or."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

THE AIR MAIL

Mr. BRUNNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a speech I made today over the radio.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRUNNER. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address delivered by myself today:

Friends of the farm and home hour, as a resident of Rockaway Beach, New York City, where the first successful trans-Atlantic flight was started on May 16, 1919, and as chairman of the subcommittee on Air Mail Service, I was very happy to accept the invitation of the Post Office Department to bring you a message from our standpoint concerning the air mail.

It was just 16 years ago that the first regular air mail line was inaugurated between Washington and New York, a distance of 218 miles. The service was inaugurated with a few remodeled Army planes and was more or less uncertain and undependable.

Today the domestic air mail system covers a total of 28,967 route miles and employs daily in this service 408 modern planes operated by 645 highly trained pilots.

During the first year of operation 30,000 miles were flown over the route between New York and Washington. At the present time the schedules provide for 40,000,000 flying miles a year.

The first planes required between 2½ and 3 hours to fly from Washington to New York. Today this route is covered in 80 minutes, and service is maintained several times a day over the route.

In the past year there has been an increase of 3,719 route miles in the domestic service, which means an increase of 5,000,000 flying miles. It is expected that if present recommendations are approved by Congress that 3,000 additional miles will be added to the routes within the year. Notwithstanding the increases in the number of routes, miles, and frequency of trips, the Post Office Department today is spending only half as much for the Air Mail Service as was spent in 1932. This great air mail system gives direct service to 46 States and indirect service to the other 2, and even the Hawaiian Islands have an interisland service.

The volume of air mail carried is increasing by leaps and bounds. In December 1934 there were transported by air mail 931,425 pounds; roughly more than 30,000,000 letters, which is more than a million letters a day. The volume is almost six times as great as was carried during the same month in 1927.

The rates on air mail have been reduced so that today a person pays but 6 cents an ounce regardless of the distance any place within the United States. This lower rate has brought a great increase in the volume and the volume has increased to such a point that the receipts are almost as great today as those received under the former high rates.

The speed of your air mail is almost inconceivable. The planes attain a speed in excess of 200 miles per hour, which is almost half the speed of a rifle bullet.

The banker in Los Angeles today calls his correspondent in New York for valuable papers which must be in his hands by tomorrow. If these papers are sent at the close of banking hours this afternoon they will be in the hands of the banker in Los Angeles in the forenoon of tomorrow, without the loss of a single business day or hour.

A letter will travel between New Orleans and New York from sunset to sunrise. The recent experimental flight from San Francisco to the Hawaiian Islands and return, completed within the last month, brings vividly home to us the entire practicability of transoceanic mail transport within the very near future. Air transport has already made less effective the navies of the past as a means of defense; it has necessitated the reorganization of armies; it is causing the railroads and other forms of transportation to adopt more efficient trains and types of equipment. Having in mind the value of this great system, not only for the transmission of mails and the transportation of passenger traffic but its absolute need as one of the vital forces for a national defense, both my colleagues and myself on this committee will be ever alert to see that air transport in the United States will always be kept in the forefront of the nations of the world.

May I also add at this time that Amelia Earhart Putnam's flight yesterday from Mexico City to New York established another milestone in air mail history, because Mrs. Putnam, who is a New Yorker, is also a licensed air mail pilot.

COTTON VERSUS JUTE

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Speaker, much has been said recently by the representatives of the textile industry and several Members in Congress about losing our foreign cotton markets, placing the blame on the present farm program and the processing tax. However, I have not heard a word from these complainants about new uses for cotton or using our own perfectly good American cotton instead of foreign products.

Annually the Post Office Department consumes around 1,000,000 pounds of twine to tie the mails of the United States. Its purchases are confined to jute twine. Why? Because jute is cheaper than cotton. In other words, it appears to be satisfactory and good business on the part of our Government to spend millions to plow under cotton, for which it receives no returns, but it is unwise to spend a few thousand dollars, the difference in the prices of jute and cotton twine, and thereby consume around 200 bales more cotton annually. Legislation was passed some 2 years ago requesting the Government to give preference to American products and articles manufactured from American products although the price might be somewhat higher. However, the jute mills of New England, the section where the complaints against the agricultural program are coming from, are always able to get the business.

I have a bill pending making it possible to use millions of dollars' worth of cotton, utilizing cotton, stalks, bolls, and leaves, in the manufacture of cellulose which can be used in making paints, varnishes, paper, ammunition for war purposes, and many other articles. However, I have no assistance from these grumblers and the mourners of the loss of our foreign markets.

I have a net-weight bill pending that would permit the using of cotton bagging in covering cotton instead of old, heavy, ragged, disgraceful jute, thereby consuming 200 additional bales of cotton, but these tariff barons and representatives of the jute interests are opposing my bill.

Also, I have a bill pending proposing to put a proper tariff on jute and jute products which would give additional markets for 2,000,000 bales annually, but no assistance is given me from New England in passing this bill.

You are clamoring for increased tariffs on foreign textiles, kicking about farmers controlling their production, which is in line with the policy of the textile mills, but you are not willing to pass constructive legislation in the interest of cotton farmers and that would mean everything to textile mills and textile employees.

I have been notified by the Post Office Department that bids have been requested on 40,000 pounds of twine, bids to be submitted not later than May 28. If you are really interested in the cotton farmers of the South and our textile mills, I am hoping that you will join with me in seeing to it that the order is given for cotton twine.

If you want a larger production of cotton and if you want to do away with the processing tax, I challenge you to join with me in passing legislation that will bring about new uses for cotton and the protection of our own markets for our own American cotton.

LETTER TO SECRETARY WALLACE

Hon. HENRY A. WALLACE,
Secretary Department of Agriculture,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. WALLACE: The purchasing agent of the Post Office Department has notified me that bids will be requested on 40,000 pounds of twine, to be filed with the Department not later than May 28. This invitation for bids specifies:

Twine, jute, wrapping (unfinished), 6-ply.

Twine, cotton, wrapping (unfinished), white.

Sometime ago I had placed in one of the appropriation bills an amendment providing that preferences should be given, in purchasing for the Government, to products of the United States, although higher in price, unless the difference was unreasonable.

We all know that cotton twine is higher than jute twine. However, yard for yard, cotton will go much farther than jute. In the meantime, it makes a neater package, much easier to handle, and, although higher in price, because of the cotton situation, certainly, the Post Office Department should buy cotton twine.

With all of the complaints coming from the cotton industry, textile workers, and on account of the millions of dollars that we are spending indirectly in special benefits to farmers, even plowing under and giving away cotton, as stated, the Post Office Department should certainly give the order to the cotton-textile industry.

I cannot understand why we plow under perfectly good cotton and pay for same, then refuse to buy cotton twine, although higher than jute. In other words, we paid farmers twenty million or more for plowing under cotton and refuse to contribute the difference between the price of jute twine and cotton twine.

It is my belief that if you will take this matter up with General Farley, you will be able to secure this order for the cotton textile industry, which would not only be proper thing to do, but should certainly put a good taste in the mouth of the textile interests, cotton farmers, and textile workers.

I would like to know whether or not you propose to vigorously look after this important matter, or whether or not you are perfectly willing to spend millions, considered by many people nothing more than a dole, and permit the Government to continue to purchase jute, which is imported from India, the second and next largest cotton-producing country to the United States, and which country—it is claimed by the textile industry—is increasing its cotton production, all of which is destroying our cotton export.

Yours very sincerely,

H. P. FULMER, M. C.

THE IDEALS OF THOMAS JEFFERSON

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, under the permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I desire to include the address of Hon. George A. Meffan, former State Senator, now United States marshal for Idaho, on the ideals of Thomas Jefferson, delivered at Twin Falls, Idaho, on April 15, as follows:

My friends, we are assembled here tonight to commemorate the natal day of one whose life was worthy of the emulation of every true American. * * * He was a lawyer, statesman, diplomat, founder of the University of Virginia, author of the Declaration of Independence, cofounder of a new nation, a new freedom, and third President of the United States of America—Thomas Jefferson.

Much time is spent in this country paying lip tribute to the dead, but, in my opinion, men of the high type and character of Jefferson—if he could return to the realm of the living—would rather observe the people of the Republic he so materially aided in formation, holding high the torch he left radiantly burning, and by active execution of his lofty principles, carry on, than be the beneficiary of worship without deeds.

The record of his generous life runs like a vine around the memory of our dead, and every sweet, unselfish act is now a perfumed flower.

Jefferson was a real humanitarian, a man of defiance, unusual mentality, courage, and success in its broadest meaning. He carried to his heart the burdens of our race. He looked through pity's tears upon the faults and frailties of mankind. He knew the springs and seeds of thought and deed, and saw with cloudless eyes through all the winding ways of greed, ambition, and deceit (where folly vainly plucks with thorn-pierced hands the fading flowers of selfish joy) the highway of eternal right.

The creed that Jefferson gave American democracy is expressed in these words: "Man over money, human rights over property rights, equal and exact justice to the rich and the poor, with special privilege to none." Like all men of vision, and leaders in advanced thought, he had much opposition, but I know that in the court where his own conscience sat as judge he stood acquitted—pure as light and stainless as a star.

What I have outlined to say to you tonight, in my humble opinion, will be similar to the broad viewpoint of justice, as the records of Jefferson reflect his views when molding a new code of government.

There are those, of course, who scorn new ideas, reformation, and new deals; those whom the orthodox in all forms of social and economic life will suffice and rebel against progress. This type of mentality always was and always will be. Then there are those who care naught what the old calls the new; what last year's leaf says to this year's bud. The Athenians had the same opinion of Socrates; the Jews so regarded Christ.

It is gratifying to millions of Americans to know that America today has again a man in our worthy President, who thus far has displayed wisdom and courage. He who took charge of a government at a time when its foundation was crumbling, the walls cracked, the pillars leaning, and the great dome swaying and about to fall. Never in American history were we as a nation so close to absolute chaos as when this man of the hour took over the task of strengthening the foundation, repairing the walls and pillars, and now from its great dome radiates the beams of hope. In the new deal I believe that our President's philosophy is in keeping with the thought of the poet who said:

"Why greet the new day, if it is to be
A copy of the day that went before—
A tale of wrongs unrighted, golden ore unmined,
Of victory that infirm hands let slip—
Of children's tears that no one tried to dry?
How dare we write another page, unless it set alight
A beacon for the marchers down the years?"

"Now by our vision of a brighter day,
Our hope of dawn in everlasting night,
Let this day see us farther on the way
That winds through darkness to the sun-crowned height—
Where gleams a shining city. Ah, behold—
And make the new day better than the old."

Those of the old school of political thought, if they are imbued with the slightest degree of patriotism and righteousness should yield to the reformation. Americans are not surrendering their homes for lairs to satisfy the avarice and greed of plutocrats; Americans are not discarding Jeffersonian Democracy for aristocracy. We had an old school of thought in centuries of the past, whose advocates rebelled against progress and human rights. For thousands of years a "thinker" was hunted down like an escaped convict. To him who had braved public opinion every door was shut—every knife was open. To shelter him from the wild storm, to give him a crust when dying, to put a cup of water to his cracked and bleeding lips—these were all crimes, not one of which power could forgive. They were exterminated as scorpions and vipers. But we are not retrogressing toward those days.

When I hear and read the opposition of the old school of thought scornfully and viciously attack the President of our Government and his departure from the old order—with claims of radicalism, in the light of his efforts to provide employment, perpetuate financial institutions, to make it possible for agrarians to stay with their farm problems, and his Government aid to home owners, when both borrower and lender knew not which way to turn; the aid to sheep and cattle men, mining men, expansion of currency; his Bank Guaranty Act, the embargo against gold exports; the public-works program and the civic-works activities; the thousands of young men assigned to C. C. C. camps; the drive against crime, with its marked results; direct relief to the needy, and many other splendid accomplishments in the last 2 years, I cannot but classify the ingrates of the present with the intolerance, narrowness, and bigotry of the past.

Thomas Jefferson was ridiculed in his day by the same type of mentality who howl today about the sacredness of the gold standard; the violation of the Constitution. By that same type who have been willing to plunge a nation into debt for war profits to themselves but strike at the humane impulse which creates debt to perpetuate life and security for millions of destitute American citizens. The United States Chamber of Commerce (the mouth-piece of all big-business monopolies and financial institutions), the Liberty League, and other selfish and unpatriotic agencies are today hindering progress, after their members were saved from ruin by the administration they censure.

Those in Washington today are required to use supercourage in resisting the cunning and tremendous lobby of special interest. Much progressive legislation must yet be passed, and we can but hope that the President and his Congress, after the splendid record of the last 2 years—preserving our Government—will carry on with their reformation for permanent recovery and security for all as will prevent a repetition of the disaster from which we are gradually recovering. Labor and agriculture represent the backbone of our Nation. Happy is the country where those who toil and cultivate the land, own their homes and the land they till. And this must be made possible. Patriotism is born in the woods and fields, by lakes and streams, by crags and plains. In homes, be they where they are, large or small, farming ought to be reasonably profitable. The farmers and laborers have not attended to their own interests as they should. They have in many years gone by been robbed and plundered in a hundred ways. Cunning avarice grasps and holds the net profits of honest toil, and I sincerely trust that when the "new dealers" finish the picture they have started it will reflect the sunset of excess tribute and ours will then be the most prosperous country in the world.

Long ago those in high governmental offices, captains of industry and finance have realized the truth in the fact that present robbery means future bankruptcy.

We hope to reclaim America so that the millions of good, honest working people will be home owners and lovers of home; so that they may have employment at living wages in order to maintain homes as they should be kept and equipped. Homes make patriots. He who has sat by his own fireside with wife and children will defend it. When he hears the word "country" pronounced he thinks of home. It was this type of people who created this Government, defended its honor in battle, pioneered its wilds, developed new land, and through their brains, brawn, and genius raised the standard of American life.

The tax burden on this classification of our citizens has been entirely out of proportion and they should be relieved by the mandate that there shall be no tax-exempt wealth. In this country today there are tens of billions of tax-exempt, interest-bearing securities. Tens of billions of tax-exempt, high-interest-bearing mortgages, while the small home and farm owner is required to submit to a double tax burden to make possible the escape from taxes those far more able to pay.

Today President Roosevelt is keenly interested in the development of hydroelectric power and its distribution to the consuming public. The Bonneville Dam, the Tennessee Valley project, and others prove his determination to adjust a long-existing condition where special privilege has performed without conscience. However, this program, as well as his price-fixing program, and that splendid act which provides for the payment in legal tender in lieu of gold as regards public and private debts, has been taken into Federal courts by certain groups. I rejoice in the victory for the administration as regards the gold clause, but lament the various decisions whereby certain Federal judges decided against the Government in that it has no right to sell power which the Government (and the Government is the people) produces to communities in competition with the excessive rates and established special privileges. I do not condemn the judges of these courts for their adverse decisions in the power question, as they may be complying with their individual interpretations of the Constitution of our Government. They must stay within the word and letter of the present law as regards property rights; but if the law can be so construed, then it should be changed where human rights are in jeopardy. Our Constitution is one of the greatest codes of government, but we face a situation today, after a century and a half of constant change in our social and economic affairs, which leads me to believe that another amendment should be passed and added to that Constitution, whereby when Congress passes a law by a two-thirds majority in both Houses—they, the representatives of the people and sensing their needs—this should be final and outside the jurisdiction of any court of the land.

More legislation of a humane nature must be passed in the near future—pensions for the aged; shorter hours of labor under national regulation; the limiting of interest rates; Government banks; no tax-exempt securities; further expansion of currency; the wringing out of long-standing water in public utilities and industries, and the fixing of honest rates for service and prices of commodities; high levies on excessive incomes; the limitation of incomes; a revision of our judiciary system; high levies against massive estates when the creator thereof has passed on to his reward (whatever that might be); and many other changes as affect the rights of States. The framers of the original Constitution never dreamed of such centralized wealth as we have today or the problems involved in interstate commerce; and if we are to be confronted with the barrier toward human rights and progress with court decrees of "unconstitutional", I maintain again that our Constitution should be amended so that the machinery of constructive legislation in times of emergency can be put in motion for the general welfare without hindrance from the courts. This amendment, in my opinion, would be the greatest safeguard against any complete departure from our established form of government. I believe that when two-thirds of the Members of Congress act on legislation it is a sufficient safeguard and should be final. Delays in any country in meeting the urgent needs and demands of its people are dangerous. We as Americans are particularly and generously blessed by old Mother Nature. Ours is a heritage which kings would covet; and, by the way, in many respects the kings of industry and finance have not only coveted but acquired. When I think of people going hungry in this country who are willing to work, suffering from lack of adequate shelter, and in need of garments, it is like a man starving to death in a well-stocked store with every necessity of life. Our principal error in government has been the tolerance of maldistribution. When one family in this country can amass over $7,000,000,000 in wealth in a generation, and many others hundreds of millions, it is high time to curtail tribute.

In recent years, under the lash of high efficiency, mass production, and our modern man-power-replacing machinery, fast transportation, and with the last frontier removed from new prospective settlers, we have been confronted with a complex problem. The present administration realizes the gravity of affairs, and we can but hope that they will not be as others preceding them in office, who spent their days finding out not what ought to be but what has been; with their backs to the sunrise and worshipping the night. Too many politicians in the past have been interested in only one future event, and that their reelection.

Our problem in Government is to work out our own salvation. Modify our system of government so that it will warrant the utmost respect of every citizen. This, of course, requires Government regulation and interference, and this is just as justifiable in government as when it restrains criminals from violating the human and property rights of others. Whenever monopolies and centralized wealth get strangleholds on the populace, of course, the Government, which is the agency of the people, through its authorized officers, should restrain and dictate.

During the last 5 years in particular, and all my life in general, I have observed that the wealthy think the world has been made for them alone. I have been told that I, like millions of others, should have saved my money when I was working, or enjoying profits in business ventures. That the working people during the prosperous days should not have bought cars, radios, modern farm and household equipment, expensive clothes, etc. But, in my opinion, it has been the demands of the masses for the necessities and luxuries of life, which brought to us our prosperous years. Through our demands upon industry we created employment all the way from woodland and mine to factories; transportation and distribution. I think I speak for the masses when I express my viewpoint, in that there is more in life than mere existence. Civilized people with impulses beyond that of beast want "life" and in more abundance than the slaves of the dead past. It is natural to crave good foods, good clothes, beautiful cars, radios, comfortable beds, and household conveniences. There is pride in possession of a good home and beautiful landscape, and that urge is a noble impulse.

True Americans want the opportunity to work and produce at a reasonable profit. If the millions have buying power, they will again make demands on industry of which they are in reality a part. Americans want to look well and keep well. They want to adorn themselves. In fact, to adorn ourselves seems to be a part of nature, and this desire seems to be everywhere and in everything. I have sometimes thought that the desire for beauty covers the earth with flowers. It is this desire that paints the wings of moths, tints the chamber of the shell, and gives the bird its plumage and its song. With the coordination of our resources and the energies and skill of our citizens, the cravings of normal people can be satisfied.

Jefferson's creed of "man over money, human rights over property rights, equal and exact justice to the rich and poor, with special privilege to none" has been violated. We are living in a fast-moving world of progress, but human rights have been neglected. If we are normal patriots, we should all be students of political science . . . honest and sincere . . . unselfish. Not merely thinking "what can I get out of it", but what can I put in. We should be more than interested in just neighborly gossip. As good citizens we should be students of national and international affairs. We should contribute to society constructive thought and serve with such merit so that we might feel that the census of the universe would not be complete without counting us, and I believe that this meeting tonight was called for the purpose of stimulating us to action; for the encouragement of hope and confidence in our Government—present and future. There should be but one type of democracy in Democrats, and that the true, unadulterated "Jeffersonian democracy", which embraces all of the virtues and none of the vices of all political philosophies. All Democrats should be missionaries of the broad, righteous doctrine of human rights, and fearlessly insist upon the application of those splendid principles. The merchant should have no fear of loss of custom; the professional man no fear of loss of clients; the politician no fear of losing votes; and the preacher no fear of losing his pulpit. Communion with one's own conscience should be of major importance; our greatest reward in life should be in the knowledge that we made the world a little better because we were a part of it.

These are days when it is a duty alike incumbent upon all citizens to think, investigate, and conclude for themselves. Every mind should be true to itself. Of course, wealth and power hate a thinker—precisely for the same reason a robber dislikes a sheriff, or a thief the prosecuting witness; as forgers hate to have the signatures examined by an expert, and the impostor detests curiosity. Tyranny likes courtiers, flatterers, followers—flawners. Much has been said by wealth and power against inflation and insist upon the continuance of the gold standard as the only sound money. I would like to talk on this subject at length tonight, but time does not permit. However, I want to leave this one fact with you, that the sound-money dollar value has ranged under the gold standard all the way from 45 cents to $2.82 in the last 65 years. Just draw your own conclusions. Those who have wealth like to control the monetary system instead of having the Government dominate in issuing money and fixing the value thereof as provided for in our Constitution. The money changers like interest, and lots of it. How does this sound from the pen of Ainsworth R. Spofford, who took the time to figure interest and compound it:

One dollar loaned at 6 percent for 100 years, with the interest collected annually and added to the principal, will amount to $340; at 8 percent, $2,203; at 3 percent, only $19.25; and at 10 percent, which we tolerated in Idaho for many years, $13,809, or about 700 times as much as the 3 percent. Stay out of debt. This interest eats like a cancer. At night, when we should be at peace with the world, in restless slumber, we can feel it gnaw.

Again I infer that the Government should be the guiding influence of the people comprising that Government. It should not permit national and international bankers, industrialists, and utilities to dictate policies and legislation to the detriment of the masses. These should be subservient to the dictates of an authorized government and that government should be fearless of their threats and avoid compromise which is not in the interest of the great majority of our people, who want to be law-abiding patriots; but, patriotism is a flower that thrives best in the soil of justice.

I feel that the American people are appreciative of the courage thus far displayed by the present administration, and hope that our President and Congress will continue steadfast in their high resolve that America enjoy a more abundant life.

At this moment Europe is again sharpening its swords; each nation in a mad rush to outdo the other in deadly implements of warfare, and it is very apparent that they are on the brink of legalized, wholesale slaughter. It should be the policy of this country to remain neutral in the event of another foreign conflict. While I am a strong advocate of preparedness to resist invasion of our own soil and domestic rights, such force and resources should never again be used to protect American financiers' investments abroad. When those under special privilege have exploited American natural resources, the sweat and blood of honest toil and the consuming public—amassing billions in wealth and then, as they have been doing since 1921 in particular, take billions of that wealth and invest it in foreign countries in American-owned factories—using foreign materials and cheaper labor, and thus supplying the foreign trade, which we previously enjoyed and supplied from American plants in the good old United States of America, causing the closing down of domestic factories, and curtailed production in others, why should the millions betrayed protect such foreign investments? When America, where this wealth they transplanted was created, is not good enough for these alleged patriots to live in and invest their fortunes, then let them depend upon the destiny and protection of such countries to which they have diverted so much of their wealth, causing industrial despair in their native land.

Our former experience abroad should be a life-long lesson. The repudiation and refusal of foreign powers to pay America their obligations should conclude any future alliance with countries which are so lacking in international honor. America still has gigantic domestic problems to solve to make this country all that God intended it to be; economically, socially, and spiritually. Let us continue to put our own house in order before attempting to be the big benevolent brother to a hostile world.

As for myself, I think I see the sun beginning to rise in the East after the long night of depression. I feel the vibrations of hope everywhere. The conversations of little business men seem more joyful. The highways and freight trains are not so congested as 3 or 4 years ago with humanity drifting here and there—homeless, hungry, ragged, and discouraged.

The farmer is getting better prices for his products; the banks (and thanks to the Roosevelt bank guaranty act and the new blood the administration added to our monetary circulation) have three billions more deposits than the previous year. Industry, through Government aid and its many C. W. A. and public-works activities, has moved off center, and wheels are picking up momentum.

As Jefferson said years ago, during the formation of the Union, when they, too, had their problems—"A little patience, and we shall see the people recovering their true sight, restoring their Government to its true principles."

In closing, I want to leave this thought with my splendid and appreciative audience. We cannot all attain high office, influence, and affluence, but we can all be good citizens and good neighbors. We can, if we will, make this world a better place in which to live, and love, and labor, as in this quotation, entitled "Patriotism":

He serves his country best who lives pure life and doeth righteous deeds,
And walks straight paths, however others stray;
And leaves his sons, as uttermost bequest a stainless record, which all men may read;
This is the better way.

No drop but serves the slowly lifting tide;
No dew but has an errand to some flowers,
No smallest star but sheds some helpful ray
And man by man, each helping all the rest,
Make the firm bulwark of the country's power;
There is no better way.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Mr. Speaker, on Monday last I secured unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD an address delivered by the Speaker of this House. I failed at that time to ask that there also be included the introductory remarks of the chairman of that meeting, Mr. Cohen. I ask unanimous consent that those introductory remarks may be inserted in conjunction with the remarks of the Speaker in the permanent RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. DUNN of Mississippi, for 10 days, on account of business.

To Mr. MITCHELL of Illinois, for 5 days, on account of business.

SENATE ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

The SPEAKER announced his signature to an enrolled bill and joint resolution of the Senate of the following titles:

S. 282. An act for the relief of William Kemper; and
S. J. Res. 43. Joint resolution for the establishment of a commission for the construction of a Washington-Lincoln Memorial Gettysburg Boulevard connecting the present Lincoln Memorial in the city of Washington with the battlefield of Gettysburg in the State of Pennsylvania.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Friday, May 10, 1935, at 12 o'clock noon.

COMMITTEE HEARINGS

COMMITTEE ON MERCHANT MARINE AND FISHERIES

(Friday, May 10, 10 a. m.)

Hearings on bill (H. R. 5379) to regulate water carriers.

COMMITTEE ON THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

(Friday, May 10, 9:30 a. m.)

Subcommittee on fiscal affairs will hold hearings to consider House Joint Resolution 150, rent profiteering; H. R. 3809, rent commission; and H. R. 7732, rent reduction, room 345, old House Office Building.

8347. By Mr. HEALEY: Resolution of the General Court of Massachusetts, requesting the President of the United States to exercise the powers which he possesses under the National Industrial Recovery Act to the end that the cotton-textile industry throughout our country may proceed under conditions of economic equality, and that the readily apparent burdens which are now laid upon the cotton-textile industry in Massachusetts may be removed, and that Massachusetts manufacturers and Massachusetts operatives may be assured that no discrimination is practiced against them; to the Committee on Appropriations.

8348. Also, resolution of the board of directors of the National Association of Manufacturers of the United States, urging that a joint commission be appointed by Congress to investigate oriental competition and its effect upon American industries; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

8349. Also, resolution of the Common Council of Everett, Mass., stating that they firmly believe that an adjustment of the tariff duties on foreign manufactures and the repeal or modification of the processing tax will save our great New England industries, thereby providing employment for a large proportion of the population; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

8350. Also, resolution of the House of Representatives and Senate of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, requesting the National Recovery Administration to grant speedy relief to the leather boot and shoe industry of this Commonwealth, and that vertical differential in wages is preferable to the existing geographical population and sex differentials, that higher minimum wage scale based on the skill of the shoe workers is preferable to the present minima sanctioned by the National Recovery Administration, and that uniform wages for all shoe factories throughout the Nation seems wise; to the Committee on Appropriations.

8351. Also, resolution of the General Court of Massachusetts, urging Congress and the President of the United States to exercise their powers to provide for a national system of unemployment insurance; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

8352. Also, resolution of the Everett City Council, Everett, Mass., condemning the social service, and requesting that this council go on record as condemning the establishment of an autocratic bureau made up of individuals as efficient as Army officers, who think more of saving a dollar at the expense of the other fellow than of relieving hunger and suffering, and who regimentate their fellowman in a fingerprint method of relief work; to the Committee on Appropriations.

8353. By Mr. KRAMER: Petition of the Southern California Photo Engravers' Association, requesting that the National Recovery Administration continue Photographers' Code for at least another 2-year period; to the Committee on Appropriations.

SENATE

FRIDAY, MAY 10, 1935

The Reverend Harry Lee Doll, assistant rector of Epiphany Episcopal Church of Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

O Lord Jesus Christ, who didst face the world alone and unafraid, strong in the knowledge and love of Thy Father, help us to live so close to Thee that we may partake of Thy unbounded courage and meet the responsibilities which Thou hast intrusted to our care, upheld by Thy power and might. We ask it for Thy name's sake. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. ROBINSON, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of the calendar day Thursday, May 9, 1935, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

PURCHASE OF FOREIGN BEEF BY THE ARMY

Mr. BORAH and Mr. CAREY, jointly, submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 134), which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

Whereas it is reported that there are now pending before the War Department bids on contracts for the purchase of beef for the use of the United States Army in the Philippine Islands; and

Whereas it is reported that the contract will be let for the purchase of Argentine or Australian beef: Therefore be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the bid for supplying foreign beef be rejected; and that hereafter no foreign beef or beef products shall be purchased for the use of the United States Army.

EXPERIMENTAL FARM AT BELTSVILLE, MD.—E. W. SHEETS

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The legislative clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 126), submitted by Mr. CAREY on the 3d instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed to investigate the cost of the construction, development, and expansion of the experimental farm of the Department of Agriculture at Beltsville, Md., and to investigate the circumstances connected with the demotion or dismissal of E. W. Sheets, formerly head of the Division of Animal Husbandry of the Bureau of Animal Industry in the Department of Agriculture, with a view to determining the connection, if any, between such demotion or dismissal and the construction, development, and expansion of said experimental farm. The committee shall report to the Senate, as soon as practicable, the result of its investigations, together with its recommendations.

For the purposes of this resolution the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions and recesses of the Senate in the Seventy-fourth and succeeding Congresses, to employ such clerical and other assistants, to require by subpoena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, and to make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $1,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman.

Mr. ROBINSON. I suggest to the Senator from Wyoming that the resolution should go first to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. CAREY. I have no objection to that reference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

PUBLICITY ACTIVITIES OF GOVERNMENTAL AGENCIES

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate another resolution coming over from a preceding day, which will be read.

The legislative clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 131) submitted by Mr. DICKINSON on the 7th instant, as follows:

Whereas there is a specific restriction in the law prohibiting printing of any material in any form without direct authorization of law; and

Whereas various departments of the Government and various emergency bureaus are publishing miscellaneous and promiscuous reports; and

Whereas same emergency bureaus are publishing pamphlets and newspapers, both in multigraph and printed form; and

Whereas the expense, both for personnel employed and the cost of printing, is a large item; and

Whereas various bureaus of the Government, at the expense of the taxpayer, are having prepared and presenting to the public motion pictures and displays; and

Whereas various bureaus of the Government are setting up information booths inviting the public to go into debt in remodeling their homes; and

Whereas, either directly or indirectly, radio information is given to the public setting forth the benefits of remodeling homes, and suggesting that the Government will loan the money therefor: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed to make an investigation with a view to determining (1) the authority under which such information is being printed and disseminated; (2) the cost incident to such printing and dissemination, including personnel, motion-picture production, multigraphing, and distribution costs; and (3) all expenditures made since March 4, 1933, by any executive department, independent commission, board, bureau, office, agency, or other establishment of the Government incident to such printing and dissemination. The committee shall report to the Senate, as soon as practicable, the result of its investigation, together with its recommendations.

For the purposes of this resolution, the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions and recesses of the Senate in the Seventy-fourth and succeeding Congresses, to employ such clerical and other assistants, to require by subpoena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, and to make such expenditures, as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expense of the committee, which shall not exceed $25,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate, upon vouchers approved by the chairman.

Mr. ROBINSON. I suggest that that resolution go over for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie over.

REPORT OF BUSINESS ADVISORY COUNCIL

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate another resolution coming over from a preceding day, which will be read.

The legislative clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 132) submitted by Mr. STEIWER on the 7th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the President is respectfully requested to transmit to the Senate, as soon as practicable, the complete report recently filed with him by the Business Advisory Council appointed by the Secretary of Commerce.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, in resolutions directed to the President requesting information it is customary to incorporate the phrase, "if not incompatible with the public interest." I offer that amendment to the resolution, to come in after the word "Senate", on line 2.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. In line 2, after the word "Senate", it is proposed to insert the words "if not incompatible with the public interest."

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

OCEAN STEAMSHIP SUBSIDIES

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, in the near future there will come before the Senate the new measure which, for want of a better term, we are going to refer to as the subsidy bill, involving the granting of direct subsidies to steamship lines.

Last year the Senate was edified and very much informed concerning the mail subsidies which were a part of the old subsidy plan of the Jones-White Act, enacted in 1928. The Postmaster General made a report on these subsidies and ocean-mail contracts, and that report has been presented to the Senate and is now on the desks of Senators in two volumes, being a letter from the Postmaster General to the Chairman of the Special Committee to Investigate Air Mail and Ocean Mail Contracts.

Mr. President, that is one of the most interesting reports I have seen since I became a Member of this body. Strange as it may seem, for some reason the press of the country has made little or no reference to this report, which is a very startling one. It contains information which, in my judgment, should be in the hands of every voter in this country.

So far as I have been able to ascertain, only one newspaper has published anything like a complete and intelligible summary of Mr. Farley's report. That summary was recently published in the Journal of Commerce, of New York. I think Mr. Farley has done a very fine and courageous piece of work in this report. He has given the people of the country information which, as I have indicated, ought to be in the hands of every voter.

As a part of my remarks I ask to have printed in the RECORD at this point the summary to which I refer.

There being no objection, the summary was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Journal of Commerce]

FARLEY SHIP REPORTS URGE CANCELSATIONS FOR 19 MAIL AWARDS—ELEVEN STEAMSHIP INTERESTS, THROUGH 16 COMPANIES, HOLD CONTRACTS IN QUESTION—RECOMMENDATIONS MADE IN DATA ISSUED BY BLACK—COPELAND, BLAND TO PUSH SUBSIDY HEARINGS—CITE OCTOBER 3 DEAD LINE FOR DECISION ON AWARDS

By Lee P. Hart

WASHINGTON, May 3.—Specific recommendations for cancellation of 19 of the 43 existing ocean mail contracts are contained in the individual contract reports based on findings of the Post Office Department's investigation made public today by Senator BLACK (Democrat, Alabama), chairman of the Senate committee which conducted an inquiry into shipping subsidies last year.

Eleven steamship interests, through 16 companies, hold the 19 contracts whose cancellation, according to Department estimates, would result in savings to the Government of nearly $100,000,000, representing mail pay during the balance of the 10-year contracts.

AFFECTED LINES GIVEN

The contractors and the foreign ocean-mail routes involved are: Munson Steamship Line (no. 4), Gulf Mail Steamship Co. (no. 22), Export Steamship Corporation (no. 5), American South African Line (no. 6), Grace Steamship Co. (nos. 8 and 38), Panama Mail Steamship Co. (no. 37), Eastern Steamship Lines (nos. 15 and 53), American Scantic Line (no. 16), American West African Line (nos. 17 and 47), Atlantic & Caribbean Steam Navigation Co. (no. 18), Colombian Steamship Co. (no. 19), New York & Cuba Mail Steamship Co. (nos. 2 and 21), Lykes Bros. Steamship Co. (no. 23), Tampa Intercean Steamship Co. (no. 45), and Lykes Bros.-Ripley Steamship Co. (no. 57).

These contracts were dealt with in the hitherto undisclosed 13 individual reports which Postmaster General Farley submitted to President Roosevelt on January 11, along with his general report on the investigation, contained in the Black committee document known as "part I." Reports on the remaining 24 contracts are now being printed and will be made public next week. They are said to be "typical" of the reports made available today.

The contractors, many of whom were in attendance today at the hearings on the Copeland-Bland ship subsidy bill before Senate and House committees, regarded the Post Office Department's recommendations as "drastic", but they pointed out that in only a few instances did the reports state the contracts "should be canceled", and noted the language generally used was "may be canceled."

HOLD CONTRACTS VALID

They all hold their contracts are valid and refer to Comptroller General McCarl's authorization for disbursements under the contracts to support their contention. They also intend to take the issue to the courts if the President should act in accordance with the Department's recommendations.

Publication of the reports precipitated discussions both among congressional leaders and shipping interests as to the possible effect it will have upon pending legislation, which is designed to enable the President to substitute direct subsidies for the present mail contract system for providing support to the merchant marine.

Chairmen of both congressional committees, Senator COPELAND (Democrat), New York, and Representative BLAND (Democrat), Virginia, of the Senate Commerce Committee and House Merchant Marine Committee, respectively, announced hearings on the measure would proceed without interruption and pointed out the President's authority to modify or cancel the contracts has been extended to October 31 by resolution amending the Independent Offices Appropriation Act of 1934.

Senator BLACK received the individual reports from Postmaster General Farley on April 19 "in compliance with instructions from the President." As H. A. Blomquist, aid to the Black committee, was distributing the reports, the Senator called attention of the Senate to the document which had been placed on the desk of each Senator.

SHARP CRITICISM MADE

The Postmaster General's general report on the investigation, which was conducted by Assistant Postmasters General W. W. Howes and Harlee Branch, and the Solicitor, Karl A. Crowley, contained sharp criticism of the ocean mail contracts. The report charged the contractors have wasted and diverted funds received from the Government and recommended decided changes in the administration of shipping subsidies. Dealing with individual contracts, it outlined steps which could be taken, such as cancellation of contracts or reclaiming of vessels and recovery of amounts of outstanding indebtedness.

The individual reports, contained in the 205-page Senate committee document, summarized evidence developed in the investigation and gave conclusions and recommendations together with effect of cancellation and possible modifications of contracts awarded under the Jones-White Act of 1928.

Summary of the reports follows:

Munson Steamship Lines and Gulf Mail Steamship Co.: The contract on route no. 4 (New York to South America) "may be canceled", for there could be and there was no competitive bidding on the route as required by law. Specifications, including the service to be performed, and types, sizes, and speed of ships to be operated over it, precisely conformed to the then existing service and equipment of the Munson Line, and the time elapsing between the date when the route was advertised and the date when performance was demanded "did not permit formulation of an intelligent bid by any part other than Munson Steamship Line."

PROSPECTIVE BIDDER FIGURES

Further, it was held a prospective bidder other than Munson Steamship Line would have been met by 2 years of guaranteed directly competitive operation on the route by the contractor.

"This contract was let in violation of the public interest, for when it was let the Government was entitled, without expenditure of any money to receive adequate service over this route for a period of at least 2 years."

Cancellation of the contract will effect a saving of $5,117,680, less payments made since July 1, 1934. The Munson Line will be deprived of a similar amount of revenue over a period ending August 1, 1938.

EFFECT OF CANCELSATION

Effect of canceling this contract and depriving the line of this amount of revenue over this period will be "disastrous." The line is now in bankruptcy with very large outstanding liabilities and practically no cash or liquid assets.

Collection of the full amount of outstanding indebtedness to the Shipping Board will be further jeopardized. This indebtedness totaled as of June 30, 1934, $2,537,000 and is secured by first preferred mortgages on vessels having a depreciated value (cost plus betterments, less depreciation) of $2,440,365 on June 13, 1934.

Discussing the Munson Line's Gulf mail route no. 22 (New Orleans to Progreso, Mexico), the Department stated it "may be canceled for failure to substitute the new vessel required to be furnished in 1932." The full performance of this contract is not required in the public interest, and its commercial value is negligible, and it has no postal value.

Cancellation of the contract will result in a saving of $305,647, less payments made since June 30, 1934, which have not been large on account of the fact that only 11 voyages have been made. The Munson Line will be deprived of this amount of revenue which it otherwise would receive over a period ending June 1, 1939.

EFFECT OF ACTION

The effect of the deprivation of revenue upon the general operations of the line are discussed in the possible modifications of Munson contracts, which are regarded as "peculiarly complex."

"If, within 90 days, satisfactory progress toward proper reorganization has not been made, it is believed that the Government should take all available legal steps to reclaim the vessels, American Legion, Pan American, Southern Cross, and Western World, and to recover, insofar as may be possible, the amount of outstanding indebtedness of this company to the Shipping Board. Should this action result, as it may, in the inability of the Munson Line further to perform its contract for service over route no. 4, it would be advisable for the Government to make other provision for the maintenance of a service from New York to the East Coast of South America."

Export Steamship Corporation: This contract, covering route no. 5 (New York to Mediterranean and Black Sea ports), "may be canceled as having been let in violation of the law requiring competitive bidding, and upon the further ground that it was contrary to the public interest in that the Export Steamship Corporation was bound contractually to perform adequate service over the route for not less than 5 years of the contract term. It is estimated that from November 1, 1934, to the end of the contract term there will be paid an amount in excess of poundage rate of $7,751,457.

While full effect of cancellation to this contractor cannot be accurately forecast, it would unquestionably be "very damaging." In this connection it may be pointed out that as of June 30, 1934, the contractor was indebted to the Shipping Board in the amount of $6,885,812. This amount was secured by first preferred mortgages on ships having a net book value as of that date of $9,669,999.

If the contract is not canceled, then it "may be modified." The line is a bona fide mail carrier and operates over an important trade route.

Under present economic conditions it is clear that the route cannot be operated by the contractor except with some measure of assistance from the Government. It is believed, however, that a detailed survey of the needs of the route, together with possible alteration of the character of the service and putting into effect more economical operations would permit continuation of the trade and postal advantages and at the same time effect substantial savings to the Government.

"The precise amount which can be saved is not susceptible of accurate determination until decisions are reached as to the exact service to be maintained and what operating economics can be put into effect. Present operations appear to be economical and the frequency of service approximately what it should be."

SOUTH AFRICAN LINE

South African Line: The contract for route no. 6 (New York by Capetown, South Africa, to Beira, Portuguese East Africa) "may be canceled" without any offer of compensation for the following reasons:

1. It was not awarded as a result of competitive bidding, as required by law.

2. Full performance is not required in the public interest "because it is apparent that the contractor can and has in normal times made a substantial profit without Government aid."

GRACE STEAMSHIP CO.

Grace Steamship Co. and Panama Mail Steamship Co.: Contracts for routes nos. 8, 37, and 38 (New York to Valparaiso, San Francisco to Habana, and Tacoma, Wash., to Valparaiso) "may be canceled because they were awarded in violation of the law requiring that such contracts be let upon competitive bids." Contracts were "negotiated" and specifications, compensation, and construction requirements so arranged, together with times of advertisement and dates when performance was demandable, that there could have been and was in each instance only one bidder, the selected agency of the Grace interests.

EFFECT OF CANCELATIONS

Effect of cancellation is given as follows:

1. The United States will save the sum of $13,119,525, less payments made between July 1, 1934, and the effective date of cancellation, which payments have been averaging $218,171 per month. Delay in cancellation will effect a decrease in the amount which may be saved slightly in excess of $7,000 per day.
2. The Grace interests will be deprived of $13,119,525, but will be released from their obligations to maintain the services and transport the mails.
3. The mails (except from San Francisco to La Libertad, which may be delayed 1 day) will move with equal or greater expedition.
4. No construction demandable under the contracts will be prevented, all such construction being now completed.
5. Collection of loans made through the Shipping Board to the contractors will not be imperiled, as the companies are entirely responsible and the book value of the ships securing these loans by first preferred mortgages exceeds the amount of the loans by $4,971,458.

MODIFICATION IS PROVIDED

"While it may be doubted if sound public policy permits continuation in any form of contracts let in violation of law, if these contracts are to be recognized at all, they may be modified, except the contract on route no. 37 as the contractor's vessels operate in the protected intercoastal trade in competition with American-flag shipping which does not enjoy Government aid."

EASTERN STEAMSHIP LINES

Eastern Steamship Lines—contracts for routes nos. 15 and 52 (Boston to Yarmouth and New York to Yarmouth) "may be canceled."

They were awarded in violation of law requiring competitive bidding, which did not exist.

Full performance of neither contract is required in the public interest, according to the report. Cancellation of the contracts will result in saving of $3,568,208, less amounts paid subsequent to June 30, 1934.

Possible modifications of the contracts called for reduced frequency of sailings, and it is recommended that if they are continued there be taken into consideration advisability of requiring the contractor to divorce itself from all intercoastal and coastwise shipping operators, either directly or indirectly by affiliates, subsidiaries, or otherwise.

AMERICAN SCANTIC LINE

American Scantic Line—This contract on route no. 16 (New York to Scandinavian ports) "may be canceled on the ground that there could be and was no competitive bidding on the route, and the specifications for vessels to be operated over it precisely conformed to the route then operated and the vessels owned by the line."

Cancellation will effect a saving of not less than $3,854,397, the excess of contract pay over the American poundage rate from July 1, 1934, to the end of the contract term.

Suggestions for modification of the contract are set out.

West African Line: Contracts for routes nos. 17 and 47 (New York to West African ports, and New Orleans to West Africa), "may be canceled" for the reason that they were awarded after being negotiated and without opportunity for competitive bidding. It appears that the contract on no. 17 has been breached by the failure to place in operation the required vessel of class 3.

If it be deemed not in the public interest to cancel either or both of these contracts the contractor "should be required to completely divorce itself from foreign-flag connections either through holding, subsidiary, or affiliated companies and the mail pay should be substantially reduced, by reduction in contract sailings to a point where the contractor will not receive the unreasonable profits which it now receives with the present mail pay."

ATLANTIC & CARIBBEAN LINE

Atlantic & Caribbean Steam Navigation Co. (Red D Line): Contract for route no. 18 (New York to Maracaibo, Venezuela) "may be canceled", having been awarded in violation of the law requiring competitive bidding and the contractor having failed to put into operation on the route an additional vessel of class 5. Cancellation will effect a saving of $1,355,953, the estimated contract pay in excess of the amount which will be necessary to transport the mails at the American poundage rate. If the contract be not canceled, modifications are outlined.

COLOMBIAN S. S. CO.

Colombian S. S. Co.: Contract for route no. 19 (New York to Puerto Colombia) "may be immediately canceled" on the ground it was illegally awarded. Mail may be sent over this route, if the contract be canceled, at American poundage rates at a saving of $581,639 per year, based on the past year's performance and considering the present rate of pay.

Modifications set forth included a requirement that the Government be reimbursed in the sum of $344,266, representing the amount of overpayment due to improper classification of vessels originally accepted under the contract.

NEW YORK AND CUBAN MAIL

New York & Cuban Mail Steamship Co. (Ward Line)—Contracts for routes nos. 20 and 21 (New York to Habana and New York via Habana and Progreso to Vera Cruz) "may be canceled" without any offer of compensation for the following reasons:

1. The contracts were negotiated and competitive bidding was precluded.
2. Full performance of the contract is not required in the public interest.

MODIFICATION IS SUGGESTED

If it be deemed not in the public interest to cancel these contracts then savings may be effected by modification of the contracts in the following respects:

(a) Reclassification of the Oriente on route no. 20 so as to classify it as class 3 instead of class 2. The estimated savings which may thereby be effected from November 1, 1934, to the end of the contract term is $483,838.

(b) Reclassification of vessels on route no. 21 so as to classify them as class 6 instead of class 5. The estimated savings which may be effected by such reclassification from November 1, 1934, to the end of the contract term is $614,176.

Reduction in sailings is recommended, and it is further recommended that if these contracts be continued there be taken into consideration the advisability of requiring the contractor to divorce itself from all intercoastal and coastwise shipping operations, either directly or indirectly by affiliates, subsidiaries, or otherwise.

LYKES BROS. STEAMSHIP CO.

Lykes Bros. Steamship Co., Tampa-Interocean Steamship Co., and Lykes Bros.-Ripley Steamship Co. contracts for routes nos. 23, 45, and 57 (Galveston to Santo Domingo City, New Orleans to Spain, and Gulf ports to United Kingdom and the Far East) are considered in three separate reports. In each report the Department recommends cancellation of the contracts which involve an estimated aggregate expenditure of approximately $35,622,063. Cancellations would result in savings approximately of $27,000,000, representing the balance to be paid under the contracts.

"After a review of the record of the Lykes Bros.' activities, one is compelled to the conclusion that the effect of their dealings with the Government has been a distinct detriment to the American merchant marine", the report stresses.

The Lykes Bros., whose contracts were subjected to 3 weeks of investigation before the Department, have, as a result of operating Shipping Board vessels and through their several mail contracts, "made large profits on a small original capital investment", according to the report.

"The record shows that in their dealings with the Shipping Board and the Post Office Department they have been actuated largely by a desire to obtain as much from the Government as possible upon minimum commitments looking to the upbuilding of the American merchant marine", concluded the report.

Steamship interests whose contracts will be considered in the reports set out in part II of the Black committee document are United Fruit Co., Gulf Pacific Mail Line, States Steamship Co., Waterman Steamship Co., Dollar Lines, Tacoma Oriental Steamship Co., Mississippi Shipping Co., Oceanic & Oriental Navigation Co. (American Hawaiian and Matson Lines), Oceanic Steamship Co. (Matson), Roosevelt-International Mercantile Marine Co. (United States Lines and Panama Pacific Lines), Baltimore Mail Line, American Diamond Lines, Pacific-Argentine-Brazil Line, and South Atlantic Steamship Co.

TEXTUAL SUMMARY OF REPORT ON OCEAN MAIL CONTRACTS

WASHINGTON, May 7.—Following is a textual summary of the findings and recommendations on ocean mail contracts made public today:

OCEANIC STEAMSHIP CO. (MATSON LINE)

Contract for route no. 24 (San Francisco by Honolulu, Pago Pago, and Suva to Sydney, Australia) may be canceled "because it was awarded in violation of the law which requires competitive bidding and the advertisements of the route were so framed and worded and limited bids in such a manner as to preclude competitive bidding, and did accomplish this result." It is further concluded that this contract was "improvident so far as it resulted in the contractor receiving a 100-percent increase in mail pay for an identical service with identical ships until the new ships were commissioned, one in 1931 and one in 1932."

Because this route is an important mail and trade route, and because the contractor's pay since the construction of the new vessels does not appear to be exorbitant, "it is felt that no savings in the public interest can be made by any substantial modifications of the contract unless it is deemed advisable to require the contractor to reimburse the Government for the excess pay which it received on the improper classification of the steamships Ventura, Sierra, and Somona, which excess is estimated to be $1,457,970.80."

If it be deemed in the public interest not to cancel this contract, then it is recommended that "there be taken into consideration the advisability of requiring the contractor to fully and completely divorce itself from all intercoastal and coastwise shipping operations, either directly or indirectly through affiliated subsidiaries or otherwise."

Discussing the results of the contract to the Government, the report states the route is now served by "two of the newest, most modern, and speediest combination passenger and cargo vessels (Mariposa and Monterey) in operation on the Pacific." A third sister ship (Lurline) was constructed and qualified for service on the mail route in the event of a demand for an increased frequency on the route or in the event of any contingency which might arise, such as the loss or temporary withdrawal of either of the two ships now serving the route.

These three ships were constructed at a total cost of approximately $24,600,000, as compared with the total estimated mail pay of $8,935,413. At June 30, 1934, the contractor was indebted to the Shipping Board in the amount of $10,509,750, incident to construction loans on these ships. Of this amount the sum of $8,174,250 will fall due after the expiration of the present mail contract.

DOLLAR LINES

Dollar Steamship Line, no. 25 (San Francisco by Honolulu to Sydney, Australia); Dollar Steamship Lines, Inc., Ltd., no. 27 (San Francisco by Honolulu to Colombo), and Admiral Oriental Line (American Mail Line) no. 26 (Seattle by Yokohama to Manila). These three contracts may be canceled for the following reasons:

1. They were negotiated without opportunity for competitive bidding.

2. Contract no. 27 may be canceled after August 30, 1935, for failure to provide the new class 3 ship required by the contract.

3. Cancellation of contracts 25 and 27 may be indirectly brought about by having the Shipping Board exercise its foreclosure rights.

If it be deemed not in the public interest to cancel these three contracts, it is recommended that contract-mail-pay sailings be equitably reduced on the routes and that the contractors be required to set up adequate earmarked reserve funds to provide in due time for necessary replacements. The contractors should also be required definitely to limit salaries, dividends, and cash withdrawals by the four principal officers, directors, and stockholders. Arrangements should also be made to preclude large cash withdrawals from subsidiary and affiliated companies serving the mail-contracting companies, and arrangements should be made to revise payments by the mail contractors for such services so as to limit the affiliated companies' profits to a reasonable return on the necessary invested capital.

Consideration should also be given to the question of requiring the contractors to discontinue their intercoastal service, except by route no. 27 (round-the-world), on which latter route it appears that the contractor should not be permitted to carry intercoastal cargo.

If these contracts are canceled, service can be continued on route no. 26, but cannot be continued on routes nos. 25 and 27 under present trade conditions. At June 30, 1934, the Dollar Lines, contractors on routes nos. 25 and 27, owed the Shipping Board $16,684,479. Of this amount $1,119,701 was past due on construction loans and $947,500 would have been past due on ship sales notes if extensions and reextensions had not been granted. The contractor on route no. 26 had prepaid all ship-sales notes falling due prior to June 17, 1937, after which $855,000 will fall due. If the contracts are continued as at present, the contractors will receive about $18,000,000 in excess of the American poundage rates, whereas they owe the Government a total of $17,539,479.

"The evidence shows," continues this report, "that in 1925 when Government aid on the Dollar routes was limited to fostering a monopoly of American-flag ships for this company as a result of low-priced ship sales, Messrs. R. Stanley Dollar, J. Harold Dollar, H. M. Lorber, and Herbert Fleishacker withdrew, in cash, the total sum of $162,000. If this rate of withdrawal had been maintained during the first 5½ years of foreign ocean-mail contract operations (Jan. 1, 1929, to June 30, 1934), the withdrawals would have totaled $891,000 instead of the $2,762,257 actually withdrawn as shown by the evidence. This indicates an increase in personal cash withdrawals of $1,871,257, which amount closely approximates the delinquencies in the Dollar Lines' obligations to the Government.

STATES STEAMSHIP CO.

"Contracts for routes nos. 28 and 29 (Portland, Oreg., via Yokohama to Manila and Portland via Shanghai to Dairen, China) may be canceled because they were awarded in violation of the law which requires competitive bidding and for the further reason that in view of the existing obligations of the contractor and facilities then available for the transportation of the mail over the same route the letting of the contracts were against the public interest.

"It is found as a fact that foreign ocean-mail routes nos. 28 and 29 are without postal value; that at the time when these routes were certified and contracts let the routes were in existence and operated by this contractor, who was bound to continue their operation for a period of 5 years, and that the mail could have been transported over the route at the American poundage rate for sums of money greatly below the sums which have been paid under the contracts. It is further found that the operation of chartered vessels has cost the Government the sum of $753,440 and that the contractor was permitted to make a particular voyage which was useless to the Government but for which the sum of $15,370 was paid under the contract.

"The Government is directly protected from loss on the outstanding indebtedness by first-preferred mortgages or ships with a net book value of $665,406.48 as of December 31, 1933.

"Consideration should be given to a requirement that the contractor divorce itself absolutely from operation in the protected intercoastal trade."

OCEANIC & ORIENTAL NAVIGATION CO., AMERICAN-HAWAIIAN & MATSON

Contracts for routes nos. 30, 31, 48, and 49 (Los Angeles to Auckland, New Zealand; Los Angeles to Melbourne, Australia; San Francisco via Yokohama to Dairen, China; and San Francisco via Shanghai to Saigon) may be canceled for the following reasons:

"(1) Because they were not awarded as the result of competitive bidding as provided by law, but on the other hand were awarded as the result of negotiations between the contractor, the Post Office Department, and the Shipping Board.

"(2) The service having been established and guaranteed for a period of 5 years from the date of sale of the vessels, it was contrary to public policy to award the main contracts solely for the purpose of granting a subsidy to these four established trade routes.

"(3) Because the contracts on foreign ocean mail routes 30, 31, 48, and 49 are not and never were intended to be in accordance with the requirements of the Postal Service nor for the purpose of providing an adequate postal service 'between the ports.'

"If the contracts are not canceled they may be modified to provide for a replacement program which will result in the existence of a serviceable fleet adequate to maintain operations on the routes subsequent to the expiration dates of the present postal contracts.

"The replacement program might be best carried into effect by a provision for the creation of a special fund for that purpose and a recapture clause so that this fund would return to the Government if an attempt were made to utilize it for any purpose other than that for which it was set aside.

"Routes 30 and 31 should be consolidated at a rate of pay not in excess of the rate now allowed on route 31, which will result in a saving to the Government for the balance of the contract term of $636,525.

"Routes 48 and 49 may possibly be consolidated at a rate of pay not exceeding the rate now allowed on route 42, and if such consolidation were made it would result in savings to the Government of $2,004,691.50.

"If it be deemed in the public interest not to cancel this contract, then it is recommended that there be taken into consideration the advisability of requiring the contractor to fully and completely divorce itself from all intercoastal and coastwise shipping operations, either directly or indirectly through affiliates, subsidiaries, or otherwise.

AMERICAN LINE STEAMSHIP CORPORATION (PANAMA PACIFIC)

Contract for route no. 32 (New York by Colon to Balboa) may be canceled because it was not awarded as a result of competitive bidding.

Other recommendations and conclusions follow:

"(1) The letting of this contract was not necessary to afford an adequate postal service between the ports served.

"(2) The payments under the contract have not served to assist in the upbuilding of the American merchant marine as no construction is required and as the vessels in service were constructed and arranged to be constructed prior to the advertisement of the mail contract.

"(3) The contractor has been improperly paid for service between Cristobal and Balboa, 38 miles, when no service has been rendered between those ports.

"(4) The payments under this contract are a mere gratuity to the contractor and are discriminatory as against 23 other intercoastal lines operating under the American flag without mail pay aid and consequently serve as a detriment to the American merchant marine.

"(5) If this contract is canceled, the contractor will suffer no damages as it was performing the service required by the contract before the contract was made, and it has not obligated itself to build new vessels.

RECOMMENDATION

"(1) The contract may be canceled because it was not awarded as a result of competitive bidding.

"(2) Although the ships operated under this contract stop at Habana and Cristobal, it is an intercoastal route operating from New York to California and is discriminatory against 25 other coastal routes that do not have mail contracts.

"(3) If it be deemed not in the public interest to cancel the contract, it is recommended that it be modified by the curtailment to show Cristobal as the terminus and, further, that the payments be reduced to the amount the contractor would receive for transporting the mails on the American poundage basis. Such a modification would result in an annual saving of about $350,000 per year, or a total saving during the balance of the contract term of approximately $1,485,000."

UNITED STATES LINES

Contracts for routes nos. 42, 43, and 44 (New York to London; New York by Plymouth and Cherbourg to Hamburg; New York by Cherbourg to Southampton) may be canceled on the ground that they were entered into without competitive bidding. Other recommendations and conclusions follow:

RECOMMENDATIONS

"(1) The contracts may be canceled on the grounds that they were entered into without competitive bidding, as hereinbefore outlined.

"(2) Contract 44, from New York to London, does not require any construction of new vessels, and in the absence of such an obligation, it is believed that the service can be carried on without the aid of mail pay.

"(3) If it be deemed not in the public interest to cancel the contract on route 43, it is recommended that the United States Lines Co. (Nevada), subcontractor, be required to reduce the operating and management commissions being paid the Roosevelt Steamship Co., amounting to approximately 19 percent of the gross voyage revenue (excluding mail) of the subcontractor, to a reasonable and fair commission charge for the service rendered.

"It appears that if this is done the condition of the United States Lines Co. (Nevada) may be improved to an extent that it may be possible to effect a reduction in the mail pay on route 43. It is also recommended that consideration be given to a requirement that the subcontractor divorce itself from any connection with affiliates, subsidiary, or holding companies operating in the intercoastal trade or under foreign flag.

"If contract no. 44 (to London) is canceled, it is believed that, as already pointed out, the service can continue without Government aid. If contract no. 43 (to Hamburg by fast liners Manhattan and Washington) is canceled, it is probable that some aid will be required by the contractor to continue the service, unless the poundage mail increases sufficiently to offset the present difference between the mileage and the poundage pay.

"(1) A thorough consideration of the operations of the International Mercantile Marine Co. leads one to the conviction that it is unwise and economically unsound for this Government to pay out immense sums as aid for the building of an American merchant marine and then permit their control through a network of holding subsidiary, and affiliated companies which may in any manner permit the dissipation of the funds provided for ship construction and operation.

"If funds are to be provided for insuring the service, which is admittedly the most important to this country, the aid should be given only to a company or to companies directly owned by the investors and not controlled by holding companies.

"(2) These contracts were made after their provisions had been negotiated by the bidder and officials of the Post Office Department. The service called for was that then being performed by the bidder, and the type, size, and speed of vessels required by the advertisements were the vessels then owned by the contractor, which were the only vessels then available for service on the routes. The time allowed for the submission of bids was not sufficient to enable others than the bidders to arrange to submit bids.

"(3) The bids were fatally defective when opened, and, instead of being rejected and new advertisements issued, the bidder was permitted to alter the bids so as to make them conform to the advertisements.

"(4) Service was guaranteed over these routes by the ship-sales agreement with the Shipping Board of 10 years from April 8, 1929, and a performance bond in the sum of $2,500,000 was required of the purchaser. However, the subcontractor was not required to furnish the Shipping Board a performance bond when it purchased the ship-sales mortgage notes. Service was required by mail contract 44 for 5 years from April 24, 1930, with provision for automatic extension for 5 years additional. Contract 43 requires service for 10 years from March 4, 1931. As the lines were carrying mails at poundage rates there appears to have been no postal or trade necessity for the establishment of the mail routes.

"(5) Both of these routes are important mail routes. Route 43 is more essential than route 44. The contract on route 44 expires on April 24, 1935. On this route the United States Lines, Inc. (Delaware), made a voyage profit of $1,921,325.12 on 81 voyages for the period from April 24, 1930, to December 8, 1931. The United States Lines Co. (Nevada) made a voyage profit on 56 voyages from December 9, 1931, to December 31, 1932, of $1,167,939.80. The detailed figures for 1933-34 are not available. The total voyage profit on the 137 voyages for the period of approximately 2 years 7 months was $3,089,264.92. This gross voyage profit is before inclusion of overhead expenses, depreciation on vessels, and interest on Shipping Board loans. Deduct from this sum the total mail pay for the period, less what it would have cost on the American poundage basis, or $1,742,401.73, and there will be a voyage profit of $1,346,863.19, without the mail-contract pay before depreciation, interest, and overhead."

It is estimated that had all intercompany profits, that is, profits on commissions, wharfage, etc., been eliminated and the overhead kept at a minimum, depreciation on vessels figured at cost, the companies would have broken about even for the period under discussion without a mail contract. If such a showing can be made in depression years, then it is reasonable to assume that the vessels in this particular service can be operated at a fair profit in normal times without the aid of a mail contract.

"(6) Both are essential trade routes."

SOUTH ATLANTIC STEAMSHIP CO. OF DELAWARE

Contract covering ocean mail route no. 33, from Savannah, Ga., via Brest to Liverpool, and from Savannah via Plymouth to Bremen, Germany, including service to any other ports at which the vessels may voluntarily call, on a schedule satisfactory to the Postmaster General of not less than 36 trips per annum, which may be increased with the approval of the Postmaster General to not more than 52 trips per annum on the two branches of the route. The officially determined outbound voyage distance between the ports, which constitutes the mileage for the basis of mail pay, is 3,630 miles to Liverpool and 4,149 miles to Bremen. Before the fleet of vessels which operate on foreign ocean mail route no. 33 were sold to the contractor by the United States Shipping Board on October 11, 1928, they were operated for the Government as the American Palmetto Line by the South Atlantic Steamship Line, of which E. S. Trosdal, of Savannah, Ga., was the president.

It is noted that:

"When the Government sold the fleet to the South Atlantic Steamship Co. of Delaware the ships had a book value of $1,325,634.50 more than was paid for them by the purchaser and which was intended to be, and was, a subsidy granted in consideration of the 5 years' guaranteed service of 36 voyages per annum required under the sales contract of October 11, 1928. The mail contract which was awarded to the South Atlantic Steamship Co. of Delaware is in the nature of a further subsidy to the contractor which thus became the beneficiary of a double subsidy.

"In order to crystallize the benefactions which the United States has bestowed and, if this contract is continued in effect, will have ultimately given to the South Atlantic Steamship Co. of Delaware, both directly and indirectly, there is tabulated below the sums above mentioned:

Difference between book value of fleet and sales price (Oct. 11, 1928, contract)	$1,325,634.57
Difference between book value and sales price of Georgian and Floridian	376,318.00
Amounts spent by Shipping Board reconditioning original fleet before sale	201,213.09
Total amount of mail pay for the entire contract term (estimated)	3,579,450.00
Total	5,482,615.66

"It is concluded that this contract may be canceled for the reason that it is a contract awarded as a result of negotiations between the contractor, the postal officials, and the United States Shipping Board, and was not awarded as a result of competitive bidding as required by law.

"If it be deemed in the public interest that this contract be not canceled, it may be modified by requiring the contractor to give assurance of the prompt commencement of a construction program to be completed during the remainder of the mail-contract period, at a cost which will not deprive the company of a fair return upon its investment, but which will insure a reasonable expenditure in the interests of the American merchant marine.

"Alternately, if it be deemed in the public interest not to cancel the contract, it may be modified by such reduction in the number of mail pay voyages as will result in substantial savings to the Government.

"Whatever determination be reached as to modification or cancellation of the contract, the South Atlantic Steamship Co. of Delaware should be required to divorce itself from any interests which directly or indirectly aid or encourage competition by foreign-flag vessels with the American merchant marine in any domestic port.

"Respectfully submitted."

PACIFIC-ARGENTINE-BRAZIL LINE

Contract covering route no. 34, awarded December 3, 1928. Route extends from San Francisco and Los Angeles by way of Bahia Blanca to Buenos Aires, Argentina. The record, clearly establishes the nonessential character of route no. 34 from the postal viewpoint. Significant in this connection is the complaint which was made to the postmaster at San Francisco that certain mails specifically addressed for carriage by contractor's vessels were inadvertently delivered through the normal mail channels with the result that they arrived 2 weeks in advance of the date when it was anticipated that they should reach their destination.

It is shown that had the mails been carried at regular poundage rates the Government would have saved $1,749,332 up to June 30, 1934.

"The Pacific-Argentine-Brazil Line, Inc.", the report says, "was organized in January 1926. Its entire capital stock of $100,000 is owned by the McCormick Steamship Co., a coastwise and intercoastal operation having facilities for stevedoring, cargo handling, and car loading.

"The contractor states that various terminal facilities and advantages accruing from insurance experience and past steamship operations were placed at the disposal of the Pacific-Argentine-Brazil Line, Inc., by the McCormick Steamship Co. The latter company collects commission charges at the rate of 5 percent outbound, 2½ percent inbound, and 2½ percent management fees on all gross earnings of the mail contractor; and also collects a 50 cents per ton service charge on general cargo handled by the mail contractor over the piers of the McCormick Steamship Co. Wharfing, clerking, car loading, stevedoring, supervision, etc., are performed by the McCormick Steamship Co. for the owner's account at cost."

It is concluded that this contract may be canceled because it was awarded in violation of the law, which requires competitive bidding, and for the further reason that the contractor was obligated for a term of 5 years to operate its vessels over this route, and the letting of the contract was against the public interest.

It is further concluded that the public interest does not warrant the expenditure of public funds so as to result in an average annual return of 20 percent on the contractor's invested capital.

If it be deemed in the public interest not to cancel this contract, then it is recommended that there be taken into consideration the advisability of requiring the contractor to fully and completely divorce itself from all intercoastal and coastwise shipping operations, either directly or indirectly through affiliates, subsidiaries, or otherwise.

MISSISSIPPI SHIPPING CO., INC.

Route no. 35, from New Orleans or other Gulf ports to Rio de Janeiro and/or Santos and/or Rio Grande do Sul and/or Montevideo and/or Buenos Aires and/or Rosario and/or Santa Fe and/or Bahia Blanca, Argentina, not less than 36 nor more than 52 trips per annum. Contract dated June 28, 1930, for 10-year period. Contract was awarded to the line notwithstanding a lower bid had been submitted by the Munson Steamship Line, which also had been the high bidder for the vessels of the line.

The award was made by the Post Office Department under direction of a joint resolution of Congress. Four reconditioned vessels have been reclassified on speed as class-5 vessels without regard to tonnage.

It may be considered, says the report, that the action of Congress referred to herein authorized the Postmaster General to negotiate this contract in the manner and form as it was entered into.

It is believed and recommended that the contract should be modified by the curtailment of Government-aid sailings at a substantial saving to the United States.

Further, the four old reconditioned vessels should be classified as class 6 vessels instead of class-5 vessels, which will result in saving $1,060,671.10.

TACOMA ORIENTAL STEAMSHIP CO.

Contract covering mail route no. 36 was let June 25, 1929, for a 10-year term for service by class-6 vessels of 10 knots and not less than 4,500 gross tons, and is from Tacoma by Yokohama and Kobe, Japan, and Hong Kong, China, to Manila, not less than 12 trips per annum, and from Tacoma by Yokohama and Kobe, Japan, Shanghai, Tsingtau, and Dairen to Takue Bar, China, not less than 12 trips per annum.

"While this trade route was operated by the Shipping Board", the report says, "through managing operators, large losses to the Government resulted and since its operation by the purchaser of the vessels (to Dec. 31, 1933), even with the mail pay, losses have been incurred to the extent of 54.06 percent of the invested capital.

"It appears that, if the company had depreciated its ships on the basis of a 20-year life, the original capital investment would now be more than exhausted. There is no prospect of this line being operated by this company, even with the extensive Government aid now being afforded it, in such a manner as to enable it to provide new vessels at the end of the mail contract term to make the service permanent, unless at least $1,000,000 additional capital is provided. The vessels will have reached the end of their economic life at about the time the mail contract expires.

"The precarious financial condition of this company does not appear to be due to any inefficiency in its operation. For many years the company paid its president no salary and for the past few months his salary has been $3,600 per annum.

"This contract may be canceled for the reason that it was awarded after negotiation and not as the result of competitive bidding and for the reason that the contractor has failed to provide the substitute vessel as required by the contract.

"The contractor has been unable to meet its deferred payments on the purchase price of the vessels, and on June 30, 1934, owed the Shipping Board a balance of $286,105.94, of which amount $171,112.44 was past due. It will be unable to continue the service if the contract is canceled and the vessels will be returned to the Shipping Board."

UNITED FRUIT CO.

Route no. 39, from San Francisco by Corinto, Nicaragua, to Puerto Armueñas, Panama Republic. Approximately 52 trips per annum. From March 23, 1933, service to be via Balboa instead of Corinto without additional pay.

This contract was made March 21, 1930, for the term of 10 years beginning July 1, 1930.

Route no. 40, from New York by Habana, Cuba, and Cristobal, Canal Zone, to Port Limon, Costa Rica. Approximately 26 trips per annum from beginning of service, with increase to 52 trips per annum from the beginning of the second year.

This contract was made March 21, 1930, for the term of 10 years beginning March 21, 1932.

FOREIGN OCEAN MAIL ROUTE NO. 41

Contractor: United Fruit Co.

From: New Orleans by Habana, Cuba, and Cristobal, Canal Zone, to Cartagena, and (or) Puerto Colombia, Colombia.

Frequency: Approximately 52 trips per annum.

Changes: From March 21, 1933, to December 31, 1934, service to end at Cristobal.

This contract was made March 21, 1930, for the term of 10 years, beginning March 21, 1933. Each of the contracts contained a provision that upon an agreement of the Postmaster General and the contractor it might be terminated 5 years from the date of the beginning thereof or at any time thereafter.

It is believed that the cancellation of three contracts is justified because (a) they were awarded as a result of negotiation and not as a result of open, competitive bidding, as required by law, and are therefore illegal; (b) full performance of these contracts is not required in the public interest and their cancellation would result in a saving to the United States of the sum of $15,640,643.82, less any amount paid since July 1, 1934; (c) the respondent is primarily an industrial concern and, taking the broadest possible view of the question, it does not need the aid of the United States in the maintenance of its fleet of cargo-carrying ships.

"It is clearly shown by the evidence that this contract was a negotiated contract, the principal consideration to the Government to be the securing of new vessels, to be built in the United States, and to compensate the United Fruit Co. for what it claimed to be the construction and operating differential. The evidence clearly shows that this was the understanding between Government officials at that time and the United Fruit Co.

"If it be deemed not in the public interest to cancel these contracts with no offer of compensation, then the contracts may be canceled with an offer of compensation, the amount of such compensation (inclusive of the additional sums already received over and above the poundage rates) to be not in excess of a sum sufficient to pay the construction differential computed upon the basis which the contractor claimed the construction differential to be at the time of the negotiation of the three contracts.

"When these contracts were negotiated, the United Fruit Co. made a proposal to construct eight ships. It claimed a ratio of 3 to 2. On the six ships built and upon revised expenses computed by this Department, the construction differential should have been not in excess of $8,000,000. Subtracting this from the total mail pay under the contracts of $20,093,041, the contract could be canceled in this respect at a saving of $12,093,041.

"It is only fair to point out the claims of the company at this time that the construction differential is at a ratio of 2 to 1. This revised calculation, as computed by this Department, amounts to $12,203,667; and if the contracts be canceled, allowing this amount, the saving to the Government would be $7,889,373."

BALTIMORE MAIL STEAMSHIP CO.

Route No. 46: Original contractor, Roosevelt Steamship Co.; subcontractor, Baltimore Mail Steamship Co. From Baltimore by Newport News and/or Norfolk and Le Havre, France, at option of contractor, to Hamburg, Germany. Approximately 52 trips per annum. After an extensive review of the contract, the report says:

"This contract may be canceled without any offer of compensation for the following reasons:

"(a) This contract was a negotiated contract and awarded without authority;

"(b) The contract was illegally transferred and assigned to the subcontractor;

"(c) Full performance is not required in the public interest;

"(d) Savings may be effected in the sum of $3,772,984, which is the estimated excess contract pay over the American poundage rates for the balance of the contract term.

"If it be deemed not in the public interest to cancel the contract, then it may be modified at a substantial saving to the United States in the following respect:

"(a) The vessels operating over this route were classified upon the basis of speed without regard to tonnage. There is apparently no justification for this arbitrary classification, and the classification should be reduced for the remainder of the term, which will result in a saving to the Government of $2,821,824.

"The Baltimore Mail Steamship Co. is already in arrears on construction loan notes, and the United States Shipping Board has the right at any time to declare the Baltimore Mail Steamship Co. in default and take action to repossess the five vessels under the terms of the construction loan notes. If this course were followed, then it is probable that the Baltimore Mail Steamship Co. would not be able to protect itself and the vessels would be retaken by the United States Shipping Board. Upon the happening of such contingency, the Baltimore Mail Steamship Co. would not be in a position to carry out the terms of the mail contract."

AMERICA DIAMOND LINES, INC.

Route no. 53, as specified in the contract, extends (a) from New York to Rotterdam, Netherlands; (b) from Baltimore, Md., by Newport News and/or Norfolk, Va., to Rotterdam; and (c) from New York to Antwerp, Belgium, and/or from Baltimore by Newport News and/or Norfolk to Antwerp, or from Boston, Mass., or Philadelphia, Pa., to Rotterdam or Antwerp, on a schedule of not less than 72 nor more than 108 trips per annum on all branches of the route, subject to a change in frequency to 124 voyages per annum or more, if the Postmaster General and the contractor agree, to provide additional pay on the basis of the construction of two new vessels of class 4 in addition to other construction requirements of the contract.

"The Postal Service", says the report, "has in no manner benefited by the establishment of foreign ocean mail route no. 53. The reconditioning of six of the contractor's vessels to increase their speed from 10 knots to 13 knots will not prolong their useful life to any appreciable extent, and at the end of the mail-contract term in 1941 they will be of no practical value either from a commercial, postal, or naval viewpoint. However, it is claimed and it is possibly true that the 3-knot increase in speed has been of some advantage to the contractor in meeting foreign competition. In this respect it cannot be denied, so far as the information developed at the hearing shows, that the American Diamond Lines, Inc., is and has been successful.

"Postponement of the construction of the new 16-knot ship from the third to the sixth year, while it possibly resulted in the Government not expending quite as large a sum in mail pay, is otherwise disadvantageous to the American merchant marine and, if expedition in the carriage of mails be considered, to the Postal Service.

"It is concluded that this contract may be canceled for the reason that it was not awarded as a result of competitive bidding as provided by law, but, on the other hand, was awarded as the result of negotiations between the contractor, the Post Office Department, and the Shipping Board.

"The contract on foreign ocean mail route 53 is not and never was intended to be in accordance with the requirements of the Postal Service nor for the purpose of providing an adequate postal service 'between the ports.'

"If the contract be not canceled, it should be modified to provide mail pay on the basis of the proper classification of ships under the Merchant Marine Act or on the basis of the classification of the ships which most nearly conforms to the specifications of that law, and if the old ships are permitted to receive pay as class 6 vessels and the new ships as class 5 vessels, the savings resulting from this reclassification will amount to $3,192,295.50.

"Furthermore, if the contract be not canceled, the American Diamond Lines, Inc., should be required to furnish sufficient additional capital or other proper evidence of its purpose and ability to fulfill the construction program now required by both contracts.

"Consideration may be given to the advisability of requiring the contractor to furnish an adequate bond to guarantee performance of the mail service and construction requirements of the contract.

"In connection with any consideration of modification of this contract attention is called to the fact that already there are three other American-flag lines being operated from Atlantic ports to the same or to nearby ports being served by this route."

WATERMAN STEAMSHIP CORPORATION.

Route no. 54: From Mobile or other east Gulf port to Havre, Liverpool, Manchester, Glasgow, Belfast; from Mobile or other east Gulf port to Havre, London, Antwerp, Aberdeen, and intermediate British ports between London and Aberdeen; from Mobile or other east Gulf port to Rotterdam, Bremen, and Hamburg, October 13, 1932, an order was issued granting permission to call at Bremerhaven instead of Bremen when deemed advisable. Not less than 52 nor more than 72 trips per annum. Contract was dated August 19, 1931, and was for a 10-year period, beginning October 1, 1931.

The 14 vessels purchased from the United States Shipping Board were offered for service and accepted by the Post Office Department, the tonnage ranging from 4,963 to 6,094 gross tons, and the stated speeds ranged from 10 knots to 11½ knots. Ten of the vessels were 11 years old on July 8, 1931; 2 were 12 years old; and 2 were 13 years old at that time. All were classified as class 6 vessels, the classification having been based on both speed and tonnage, and the rate of pay was $2.50 per mile. No speed trials were ever held with a Government representative present to determine if the vessels were capable of "maintaining a speed of 10 knots at sea in ordinary weather." Seven vessels have been reconditioned and speeded up to 13 knots, six of which said vessels have been accepted by the Post Office Department and reclassified as class 5 on the basis of speed without regard to tonnage. There is no record that a Government representative was ever present at any speed trial after the vessels were speeded up to 13 knots. The rate of pay for class-6 vessels is $2.50 per mile and for class 5 is $4 per mile.

An argument advanced for the continuation of the policy of reconditioning these ships and increasing the mail pay thereby is to make it possible to take care of all of its reconditioning expense, to pay to its stockholders dividends under the reasonable basis theretofore adopted, namely, 10 percent per annum to the common-stock holders and 7 percent per annum to the preferred-stock holders, and as soon as the reconditioning program is out of the way begin to build up a surplus looking to the construction of new ships of probably not less than 16 knots' speed or to a view to operating the service indefinitely (contractor's brief, pp. 28-29).

"The picture thus painted by the contractor", the report points out, "portrays a so-called 'private operator' with a total outstanding capital of about one-half of what it would take to construct one class-5 vessel, seeking a direct payment from the Government sufficient to make it possible to pay handsome dividends and create a surplus whereby its capitalization can be increased to such an extent that a construction program may be followed at a later date. In other words, the Government is expected to furnish sufficient aid for the contractor to realize excessive profits from which substantial dividends can be paid, and a large surplus created to provide the 25-percent down payment on new vessels, and then loan the contractor the balance of 75 percent of the construction cost at a low rate of interest.

"The establishment of this ocean-mail route was conceived by the Waterman Steamship Corporation. All of the details for the advertisement were agreed to by the officials of the Post Office Department and the representatives of the Waterman Steamship Corporation. The advertisement was worded for the purpose of awarding the contract to the Waterman Steamship Corporation. The Postmaster General knew that no mail could ever be carried over this route."

It is concluded that: "This contract may be canceled without any offer of compensation for the reason—

"(a) The contract was a negotiated one and was not awarded as a result of competitive bidding as required by law.

"(b) The Shipping Board entered into a contract for the sale of ships on this route prior to the date of the contract and the contract was signed on the same date of the mail contract, and under the terms of the Shipping Board agreement the purchaser of the vessels, the Waterman Steamship Corporation, was obliged to operate these vessels purchased over this identical trade route for a period of 5 years and it was, therefore, contrary to public policy.

"(c) The contract was not established as an essential mail route and is not now of any value as a mail route.

"If it not be deemed in the public interest to cancel this contract, then it may be modified in the following respects:

"(a) The old ships which have been speeded up and are to be speeded up should not receive a higher classification than class 6. If so classified on the vessels already alleged to have been speeded up, savings would be effected during the term of the contract in the sum of $2,606,173.

"(b) Assuming that all 10 of the vessels will be speeded up as agreed and receive a classification of class 6, the savings effected from the present rate of pay for the remainder will amount to approximately $4,500,000.

"(c) Other American-flag lines are operating over the same or nearby Gulf ports to the same or nearby European ports. Consideration should be given to the rearrangement of these routes.

GULF PACIFIC MAIL LINE, LTD.

"Route 55: This contract was awarded on August 19, 1931. The contract provided that service should begin on October 1, 1931, and provides for the carriage of mail from Seattle by Puerto Colombia and Kingston (Jamaica) to Tampico (Mexico) on a schedule of not less than 12 nor more than 24 trips per annum and for a contract term of 10 years from October 1, 1931. The contract further provides that the contractor shall provide and operate in the performance of the contract cargo vessels of class 6, capable of maintaining a speed of 10 knots at sea in ordinary weather and of a gross registered tonnage of not less than 3,200. It is further provided that for the purpose of this contract vessels employed in its performance should be classified on the basis of speed without regard to tonnage.

"It is further provided (par. 1 (h) (1)) that the contractor shall have one new vessel of class 5, capable of maintaining a speed of 13 knots at sea in ordinary weather and of a gross registered tonnage of not less than 3,200, constructed in an American shipyard and placed in service as soon as practicable, but within 3 years of the beginning of the term of the contract, which is to say, by October 1, 1934.

"Until recently the Gulf Pacific Mail Line, Ltd., chartered its ships operating on the mail route to Swayne & Hoyt, Ltd. (Swayne & Hoyt, Ltd., also being managing agents for the Gulf Pacific Mail Line, Ltd.), who operated the ships on the homeward voyage in a 100-percent intercoastal business. It appears, therefore, that out of four voyages made by Swayne & Hoyt, Ltd., and the Gulf Pacific Mail Line, Ltd., three were almost exclusively in the intercoastal business and the remaining voyage (on which some mail was carried) approximately 15-percent intercoastal.

"The amount of payments made to this contractor in excess of the amount which would have been made under the American poundage rate to June 1934 is $552,200.40.

"A break-down of competitive cargo moved by the Gulf Pacific Mail Line, Ltd., which was introduced as Government exhibit 59, shows that this line from June 1 to June 30, 1934, moved 891 more tons of lumber from Canada than from the United States; 2,566 more tons of shingles from Canada than from the United States; 19,207 more tons of newsprint paper from Canada than from the United States; 2,425 more tons of flour from Canada than from the United States; 3,988 tons of wheat from Canada and no wheat from the United States; 330 tons of oats from Canada and none from the United, while moving 60 more tons of wood pulp from the United States than from Canada, and 17 more tons of canned fish from the United States than from Canada. The total of these figures shows that this line moved 29,338 more tons of competitive cargo from Canada than from United States ports over the period mentioned.

"If it be determined that this contract is not to be canceled, it is not believed that either of the modifications proposed by the contractor should be accepted. This first proposal that the time within which the new vessel was to be completed be extended until October 1, 1936, is conclusively shown to be unacceptable by the language of the Secretary of Commerce in disapproving the construction loan, which is that "traffic in the trade in which the proposed vessel will be operated does not appear to warrant the granting of a loan as requested." It is equally true that the traffic in the trade in which this contractor is engaged does not appear to warrant the construction of the vessel, and hence the contract should not be modified so as to provide for its construction.

"The second proposal that a reconstructed vessel of a lower class be substituted for the vessel required to be constructed under the terms of the contract is objectionable for the same reason. The 25-percent reduction in pay should not be considered in a case where it appears that continuation of the payment of the remaining 75 percent is unjustified.

"Should it be determined to continue this contract in any form it should be modified:

"(1) Consideration should be given to requiring that the divestment of the persons who are the actual beneficiaries of the mail payments under the contract from the protected intercoastal trade should be made absolute.

"(2) The provision should be made for a replacement program which will provide a fleet suitable to the trade of sufficient tonnage and efficiency to serve such needs as the route may be determined to have.

"(3) In fixing future compensation it should be borne in mind that the contractor has received not less than $118,365 by reason of classification on the basis of speed without regard to tonnage and that there was no apparent justification for this payment.

"(4) Future mail pay under this contract should be decreased by not less than 50 percent."

ADDRESS BY STERLING MORTON

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, in the administration of President Grover Cleveland, J. Sterling Morton, of Nebraska, was appointed the Secretary of Agriculture. He left behind him a commendable record of attractive nature, both of agriculture and of finance. It fell to his son, Paul Morton, subsequently to serve as Secretary of the Navy under President Roosevelt. Now the son of Paul Morton, Hon. Sterling Morton, of Chicago, Ill., the grandson of the former Secretary of Agriculture, is a prominent officer in the commercial and industrial associations of the Middle West, his home office and residence being in Chicago.

Mr. Morton delivered only lately an address to the Illinois congressional delegation at Washington. The address particularly alluded to the expenses of government. Mr. Morton, as an officer of the Illinois Manufacturers' Association, presented some ideas as to the expenses of government, provisions of pending legislative bills concerning which he had learned much from his grandfather and his father as Cabinet officers, as well as from his business operations.

I beg the liberty of asking the Senate to have published in the RECORD the address of this officer of the Illinois Manufacturers' Association to the Illinois delegation in Congress, assembled here in Washington last week. I present this address as information and guide from one of the great men of the great West to business interests and Congress.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SPEECH OF STERLING MORTON, OF THE ILLINOIS MANUFACTURERS' ASSOCIATION, ADDRESSED TO MEMBERS OF THE ILLINOIS DELEGATION IN CONGRESS ASSEMBLED AT WASHINGTON IN MAY 1935

Members of the Illinois delegation in Congress, the Illinois Manufacturers' Association takes great pleasure in welcoming you to its annual meeting with the statesmen who represent Illinois in the councils of the Nation. It is a great pleasure to have you with us. We sincerely trust that both guests and hosts may come through this occasion to know better each other's hopes and aspirations.

I consider myself as having Democratic leanings in politics. My grandfather was in Grover Cleveland's Cabinet. I went to school to Woodrow Wilson, and I favored Davis, Smith, and Franklin Roosevelt for the Presidency. Tonight I speak as a manufacturer.

We manufacturers realize the problems which confront you legislators. We know the pressure brought to bear from many angles by many organizations, of the vast flood of propaganda for and against various measures pending before the Congress. At times we wonder why you do not just run off and leave it all. We do not question the sincerity of the proponents of these measures, although we do sometimes question their good judgment. We shall try to put before you the views of our members and executives, realizing fully that the world is made up of many men of many minds and that a difference of opinion makes not only horse races but legislative debates.

We meet you not as suppliants for legislative favors, not as critics, but feeling that you, our representatives in Congress, charged with the solemn responsibility of charting the Nation's course and supporting the Constitution, will welcome the views of an organization devoted to the orderly development of industrial life in our great Commonwealth, the third of all the States in manufacturing, the very heart of the industrial Middle West. The Constitution gives us the right of free and orderly assemblage—we hope this meeting will remain orderly—also that of free speech—we hope to speak freely—and you will probably ferret out a petition or two.

The Illinois Manufacturers' Association has had a long history. It occupies a premier place among similar associations. It is comprised of great corporations in the metropolitan centers employing many thousands and small factories in the rural districts. Its main strength, like that of the industry of the Nation, is in concerns employing 1 to 300 workers. Its board of directors is not dominated by either the large or the small industry, by either Chicago or down-State. Many directors have been at the helm for a score of years, and in the free play of debate at our meetings have developed a keen spirit of tolerance, a habit of looking at both sides of a question and an ability to recognize the force of the other fellow's argument. We desire to serve well the industries of the State and assure you that in whatever we say tonight we sincerely believe we express the views of all industry. We advocate or condemn specific policies only in the light of judgment based on experience. Neither partisan politics nor personalities enter into these judgments. It is our earnest desire to be constructive. We feel that the greater part of the wealth of the country comes from industry, that industry furnishes most of the tax money for government and that its well-being should be jealously preserved by government.

We manufacturers are deeply concerned over certain well-defined trends in national affairs. These major trends, as exemplified in pending measures, will later be dealt with specifically. We hope for a frank and open discussion. We can assure you your views will have our very careful consideration. We shall endeavor frankly to tell you why and how we may disagree, and we bespeak the same frankness from you.

In my humble opinion only one factor is needed to reestablish industrial prosperity—confidence. Lack of confidence led us to the depths of depression; restoration of confidence will bring the Nation greater prosperity than it has ever known. What has happened to confidence? During the war a beautiful volunteer nurse was taking devoted care of a handsome but badly wounded officer. On arriving one morning she was shocked to find the covers closely drawn over his head. A note on the bed said simply: "Too sick to be nursed today!" Perhaps our industrial system is in a similar condition. Business today had some symptoms of shell shock, many of malnutrition, and a few of rigor mortis.

Why malnutrition? Because the flow of capital into industry has stopped. It has stopped because the careful investor has withheld his funds. Why? During the past 6 years the confidence of the investing public has suffered shock after shock. The collapse of the artificial values of the late twenties, the steady decline in all forms of business, culminating in the closing of the banks some 2 years ago, undermined the confidence of those possessing property. The prompt and decisive action of the present administration to restore confidence in the banks bore immediate fruit and was a convincing demonstration of the beneficial effect of wise official action. Unfortunately we feel this restoration of hope was followed by further shocks to confidence. Devaluation of the dollar occurred and shook the confidence of those who support and increase industry through long-term investment. I seek no controversy—I merely state the effect on industrial investors of this departure from tried and familiar standards of monetary value. The huge appropriations for agriculture adjustment, the destruction of crops and livestock, the rising cost of living, and loss of our export markets for farm products through the high prices thus brought about, further unsettled confidence. The uncertainty attending the inauguration of the National Recovery Administration further disturbed the mind of the conservative investor, while the wide-spread labor difficulties caused by varying interpretations of section 7 (a) added to his hesitation. (We are appalled at the calculated cultivation of class consciousness by organized minorities that has resulted. It is something foreign to our shores.) The vast, though necessary, expenditures for relief and the unbalance of the Federal Budget further shook the confidence of a man with money to invest, who felt that this Government debt some day must be liquidated. He saw only two methods of liquidation—by excessive taxes or by further devaluation of the dollar. Neither alternative inspired confidence or a desire to make long-term commitments. As a result, his funds have been held idle or have been invested in liquid short-term securities of which the Federal Government offered an amazing and never-ending supply.

He was further concerned over existing taxes, feeling that present high taxes divert large sums from constructive enterprises, sums which might employ many workmen and contribute largely to the future tax base. Let me illustrate. It is commonly accepted that each worker in industry requires an average investment of $2,000 in plant. Suppose the average wage is $1,200 per year and it costs another $300 per year to furnish heat, light, and supplies. A billion dollars kept from industry therefore means loss of new opportunities for employment to 285,000 workers. This presupposes that the entire investment in plant is made in the 1 year. On the usual 20-year amortization, the amount becomes only $100 per year, so that a billion dollars taken in income taxes may mean loss of opportunity of employment to 625,000 new workers. Consider the twenty billions of individual and corporate income tax collected since 1921 and all of our unemployed, even at the highest estimate, might have thereby been gainfully employed. I do not claim all the money taken for taxes would or could have been so invested, but the effect of high taxes on industrial growth deserves your careful consideration.

As I said before, the foregoing is an analysis of effect, an effort to find reasonable causes for the hesitancy of investors to make forward commitments in industry.

Yet some people apparently believe that corporations have unlimited funds on which to draw for taxes or wages. Nothing could be farther from the fact. Any increase in taxes or wages must surely be reflected in the selling price of the products. An increase in taxes on corporations merely means that the taxing body has again engaged the corporation as a tax gatherer—and without compensation, we regret to say.

We manufacturers believe in the philosophy of plenty, not that of scarcity. We feel that recovery will come from a greater supply of material things available at lower prices. We have endeavored, with a fair degree of success, to meet our own obligations, including taxes, as they came due, so we can have no sympathy with attempts to levy on the property of the wise and thrifty to relieve debt burdens contracted by others without great thought to the eventual necessity for repayment. In asking restoration of confidence, we do not mean Government guarantees of successful operation; we ask that the future bring no further changes in our standard of value, no further stirring up of strife among our employees, no further attempts to maintain prices at artificially high levels to the detriment of both consumption and production. We hope to be relieved of the mass of regulations promulgated by Executive order, administrative order, and even by press release, which keep us in constant uncertainty and whose mere reading consumes a large amount of our time.

Few realize the burden placed on business concerns by the multitude of reports required by various governmental bodies. Practically identical information must be furnished in widely differing forms, thus entailing untold amounts of clerical work and diverting the attention of executives from their primary job, that of production of goods at prices the public will readily pay. We industrialists feel that our time is much better devoted to the upbuilding of business than to filling in questionnaires, making out reports and appearing before commissions and committees.

Bills now before the Congress, to be discussed by the speakers to follow, will, we feel, further tax the people, using industry as the tax collector, further raise costs, may destroy one great industry because of abuses formerly existing in a few of its units, may bring Government more into competition with private business, will take the very control and discipline of the industrial army out of the hands of industry and give it to persons having neither interest nor stake in the success of the enterprises. Do you wonder that confidence is shaken?

Our members do not exploit their employees. You have visited our plants, you are welcome to all of them, you have talked with the workmen. Except for the inevitable sorehead, have you found any serious complaint? Judge labor conditions in our State by your own observations, not by the statements or experiences of those whose contact with labor has been in New York City, where sweatshop conditions do exist because of the exploitation of recently arrived immigrants by less recently arrived immigrants.

The President says 90 percent of the managers of business are honest, intelligent, and capable. We agree but think his estimate too low. In Illinois, 2 percent would be a high proportion of chiselers, cheats, exploiters of labor. We hate them more than you can possibly hate them, as we daily realize the damage they do all industry. But let us prune the bad fruit from the industrial tree, not cut it down entirely.

Business needs a breathing spell. It is too sick for further operations or further nursing. Time is a great physician. Give business time to adjust itself to the changes that have come to it. Could we not have a truce to further new regulation, further disturbance of time-tried methods and principles, principles which we submit have not proven wholly bad. Under them, the average worker has had a more abundant life, better treatment, and more of the amenities and comforts of living than under any other system developed by civilized man.

The Illinois Manufacturers' Association, as representative of industry in Illinois, is ready and anxious to cooperate with you gentlemen in efforts for restoration of confidence, toward stabilization of our currency at today's basis, in giving permanence to our institutions and so assuring the progress of the Nation. We feel that our representation in Congress is constructive, intelligent, and patriotic, free from most of the "isms" which so plague the Nation. Give us confidence and we honestly believe you will see not only a restoration of prosperity but prosperity rising to heights previously undreamed of. The objective that we firmly believe the great leader of our Nation holds above all others can best be reached by building and restoring confidence.

ECONOMIC AND FINANCIAL CONDITIONS—ADDRESS BY SENATOR TYDINGS

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, on April 25 last the distinguished and able Senator from Maryland [Mr. Tydings] delivered a noteworthy address before the American Association of Cotton Manufacturers. In his characteristically clear and illuminating manner he discussed economic and financial conditions not only with relation to cotton and the textile industry but generally. His address is eminently worthy of perusal and study, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Ladies and gentlemen, I consider it a distinct compliment to be asked to make an address before the American Cotton Manufacturers' Association, representing as it does one of the major industries of the United States. This industry lives upon an agricultural commodity which is produced upon the farms of 16 American States, or one-third of those in the Union. Besides, that agricultural commodity is our greatest export product.

It is estimated that about 1,800,000 farmers rely upon the production of cotton as their primary cash crop. Other millions of our people are employed in transporting and manufacturing the raw product into clothing and in retailing it. Cotton in the form of clothing is worn by men and women everywhere on the earth.

We are dealing, therefore, with not only a large domestic industry, but a large world industry as well. It can be asserted that the raising and marketing of the cotton crop, its manufacture into clothing, its transportation throughout the world, and its purchase by human beings is the greatest and most far-flung industry on the face of the earth. I welcome the opportunity to talk to those who must perforce play such a large part in the contemporary and future history of mankind.

In order to lay the foundation for the observations I shall make, it is necessary to review our past history.

Up to our entrance into the World War the United States was a debtor nation—a borrowing nation, if you please. Hundreds of millions of dollars in foreign capital were then invested in our National, State, and municipal bonds, and other hundreds of millions of dollars of foreign capital were invested in our railroads, public utilities, industrial plants, mines, and real estate.

America owes much of its progress, before the World War, to the large inflow of foreign capital, which, together with the genius, initiative, and energy of our people, developed this Nation from ocean to ocean.

These large investments by foreigners in our country necessitated the shipment of millions of dollars in gold each year from the United States to foreign investors, to pay either the interest or principal on foreign loans or to curtail foreign loans, or to pay dividends upon the stocks which foreign investors had bought in our country.

So before the World War millions of dollars in gold were shipped out of the United States each year for these purposes.

But before the World War, when we were a debtor nation, we were also an exporting nation, selling to the world each year more of the products of our factories, forests, mines, and farms than our people were buying of similar products from foreign countries.

Indeed, each and every year, from 1893, to the present, we have sold to the world more of our products than the world has sold us of its products.

The balance of trade, as it is commonly called, has been constantly in favor of the United States, and that favorable balance of trade had to be paid in gold to our people by our foreign customers.

So before the World War hundreds of millions of dollars in gold were shipped to this country each and every year to pay us this favorable balance of trade.

That was the picture of pre-war economy in the United States. First, on the one hand, millions upon millions of dollars in gold were shipped annually from the United States in the form of interest, sinking-fund payments, or dividends to foreigners who had invested their money in this country. Secondly, on the other hand, hundreds of millions of dollars were shipped back to the United States annually to pay the balance of trade which was in our favor, a balance of trade arising from the fact that we were selling more of our products to foreign countries than foreign countries were selling of their products to us.

This was a healthy condition. Trade was in balance. In effect we were paying our debts to foreign investors through the export of our products, for while the world was buying our products in great abundance it was paying for those products, insofar as the balance of trade was concerned, from the interest, sinking fund, and dividends earned by foreign investors in the United States.

On such a political economy, which was sound to its very core, the United States prospered greatly, developed quickly, and became the great storehouse for much of the world's food, clothing, and other supplies. We grew, expanded, developed, and had work for all our people who desired it.

At the conclusion of the World War this situation was abruptly changed. Our political economy now is not the political economy we knew before the World War. Yet apparently our people are either oblivious to the changed conditions, or, if they know them, certainly we have refused to face the consequences of that change.

We still remain an exporting country, selling to the world more than we buy from the world, but we are no longer a debtor nation—a borrowing nation. Instead, since the World War we have become the greatest creditor nation in the world.

In a nutshell, we are now both an exporting and a creditor nation.

Let me illustrate this briefly in a little detail. When the World War was over, it was found that our allies in that great struggle had borrowed about $10,000,000,000 from our people. We no longer owed foreigners money, as we had before the war. Foreign governments then owed to the Government of the United States about $10,000,000,000, plus interest, in the form of war debts. After the war not only had our political economy undergone a complete change but in Europe the same thing was likewise true. There creditor nations had suddenly become debtor nations.

This situation caused an economic upheaval throughout the earth. It cried for immediate treatment. It was apparent to all who would read and who could comprehend that there had to be an economic readjustment in most of the leading nations of the world. At this time—1920 and 1921—there was much unemployment and unrest in the United States, but, commencing then, and continuing from 1921 to 1929, our people commenced to loan, either to foreign governments or to foreign cities or to foreign states and to foreign industrial establishments billions of dollars each year. Indeed, in that 8-year period from 1921 to 1929 our people bought $14,000,000,000 in foreign securities. The $10,000,000,000 of war debts owing to us from the World War, plus the $14,000,000,000 which our people have loaned to governments since the World War, make us a creditor nation today, with $24,000,000,000 owed to either our Government or to our people by foreign countries or subdivisions thereof.

Now in the meantime, commencing at the outbreak of the World War, foreign investments in the United States have largely been liquidated and the capital returned to the home nations. We are, as I have said, now the greatest creditor nation in the world.

One does not have far to look to understand why we were seemingly prosperous from 1921 to 1929. During that period of time our exports and imports broke all previous records. During that 8-year period we were shipping annually around $5,000,000,000 worth of American products to foreign countries while we were buying about $4,000,000,000 worth annually of products made in foreign countries. The balance of trade was in our favor, but foreign customers were only able to pay the balance of trade to us with the money which we were lending them each and every one of these years.

In sum, we were lending to our foreign customers, who, under the economic set-up then existing, already owed us more than they could pay, many, many more billions of dollars each year with which to pay for our enormous exports.

When the loans from our people stopped going abroad in 1929, foreigners could no longer buy and pay for the goods which we had up to that time been furnishing them in such abundance.

So in 1929, after having gone through 8 years of the illusion that trade and credit and finance were in balance, that our prosperity was sound and endless, that a golden age was dawning, that money was literally dropping from the heavens, that there would soon be at least two cars in every garage and a double garage attached to each dwelling, we suddenly found it was a dream and that we were right back where we had been in the depression of 1920 and 1921.

Then our people realized that all of the so-called "prosperity" was false prosperity, that that prosperity was built upon an illusion, it was built upon the credits we sent abroad and with which our customers bought tremendous volumes of our products and, without which, after 1929, they could not continue to buy or pay.

Let us keep this fact in mind: The world owes us an enormously large sum of money. All that it owes is payable in gold. The amount that it owes us is $24,000,000,000, yet there is only about $14,000,000,000 worth of gold in all the world and only about six and one-half billions of dollars' worth of gold outside of the United States with which to pay to us the $24,000,000,000 owing to our people. Yet, in face of this fact, we are still selling to the world in commodities more than we buy from the world in commodities.

Any nation faced with this fact which attempts to run its political economy as the political economy of the United States has been operated since the World War cannot escape from plunging itself, its States, its counties, its cities, its industrial and transportation companies, its workers, its farmers, and its people into confusion, unemployment, suffering, ruin, and chaos.

There was no escape from it. The depression which we are sensing today is the direct consequence of a large creditor nation attempting at one and the same time to collect its debts, both governmental and private, owing to its or its people by foreigners, and to sell these foreigners more of our goods than we buy of theirs.

Until this fact, in my judgment, is thoroughly comprehended and appreciated by business and its employees, by our people, rich and poor, and until we can evolve a national consciousness that the political economy of the United States since the World War is diametrically opposed to the political economy of the United States before the World War, governments in this Nation will practice phantom political economy, and no real recovery will reward our efforts. We will live on hope. We will try experiments. Our national enthusiasm at times will be aroused to support this and that, schemes to make everybody rich will be offered by the hundreds, people will be quickly deluded in marching behind false banners, and in supporting false causes and in following false leaders, and in the meantime real, sound, substantial, genuine recovery will be postponed.

This is a man-made depression. Those who hold that depressions are cyclical, that they cannot be avoided, reckon, in my judgment, without an examination or a comprehension of the facts. Nature has been exceedingly kind. There is plenty in this world for all. Man-made barriers, our failure to diagnose and cure our real ills, our disregard of the consequences of the 4-year holocaust, with its waste of wealth and its legacy of economic dislocation, are the forces which have swept devastation, unemployment, unbalanced budgets, unstable currencies, armaments, misery, and chaos over the earth, and only man-made efforts will heal the wounds and restore national and international stability and good will. We must set about it sooner or later if we would save Christendom from ruin.

Now, to collect the debts, both governmental and private, requires that we take either increased imports from the debtor countries or increased services, or both. To embrace that philosophy would mean increased unemployment in the United States while the debts were being liquidated, for a large part of our people would live not by their toil but upon the products produced in other lands and sent here annually in payment of the debt.

To state the same thing differently, since there is not sufficient gold, in order to permit repayment to our Government and to those of our citizens who own foreign securities—and many of these foreign securities are held by our banks—we will have to curtail production of both raw and manufactured materials and permit the foreign debtor nations to supply a larger part of our needs in our home markets.

I do not believe, seriously, that that policy will ever be adopted by our people. Nevertheless, that is our dilemma. We are caught on the horn of trying to be an exporting nation, and upon the horn of actually being a creditor nation at one and the same time. We actually have $24,000,000,000 owing to us by the people in other lands, all payable in gold. Yet there is only seven and one-half billions of dollars in gold outside of the United States with which to discharge these $24,000,000,000 of debts. It is axiomatic that the only other way these debts can be repaid is by the importation of more foreign goods or by our use of more foreign services.

What can be done so that we may diminish without great injury our creditor position and thus preserve our foreign markets—and employment for our people.

First, the governments concerned should dispose of, once and for all, the stagnated war-debt question, not as a separate matter, but in connection with a revival of world trade, a stabilization of international currencies, and a drastic measure of disarmament. These debts are not being paid to us anyway. Indeed, in view of our exporting position to the countries that are our debtors, their payment would take more than all the gold they possess; and secondly, result in a serious curtailment of our export trade, particularly of cotton and cotton fabrics.

Let us make a brief examination into the war-debt subject. Remember that it was nearly a year after we declared war before American soldiers in any appreciable number actually joined in the fighting in Europe. Remember that during the war, and after we were in it, the money loaned to our allies was largely expended right here in the United States for munitions and supplies which were shipped to our allies. Remember that during the first year after our entrance that our allies had several hundred thousand of their soldiers killed or seriously wounded in battle while we were getting ready. Remember that against the hundreds of thousands of killed and wounded in the armies of our allies, we furnished them the credit with which to pay for the food, munitions, and supplies bought in our own country. They lost hundreds of thousands of men while we were getting ready during which time we, in effect, sold them supplies.

Speaking in a judicial frame of mind, while these debts are both legally and morally owing to our Government by our late allies, the humanities of this equation are nevertheless prime factors for any honest and humane government to consider. Why is it not possible for the governments concerned to work out a fair plan, one possible of fulfillment and without too much hardship on any country to consider all the elements that enter into the war-debt matter and in connection with agreements for a revival of world trade, stabilized currencies, and disarmament provide for the fair amount that should actually be repaid us comprehending the ways and means possible for the repayment?

If this were done—and I believe it can be done—we could liquidate much of our creditor position and secure business gains for both industry and labor many times more valuable than the debts.

If it is not done, I assert there is no economist on earth who can show how $12,000,000,000 worth of debts, with the annual interest thereon, can be discharged with the seven and one-half billion dollars of gold in all the world outside of the United States unless this gold payment is augmented by either increased imports to this country or by our utilization of increased services to us by the debtor nations. If my assertion is true and we won't permit the foreign imports to exceed our exports, why do we not take this question up from a practical rather than an academic standpoint and dispose of it in the interest of the greatest amount of trade and work for our people in supplying our own and foreign markets?

Assuming that this were done, likewise it is possible to liquidate a large part of the remaining debt of $14,000,000,000, represented by the loans made by American investors between the years 1921 and 1929 to foreign governments.

It would be possible to accomplish part of this in the following way. Suppose, for example, that a bank here in Georgia holds $10,000 in Brazilian bonds, and that a bank in Brazil holds $10,000 of American bonds. Neither the American bank nor the Brazilian bank would be hurt if both were to exchange their investments at their fair market value, one for the other. If this were done, and the Brazilian bonds were returned to the Brazilian bank, the Brazilian Government could raise the taxes necessary to pay off that bond, pay it off, and all the money would remain in Brazil. The same would be true of the bank in Georgia which had received American bonds for the Brazilian bonds which it formerly held. Such a policy, insofar as it is possible to carry it out, would not entail the shipment of gold from one country to the other. On the other hand, in order to pay off a Brazilian bond held by an American investor the Brazilian Government would have to ship $10,000 in gold in this country for that purpose. Thus, to pay her entire debt might jeopardize the stability of her currency.

By an exchange of international securities wherever possible our creditor position could be further liquidated without injury to the currency of any nation affected, without the shipment of gold from any country to another, without loss to the parties to the exchange, and such a course would add to the financial stability and liquidation of debts everywhere, while reducing the creditor position of the United States in foreign countries.

Thus, if our credit position were liquidated as to war debts and private debts insofar as is practicable, America would obtain most of the sums owing to it where financial stagnation now exists. This would augment the real resources of our people. At the same time our customers in the present debtor nations would suffer little material drain upon the governmental currencies, and world trade would be stimulated to something approaching normal.

If it were possible to liquidate substantially our creditor position in this fashion we could then continue to export to the world the maximum amount of our goods, commensurate with a balanced trade, visible and invisible. The longer we postpone an attempt to tackle this log jam to international finances and trade, the longer will we support people in this Nation with the dole, Public Works programs, and the like. Necessary, you might say, but expensive nonetheless. You cannot keep on selling in quantities to people who cannot pay.

Now in the case of cotton, we normally export more than half of our crop. Whatever may be said about the nonimportance of our foreign trade, as to other commodities, foreign trade is the very lifeblood of cotton production in this country. As foreign trade and tariffs are sisters under the skin, any consideration of the cotton question must comprehend our tariff policy.

A considerable school of thought is growing in America that tariff making as we have known it is outmoded by the march of events. Heretofore tariff acts have been passed by the Congress, the rates of which have applied equally to all countries. The rates upon importations of cotton cloth coming from Great Britain have been the same rates which have applied upon cotton imports coming from Japan notwithstanding that the cost of production in Japan is less than the cost of production in Great Britain. Such a policy in many instances has penalized our competitors whose standard of living approximates our own while giving advantages to countries with a lower standard of living and a lower production cost.

It may be that in clearing up the debris resulting from the World War that the United States in the future will have to have varying rates of duty to meet the different conditions in each of her competitor countries. Unless this is done, at least to a degree, we will transfer our commerce, particularly in cotton, from Europe to Asia and lose at one and the same time the richest markets in the world outside of our own.

Again, we cannot hope to pursue proper tariff-making by a mere attempt to equalize the cost of production at home and abroad. That single consideration is apt to prove too narrow in the formulation of sound and wholesome tariff policies for the United States of the future. It is quite likely that many other factors will have to be considered, among which are the following:

Is the article indigenous to the United States?

Is it necessary for the United States to produce it in time of war?

Do we produce other commodities which can be substituted for it in time of need?

What nation, or nations, sell this article to our people?

What other article does the foreign-producing nation sell to our people?

What does the foreign-producing nation buy from us in return?

Is our balance of trade with the foreign-producing nation favorable or unfavorable?

Is the foreign-producing nation on the gold or silver standard?

Is the foreign-producing nation debtor of the United States or of its citizens?

Can the article be economically and readily produced in the United States?

To what extent do the foreign producing nations supply our home market with this article?

Are imports of the article increasing or decreasing? Why?

Is there likelihood that the entire home market may be supplied by the foreign producing nation?

Are our citizens investors in the foreign producing countries? In what way?

To what extent will a proposed import tax result in decreasing the importation of the article?

Will the producing country or countries retaliate by raising tariffs so as to cut down our export trade?

How will such retaliation affect trade with still other countries not directly concerned with the article in question?

These are but a few of many other equally important considerations which must be weighed in the tariffs of the future.

In general, future tariff-making should aim at keeping the maximum amount of persons employed in the United States, whether they are working to supply either the home or the foreign market. Here in the Cotton Belt I believe these considerations should receive more thought because the need is greater for such thought than in any other part of the country.

It is stated that approximately 1,800,000 farmers produce cotton as their chief money crop. Over half of this crop is sold outside the country. The loss of our foreign cotton markets, therefore, will deprive half of our cotton farmers, or about 850,000, of a livelihood. They, with their dependents, are apt, in such circumstances, to become the objects of charity, a total of 3,200,000 people, or 2 percent of our entire population.

At this juncture let me read a Liverpool cable, dated April 9, 1935:

"Osaka, Japan, reports official commercial mission sailed yesterday for Brazil to negotiate agreement in which Japan will undertake to buy up to a million bales of Brazilian cotton annually and assist Brazilian cotton-growing industry in return for alleviation existing legislation against Japanese immigrants and preference on imports Japanese manufactured goods."

In 1931 we sold to Brazil $28,500,000 worth of United States products, of which $19,100,000, or 67 percent, were finished manufactures, while Brazil shipped to us that same year nearly four times as much, or $105,980,000 worth of products, of which $96,340,000 were in foodstuffs, mostly coffee. That year Brazil enjoyed a balance of trade with the United States in the amount of $77,400,000.

In view of the fact that Brazil enjoys primacy in supplying the American market with coffee, it would not seem wise for Brazil to attempt to take from the United States her export cotton market.

However, those who are interested in cotton should take warning. They must be prepared to compete with foreign-producing and foreign-manufacturing cotton countries if they desire to keep our export cotton markets. Once our foreign markets are gone, they will be hard to win back. Now is the time to act, not after these markets have been heavily decreased.

The United States cannot compete in the cotton markets of the world unless its people can produce both raw and manufactured cotton at a price which will permit us to sell the product in competition with foreign countries which produce it. So long as the cost of producing raw cotton textiles in the United States exceeds the cost of producing these commodities by large foreign competitor nations, you are bound to witness a decline year after year both of cotton exports and cotton textiles. This is nothing more or less than sheer common sense. In the end high-priced raw cotton and high-priced cotton textiles will drive both southern farmers and American manufacturers more and more from the world markets, with consequent unemployment and a loss of national income.

What is the trend in the United States? In the year 1931-32 we produced 16,800,000 bales of cotton; in 1932-33 this decreased to 12,900,000 bales of cotton; in 1933-34 it further decreased to 12,700,000 bales of cotton; in the year 1934-35 it took another violent drop to 9,600,000 bales of cotton. We have dropped steadily from 16,000,000 bales in 1931 to 9,000,000 bales in 1934, a decrease of 40 percent from the year 1931-32.

On the other hand, the total cotton production for all foreign countries was 9,600,000 bales for the year 1931-32. This increased to 10,700,000 bales for the year 1932-33, further increasing to 12,800,000 bales for the year 1933-34, and the last figure holds its own for the year 1934-35. Foreign production of raw cotton had steadily increased from 1931-32 to the year 1934-35.

Thus, while the production of raw cotton in the United States has steadily declined 40 percent during each of the past 4 years, the production of cotton in foreign countries has steadily increased 30 percent during these same years.

The United States, which formerly produced more than half of all the cotton produced in the world, last year and the coming year, for the first time in its history, will produce less than half of the cotton produced in the world.

These statistics are ominous. No world-renowned economist reading in his cloister either past, present, or future history need tell us that America is steadily losing her foreign cotton markets, with consequent loss of income and loss of employment for her people.

What has been done to assist the cotton-production industry in the recent 2 years may have been justified as a necessary temporary expedient. It can never be justified as a permanent policy of the United States; for the present policy but writes its own doom the longer it continues, and it will plunge the cotton farmer into a dark abyss of despair, darker and deeper than any he has known up to now.

Cotton farmers must decide whether or not they prefer to receive temporarily an increased price per pound for producing less cotton with an increasing reduction in our foreign and domestic markets for cotton or whether or not they wish to hold these foreign markets by producing cotton so that it can be sold in competition with other world producers. They must think not only for the present but for the future. They must think not only for themselves but for their children and their children's children. Any other policy as to cotton is penny wise and pound foolish.

The same problem is presented to the cotton-textile manufacturers and must be thought out in the same manner.

However, over and above these immediate problems that affect the cotton industry is the larger problem to be solved—the problem of permanent policy, the problem of clearing up the economic debris resulting from the World War. The problem of rebuilding our own and the world's economy so that the world can go forward.

We are living in an age of ultranationalism. This spirit manifested everywhere makes world recovery difficult.

We find nationalism inspiring people throughout the world—in Germany under Hitler, in Italy under Mussolini, in Russia under Stalin, in Poland under Pilsudski, and so on. The concomitants of this national spirit are trade barriers behind which each nation tries to make itself self-sufficient without regard to progress, international wealth, employment of the people, or orderly commerce and trade; increased armaments inflicting a heavy burden upon the taxpayers of all nations, forcing armament races and apparently leading the world to a war the horrors of which will be without parallel in the world's history; depreciated currencies further hindering orderly commerce, undermining the financial integrity of nations in business and making uncertain not only the present but the future.

It is to this larger problem and its solution that I believe far-seeing governments and business men should address themselves. Not only is national confidence needed but international confidence is likewise a primary requisite. So long as the nations of the world pursue a policy of ultranationalism with its evil and mischievous offspring, so long will there be no sound foundation upon which humanity can work its way out of this depression into which all mankind is now plunged.

It will be difficult to bring about world stability, to stabilize international currencies, to revive orderly world trade, to accomplish some measure of disarmament, and to banish fear and replace it with confidence and good will, but the longer this attempt is postponed the more difficult it will be to reestablish order. Now is the time to start before more difficulties are placed in the road.

The United States of America, not only because of its wealth and prestige but because it is a strong creditor and exporting Nation of the earth, must lead the way. So long as it takes the position that it is reckless of world stability, that it is unmindful of the rush toward the next great holocaust, so long as it refuses its leadership, present international conditions will continue unabated.

We must not lose sight of the fact that your Government and mine as a leading creditor and a leading export nation has, perhaps, a greater stake in world recovery than has any other nation.

We should not be blinded, therefore, by the temporary benefits which may flow from a policy of ultranationalism in the United States but in the light of experience we must throw our vision down the corridor of time and there chart the course which will lead first ourselves and then a reckless world to economic security.

We know already that temporary prosperity, unless it is builded on a firm foundation, can be ruinous in the long run. The boom days from 1921 to 1929 gave us that kind of prosperity with the misery which has come to our people since 1929.

That is the lesson of our recent past. If we have not the good sense to profit from this lesson and work for slow but solid recovery rather than temporary, yet unsound, recovery, then we have doomed our land and our people to a suffering even greater than that through which we are passing. For unless our prosperity is sound, the higher the rise the greater the fall.

The future is bright. This is a man-made depression; recovery will be man-made. If that recovery is to come, you and I must work for it, sacrifice for it, and attain it. There is nothing fundamentally wrong with the United States of America, and proper policies will keep its future as full of luster as the providence of God and the wisdom of man have kept its past great and secure.

BY AIRPLANE OVER THE FAR EAST—ADDRESS BY SENATOR M'ADOO

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an able and unusually interesting radio address delivered by the junior Senator from California [Mr. McAdoo] descriptive of an airplane trip over the Far East. The address was broadcast on Sunday, May 5, 1935.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

This is not going to be a talk, but a trip on a magic carpet as wonderful as any that ever carried Sinbad or Aladdin through the skies from one land to another. Last January I flew from Singapore to Rome, almost 8,000 miles; in Malaysia one day, India the next, and then Persia, the Holy Land, Egypt, the Isles of Greece, all unrolling below us, as lovely as historic.

I hope that all of you, following my suggestion, have a map and pencil before you, for not only do I want you to follow the marvelous flight but I would like you also to be able to visualize some of the great air lines now in operation throughout the world, annihilating space and making a joke out of traditional frontiers.

You will find Singapore at the southern extremity of the Malay Peninsula, about 2 degrees north of the Equator. Singapore is the most important British naval base in the Far East, for it commands the Straits of Malacca through which pours the greatest part of the water-borne commerce between oriental nations and Europe.

At 5 o'clock one morning we took off from Singapore in a four-engined, high-wing British plane which had just arrived the day before from Darwin, Australia. A land plane, but just the same it had crossed the Timor Sea, about 500 miles, and the Dutch East Indian Islands on its flight from the Antipodes.

The first day we flew over the great Malay jungles, where Frank Buck makes his famous "bring 'em back alive" animal pictures. If an airplane were to crash it would never be discovered, sinking out of sight as completely in the dense growth as if buried in the ocean. Even if one escaped death in the wreck, there are tigers, pythons, and black leopards to make things less than pleasant.

We spent the night at Bangkok, capital of Siam, a city so lovely and fascinating that I am still wondering why King Prajadhipok wanted to abdicate. We took to the air again at 5 o'clock the next morning, winging our way through a dense fog. Over India we came into the sunshine, and down below was Rangoon and the Bay of Bengal, and, of course, everybody began to hum The Road to Mandalay. Calcutta was reached before dark, the heart of modern India, although I imagine there are still a good many Black Holes. Four days there, and on leaving we transferred to the Dutch Line. As if to dispute the claim that the Hollanders have no sense of humor, the time table handed me bore this slogan, "The Flying Dutchman—Fiction Becomes Fact."

Leaving Calcutta, we flew straight across India—its teeming life spread below us—and slept that night at Karachi, on the Arabian Sea, 1,500 miles for the day. Long before sunrise the next morning we left Karachi and were on our way along the south coast of Persia to Baghdad, capital of Iraq, and the city made famous all over the world by the Arabian Nights. Through its streets roamed Haroun Al Raschid, great caliph, and out of its gates went Ali Baba, Aladdin, and all those immortal figures of literature.

The next day we flew from Baghdad to Cairo, crossing the Syrian Desert, the Holy Land, and the Suez Canal. As though we were sitting in a box at the theater, we saw the River Jordan winding its tortuous way between bare, high mountains, emptying into the Dead Sea, and stared down on historic Jericho, whose walls fell before the seven blasts of Joshua's horn. Jericho occupies a strategic position on the main highway from Baghdad to Jerusalem, and played, of course, an important part in the battles which used to rage in the days of the prophets.

Our pilot very obligingly flew low over both Jerusalem and Bethlehem, circling the village of our Lord's nativity and the Holy City. The swarming life of the streets, the minarets, and even many of the historic spots and structures were plain to our eyes, and we could almost hear the cry of the muezzin calling the faithful to prayer.

At Cairo we flew around the Pyramids and the Sphinx at a low altitude and looked down on those hoary monuments of a dead civilization and also, I may add, escaped the fleas and flies that take a good deal away from the mystic beauty of Egypt. Leaving the land of the Pharaohs, we crossed the Mediterranean, 525 miles over water, and passed along the western end of the island of Crete, home of Venizelos, now an exile because of his recent unsuccessful revolution. Other islands of the Aegean Sea, all sung by the poets, were stretched below us.

In Athens I had time, in company with our minister, Mr. Lincoln McVeagh, an accomplished archeologist, to visit the Parthenon, the Acropolis, and other evidences of art and culture which made Greece the light of the world for so many years.

After a night at Athens, we proceeded to Rome, Italy, crossing the high mountains of Greece and the Italian Apennines, all covered with deep snow. Vesuvius, on our left, presented an unusual spectacle, for while smoke poured out of the top as usual, the mountain slopes were white with snow.

I took to the ground at Rome, sailing from Genoa for New York by sea, because, unfortunately, no airplanes are yet making the Atlantic crossing.

This point will be reached ere long, for foreign countries, even more than the United States, are making tremendous strides in the development of international air lines. By looking at your map and tracing with your pencil, you will get the route of the Dutch line from Singapore to Rome, thence to Marseilles, and across France and Belgium to Amsterdam. The British line covers substantially the same route except that it goes to London via Paris.

The British Imperial Airways operates all the way from London via Cairo to Cape Town, Africa. The French and the Germans are already flying the South Atlantic Ocean in a great struggle to capture the South American markets. These are logically the trade areas of the United States. Our own American air lines cover Mexico, Central and South America, and the countries surrounding the Caribbean Sea and the Gulf of Mexico so thoroughly that it is doubtful if the Germans and French can wrest from us the natural and strong position we occupy.

The European Governments heavily subsidize the international lines I have mentioned. All these governments look with hungry eyes to China, where the needs of its teeming millions present perhaps the greatest trade opportunities in the world today.

The United States holds the key to this market, if only we have the vision to seize the opportunity now presented to us.

Look at China on your map. Begin at Canton, just west of Hong Kong, the British naval base. Draw a line north to Shanghai, at the mouth of the Yangtze River, and continue it north along the coast of China to Peiping, a distance of about 2,000 miles. Go back to Shanghai and extend another line westward for about 1,000 miles through the great Yangtze Valley, the most fertile region in China.

The majority interest in this system is owned by the Chinese Government, but it is American-equipped, American-manned, and American-operated, under a contract between the Chinese Government and the Americans, who own the minority interest.

Jump now across the Pacific Ocean to San Francisco and Los Angeles, Calif. Draw a line to Honolulu, thence to Midway Island, thence to Wake Island, thence to Guam Island, thence to Manila, in the Philippines, and then across the China Sea to Canton. If we succeed in our present efforts to establish a commercial air line over the vast waters of the Pacific, a distance of about 8,000 miles, we shall have the greatest overwater system of air ways in the world; and it will be under the American flag, because that flag floats over every island which constitutes the necessary stepping stones or stopping places for flying across the Pacific.

It is to the genius of American inventors, the Wright brothers, that the great boon of air transportation has been brought to humanity. We ought to lead the nations of the world in the development of this form of transportation, because it is not alone indispensable to the extension of our domestic and foreign commerce but also because it will prove to be the most vital element in our national defense. Other nations see this; and it is for that reason that they are seizing every possible strategic position for the extension and development of their air systems.

I believe that the United States can, however, hold the primacy in aviation, if we pursue a liberal governmental policy with respect to the extension of our domestic and international lines and if we educate our people to the benefits of this almost limitless field of exploration and healthful adventure. You may ask why it is important to develop these air lines—domestic as well as international. The answer is the same as that which would be given if you asked, "Why did we substitute the railroad for the pony express? Why did we drive the ox cart from our highways and replace it with the automobile?" In each case we did it for the simple reason that improved methods of transportation knitted the country more closely together and made it possible to move swiftly between all sections the food supplies and products needed for the life of our people, and for the prompt transportation of passengers, mail, and express matter.

Air transportation is in its infancy. Its perfection will mean a vast economic gain, while at the same time it will provide the trained reserve personnel and efficient industrial organization to meet any problem of national defense which may confront us in the future.

We must encourage the study of aviation, the practice of aviation, and gratify the eager imagination and desire of the young people of our country to engage in this new and marvelous field for thrilling achievement. We want all the young people in the United States to join the National Aeronautic Association, because they can contribute by their influence and enthusiasm the greatest incentive to a proper knowledge of flying.

Recently I made an appeal to the aircraft industry and the private flyers of the United States to cooperate with the National Aeronautic Association in an effort to win back the world's major airplane records. At present the United States is a poor second in the number of air records held by the countries of the world. We want to capture these records, because we want to maintain American leadership in the development and progress of aviation. I was gratified to receive a telegram from Jack Frye, president of the Transcontinental & Western Air Line, assuring me that his company will immediately undertake to restore eight world records to the United States. This company recently established a new flight record (11 hours 5 minutes) from Los Angeles to New York. I hope that other companies and individual flyers will engage in this effort in the true spirit of sportsmanship and achievement.

The National Aeronautic Association is a nonprofit organization. It is undominated by selfish or private interest. As its president, I receive no compensation and would accept none. My sole purpose in assuming this task is to make the Aeronautic Association a great agency for the advancement of the science of aviation.

I should like each of you to join the National Aeronautic Association. The annual fee is only $5, and you will receive a most interesting magazine every month. Other literature will be sent to you without cost if you will write to me, care of the National Aeronautic Association, Washington, D. C.

TENNESSEE VALLEY AUTHORITY

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed.

Mr. NORRIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2357, to amend the Tennessee Valley Authority Act.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senator from Vermont that the motion is not debatable during the morning hour.

Mr. McNARY. May I ask what is the motion?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion is to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2357, a motion to consider which was before the Senate yesterday. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Nebraska.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2357) to amend an act entitled "An act to improve the navigability and to provide for the flood control of the Tennessee River; to provide for reforestation and the proper use of marginal lands in the Tennessee Valley; to provide for the agricultural and industrial development of said valley; to provide for the national defense by the creation of a corporation for the operation of Government properties at and near Muscle Shoals in the State of Alabama; and for other purposes", approved May 18, 1933, which has been reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry without amendment.

CENSORSHIP ON CONGRESS

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, for the first time in American history the President of the United States addresses a letter of threatened censorship on the publication of testimony submitted in a hearing before a committee of Congress. He addresses a sharp rebuke to the chairman of a House committee for publishing testimony offered by an executive department.

The letter warns the House Military Committee that if it publishes testimony in executive session in the same way as testimony in open session—

I shall find it necessary, as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, to require that in the future such testimony be given only after approval by me.

It seems that the exasperating part of the matter is that the publication of the testimony revealed the fact that the War Department demanded an appropriation for secret air bases to be built on the Canadian border, notwithstanding our traditional understanding that the friendly relations between the United States and Canada were such that no military bases should ever be built along the 3,000 miles of our northern boundary.

It seems that the Canadian Government promptly called upon the State Department and refreshed the memory of that executive department by the reminder that at the moment the War Department was demanding Government funds to build secret war bases on the Canadian border, the State Department, through Under Secretary Phillips, was unveiling a tablet commemorating the signing, 118 years ago, of the Rush-Bagot agreement whereby the United States and Canada agreed never to militarize their frontiers.

When Congress is called upon to meet the expense of celebrating an agreement not to militarize the Canadian border, and in the same breath the administration asks for an appropriation to violate that century-old agreement, why should any committee of Congress be lectured by the White House for exercising its judgment in giving the testimony of such duplicity to the American people?

As long as "government of the people, by the people, and for the people" exists through a republican form of government in the United States, the people have the right to know what military steps are being taken by the administration that may commit this country to further war which they do not want.

The publication of this double-dealing testimony has already had a wide-spread wholesome effect; first, in curbing the imperialistic trend so strongly evident during the past 2 years; and, second, in warning the country of secret designs of the war lords. Whether inadvertent or deliberate, this publication of what the administration now calls "confidential testimony" is one of the best things that has happened since March 4, 1933. Also, it is one of the few wholesome acts, however unpalatable, that has come from the new-deal reign. The fact that the revelation of the two-faced attitude of the administration is distasteful to the Commander in Chief, and gives him and his methods away, does not detract from but rather adds to the moral value of this disclosure. If all the star-chamber proceedings of the present administration were laid bare by congressional publication, the people of the United States, as well as their Constitution, would be safer and stronger and less beset by uncertainty and destroyed confidence.

Under certain forms of government in certain reigns and sundry lands the greatest crime against the state is the crime of lese majeste. Revelation of the double-crossing maneuvers of the king, disclosure of royal duplicity in affairs of state, exposure of inconsistency and hypocrisy on the throne has sometimes under certain reigns led to the chopping block. In Russia today it is death to refer to Stalin as other than divine. Yet Comrade Tugwell informs us in a public document, franked to the country, that ours is no longer a government of law, but, like Russia, is a government of men.

Therefore to publish to the world the fact that the administration with its right hand is directing the Under Secretary of State to unveil a tablet in commemoration of the Rush-Bagot agreement of 1817, that proud historic compact of peace in which the United States and Canada solemnly agree never to militarize their boundary, while at the same time the administration with its left hand motions the War Department and its military lobbyists to ask for an appropriation to build secret air bases along that same border from which to attack British bases. Such a publication in the time of the Stuarts or Henry VIII would have been such a travesty on majesty that its author might well have trembled like Cardinal Wolsey and the printer be denied the privilege of licensed printing thereafter.

Three hundred years ago, in the days of John Milton, and of Charles I, and licensed printing, the first article of the British Constitution, as interpreted by the Stuart dynasty, was:

The king can do no wrong.

Had the House of Commons in those days published a pamphlet exposing the King by showing that he was doing with his left hand one thing and with his right hand another that the people wot not of, establishing secret war bases with his left while unveiling tablets of peace with his right, the House of Commons would indeed, 300 years ago, just before Charles lost his head, have committed the crime of lese majeste.

The House of Commons might well have been called to account and pointedly asked if they forgot the "King can do no wrong." If they admitted their ignorance or inadvertency, they might well have been served the notice:

I shall find it necessary as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy to require in the future such testimony be given only after approval by me.

The privilege of licensed printing would have been withdrawn from the House of Commons in the days of the so-called "Stuart tyranny", as historians today describe it, and the chairman of the offending committee would have been in a leaky boat, as when Wolsey published the record of Anne Boleyn in the time of Henry VIII.

It is true that the Constitution—article 1, section 8, defining the powers of Congress—contains subsections like these:

10. To define and punish * * * offenses against the laws of nations.
11. To declare war, grant letters of marque and reprisal, and make rules concerning captures on land and water.
12. To raise and support armies. * * *
13. To provide and maintain a navy.
14. To make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces.

Moreover, the offending congressional committee may have read article I and taken it seriously. The committee may have looked upon the Constitution as still effective, in 1935 as in 1787, indeed, as effective as during the long period from the inauguration of George Washington down to March 4, 1933, a period of 145 years.

This military committee of Congress, after reading the Constitution, may have concluded that measures such as secret air bases on the Canadian border, affecting the laws of nations, letters of marque and reprisal, captures on land and water, Army support, and regulation of the land and naval forces, were proper subjects for the determination of Congress and that Congress, as representative of the people, ought to let their people know what Washington proposed to do to them and their neighbors on the Canadian border.

It is evident that the action of the committee was inadvertent in this respect. They read the Constitution instead of the planned Fabian policies of the "brain trust." They followed Washington, Jefferson, and John Marshall, instead of "Comrades" Moley, Tugwell, and Barney Baruch.

Again, they may have reasoned this way: George V, of England, would not dare to "crack down" on the House of Commons because the latter chose to exercise its own discretion in publishing testimony. Then why should we hesitate to perform our function in the country of Emperor Roosevelt? If the generals do not like the reading of their own testimony, they do not need to read it, though the folks at home may enjoy reading it. The folks back home may like to know some of the things we are considering here. They have been used to it for 145 years. They think they have a right to know.

Looking at it that way, the committee seemed to be acting in good faith and reason. Also, they might reasonably say to each other that "the Rush-Bagot agreement of the year 1817 is a noble monument to peace on the American continent. The people of the United States have been cherishing it for 118 years. The President proposes to use us as handy scapegoats not only to make us traitors to American traditions to forward his nefarious schemes but also to take from us one of our chief claims in promoting the cause of peace. Therefore, let the President stand up under his words. He has shown no divinity that doth hedge him."

But the committee counted not on the wrath of the White House—Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, director of the generals and their utterances, drafter of the acts of Congress, the star-chamber tariff maker, possessor of the tax power in levying $800,000,000 of processing taxes, potentate of 57 alphabetical bureaus and 13 commissions, ruler of industry under 730 monopoly codes and a million Blue Eagles, the plowman of 15,000,000 acres of cotton, the slaughterer of 6,500,000 hogs and 200,000 sows, who had just come into possession of $5,000,000,000 in one lump sum, "subject to the allocation of the Executive" himself—a sum sufficient to nominate and elect, or "crack down" and defeat every member of that congressional committee, and reduce them to the fix of Cardinal Wolsey in the days of Anne Boleyn.

Wherefore the present status of the case seems to be this:

First. No copy of those hearings in which the generals gave away the secrets of the White House is now available.

Second. No member of that congressional committee dares even to allow a constituent to read his office copy.

Third. The privilege of licensed printing is withdrawn so far as that testimony is concerned, and no more testimony will go to the committee except "given only by approval by me"—Il Duce.

Fourth. The Rush-Bagot peace agreement of the days of early democracy under Presidents who then called themselves "Republicans" is suspended like the antitrust laws and the Constitution—subject to a new deal in secret air bases from which to launch defensive attacks.

Fifth. In short, the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy has taken over subsections 10–14 of the constitutional powers of Congress, just as previously he had taken over the tariff making, the tax power, or "power to destroy", as defined by John Marshall, together with the appropriation power in allocating the $5,000,000,000.

As "Comrade" Tugwell declared in an address delivered at Columbia University in November 1933:

I have had a chance to see the truth of the saying that ours is a government by men. The fiction that it is government of laws would, I think, never have attained its great prestige if the right men had been called to govern.

"Comrade Tugwell", as he was known in the Moscow press a year before this utterance, seems to have felt that the trouble with America was that its men in positions of Federal trust, such as Washington, Jefferson, Madison, and John Marshall, down to Lincoln, Harrison, Cleveland, and Theodore Roosevelt, and the Justices of the Supreme Court, who for 145 years had held up the doctrine that ours is a "government of laws", were not the "right men."

He had in mind that the ideal system and the "right men" were such as found where "government of men" prevailed, such as Stalin in Moscow, Mussolini in Italy, and Hitler in Germany. There the constitutions, bills of rights, and the powers of the lawmaking body are abolished, and "government of men" had superseded the old fiction of "government of laws."

Again "Comrade Tugwell", as he was greeted in Moscow, liked the kind of laws that were being drafted under the new deal in 1933. He described the character of the new acts of the new deal thus:

In fact, a careful examination of the new legislation will disclose that its novel characteristic is its provision of freedom for action by those who do the acting. The powers granted are mostly permissive; the rules written are mandates for performance. Everything depends on men.

"Comrade Tugwell" might well have added that inasmuch as all the men he had in mind were appointed from the White House and were White House errand boys, the Government we have today might be described as "government by and for the White House, wielder of the tax power and the billions for White House allocation. Everything depends upon the allocator."

There is one phase of this "crack down" on the publication of military testimony that seems to throw light on the meaning of section 606 of the Rayburn Communications Act of 1934.

In section 606 (a) the President, in time of war—

Is authorized, if he finds it necessary for the national defense and security, to direct that such communications as in his judgment may be essential to the national defense and security shall have preference or priority with any carrier subject to the act.

In 606 (c):

Upon proclamation by the President that there exists war or a threat of war or a state of public peril or disaster or other national emergency, or in order to preserve the neutrality of the United States, the President may suspend or amend, for such time as he may see fit, the rules and regulations applicable to any and all stations within the jurisdiction of the United States as prescribed by the Commission.

Fines up to $10,000, imprisonment of 2 years, and forfeiture of property are imposed for violations. Not only the President but Congress, in its various and sundry "emergency" acts drafted at the White House, appears already to have declared the "national emergency" that might be invoked under section 606 (c). It would be interesting to know if the Rayburn Communications Act, which the House railroaded through in 1934, is the boomerang which "cracks down" the House Military Committee in 1935.

At least one committee of Congress seems to have been threatened with loss of the privilege of licensed printing, such as John Milton deplored in his petition to the "Stuart tyranny" in that new-deal era of 300 years ago.

Lawyers recently have found that the new deal has created 151 crimes by the legislative authority assumed by Federal bureaus. They should now make it 152—the crime of lese majeste.

WANTS NO HELP FROM GOD

Mr. President, on April 22, on page 6116 of the RECORD, I stated:

A young man, Henry J. Burrow, Jr., from St. Paul, a Bible student, studying for the ministry, the other day visited our smiling President to urge him to set aside 5 minutes on some certain day for prayer for the Nation's troubles and against the impending drought. The guardians at the portals of his august majesty informed this young religious zealot that the President could take care of the situation; that he wanted no help from God. In short, if his ambitions are fulfilled, and they seem upon the verge of being fulfilled, he will become God as Lenin has been substituted in the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics for the Divinity. Christ, upon whose teachings this Republic was founded, will no longer need acknowledgment. Home and family ties, the right to worship God as we choose, liberty of speech and press and person, religion may be things of the past, as in Russia, where the late Commissar of Education Lunacharsky said:

"All religions are poison. They put the mind to sleep and destroy it; they kill both will power and conscience. War to the knife must be declared against all religions. Our task is the destruction of all religion and all morality."

I am in receipt of a letter from Rev. Zed H. Copp, of the Presbyterian Ministerial Association of Philadelphia, which reads:

PRESBYTERIAN MINISTERIAL ASSOCIATION OF PHILADELPHIA,
May 1, 1935.

Hon. THOMAS D. SCHALL,

Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR SCHALL: The White House, Mr. McIntyre acting for the President, denies in toto the Burrow incident.

Can you give me the local address, or get it for me, of Mr. Henry J. Burrow, so that I may have his statement of it?

Thanking you in advance, I am, with God bless you,

Yours truly,

ZED H. COPP.

The following is a letter written to one of my secretaries:

MAY 7, 1935.

Hon. O. R. LEEN,

Secretary Senator Thomas D. Schall,

112 Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. LEEN: Enclosed please find the affidavit which the Senator requested in connection with his remarks concerning my visit at the White House last month. I have carefully compiled this statement, incorporating into it answers to several questions that have been asked me by correspondents from coast to coast who read the Associated Press dispatch of April 22.

While the Senator suggested that he might want to make copies of this affidavit to send to those who may make inquiry concerning his speech, I have made this pretty comprehensive to copy it in toto, but have, in one paragraph, made a statement heartily endorsing the Senator's remarks which, if inquiry was made into the authenticity of his remarks, you could quote from the affidavit and save copying the whole.

I will be very glad to receive anything, either in the way of correspondence or CONGRESSIONAL RECORDS, that you may think would be of interest to me.

Sincerely, in His service,

HENRY J. BURROW, JR.

Mr. President, the following affidavit was made by Henry J. Burrow, Jr., 669 Dayton Avenue, St. Paul, Minn.:

ST. PAUL, MINN., May 7, 1935.

Hon. THOMAS D. SCHALL,

United States Senator, Senate Office Building,

Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In accord with your recent request I am glad to reaffirm in writing for you the account of my recent trip to Washington.

The chief object in making this journey was to present a plea to the President for a national call to prayer for the Nation's troubles, but in particular on behalf of the afflicted agrarian West. My justification for the journey was in three primary facts:

(1) The burden I believe the Lord has laid upon my heart, as upon others, for a national call to prayer;

(2) The historical record in God's word of the need for, and the resulting benefits from, national calls to prayer; and

(3) A modern testimony to the fruitfulness of united supplication last June 3 when I arranged for an N. B. C. network prayer broadcast for drought relief, resulting in what a Chicago daily termed "$10,000,000 rains", breaking a 64-day drought. (Cf. Sunday School Times, July 21, 1934.)

Upon arriving at the White House executive offices on Wednesday morning, April 10, 1935, and asking to see Secretary Marvin H. McIntyre for the purpose of making an appointment with the President, the secretary at the reception-room desk told me I must state my business and a request to see Mr. McIntyre in a letter addressed to the latter. This letter was typed nearby and brought right back to this same desk secretary.

After a considerable wait a very courtly appearing gentleman, with pad and pencil, presented himself, although without duly introducing himself. Until near the close of our brief interview, when because of change in his actions, I thought to ask him whether he was the secretary or not, this pseudo-secretary, Mr. R. C. Wood, of the secret police detail, allowed me to assume that he was, and once or twice to address him as Secretary McIntyre.

Because I had inclusively stated my mission in the letter there was little need to reiterate. Briefly I stressed the pressing need of the moment for a proclamation for a national call to prayer and my desire to personally present this plea to the President. This White House prolocutor, very gracious in his demeanor, replied that "I do not believe we should bother the President." In this remark, which he later repeated verbatim like a parrot, and throughout his conversation he appeared to be minutely careful to state only his own personal opinions. He said that he didn't know of any other President who had ever issued such a proclamation. When I called his attention to the Lincoln administration's action, he then sought to defend his position by attempting to quote Matthew 6:5-6.

"That's exactly what I told you a moment ago", I parried, "when I said that if this is undertaken it must be in the spirit of genuine repentance and humiliation before God." I then proceeded to briefly point out several Scripture passages to justify a national call to prayer. But the sword of the spirit, when rightly used, cuts deeply, confounds the mighty. My friend was clearly up a tree. So far, he had only stated his own personal opinions, and when I called him on this score and asked, not for his own attitude, but rather for the attitude of the administration, that I might have something tangible to report back on, he began to lose his smiling, diplomatic veneer. It was clearly evident in the way in which he had clung with such tenacity to his little ditty about not bothering the President that he had been arbitrarily instructed by his superiors. Bear in mind that I had stated my full business in the letter to Secretary McIntyre.

In the closing moments of our short interview he did not guard himself so closely when he said again, "Well, the President can't be bothered", and other remarks which, while I cannot quote exactly word for word, were to the general effect that the President could very well handle the situation without calling upon God in this way.

I heartily endorse, Senator SCHALL, the attitude and sum essence of your remarks upon the floor of the Senate April 22, 1935, as recorded in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of that date, as being the true reflector of that attitude which this representative of the President displayed to me during those few minutes above related. You have not quoted directly any of the words of the above interview, but you may feel free to use whatever I have herein set forth. May the Lord richly use these things to the glory of His Son in the stirring up of fires of righteous indignation within the hearts of His own people in these United States against the heart attitude of a President who, having taken his oath of office upon Holy Writ, will now allow his personal representatives to say that "the President can't be bothered" with a plea for a national call to prayer for the troubles of this Nation.

Such a course reminds me of the story of a small western community located near a high bluff. The children of the town used to use a flat terrace along the top of the bluff for their playground, that being the only available space and close to their homes. At all too frequent intervals one or more youngsters, in the thoughtlessness of their games, would come too close to the edge of the cliff, slip, and plunge to the bottom, either severely injuring or killing themselves. It was a relatively small community to be affording an ambulance, but the mayor felt it imperative to do so to satisfactorily care for the injured or dead children. One day came a stranger to town and suggested to the mayor, but without avail, that he sell the ambulance to pay for the erection of a high fence along the top edge of the bluff to prevent the children from falling over. Possibly the mayor was progressive for his innovation of a modern ambulance in so small a community, or possibly the fence idea was just plain "offensive" to him. At any rate, it was ridiculous. Likewise, it seems just as ridiculous to move the afflicted of this Nation onto ever-growing relief rolls or out of drought-stricken, dust-blown areas far up to isolated Alaska in a gigantic "progressive" movement when, sanely, we should be erecting, without any cost at all, a simple yet effectual fence of prayer, repentance, and humiliation before God. If "in God we trust", we should be claiming His promises and not those of any mere human. He has told us in His word that "If my people, which are called by my name, shall humble themselves and pray, and seek my face, and turn from their wicked ways, then will I hear from heaven, and will forgive their sin, and will heal their land." Nothing lies beyond the reach of prayer except that which lies outside the will of God.

May the Lord richly bless you and use you, Senator SCHALL, in His work of the administration of the affairs of this land once called "Christian." It is far better to be a good servant of the Lord Jesus Christ than to be a mighty (?) scepter swayed to and fro in the hands of the gods of Baal.

Until He comes, I remain,
Devotedly His servant,

AGRICULTURAL DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I submit the conference report on the agricultural appropriation bill, and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.
The legislative clerk read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6718) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture and for the Farm Credit Administration for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 16, 17, 34, 44, 47, 55, 56, 57, and 59.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 9, 10, 19, 21, 24, 27, 28, 30, 31, 32, 33, 43, 45, 46, 48, 49, and 52, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 11: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 11, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert "or"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 12: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 12, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$381,755"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 13: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 13, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$11,313,419"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 14: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 14, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "$76,635, of which $40,000 shall be expended for scientific investigation concerning control and eradication of bindweed and other noxious weeds"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 15: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 15, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: ", of which sum not exceeding $15,000 shall be used for experimenting in Sea Island cotton, including its hybridization with other varieties."; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 18: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 18, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$4,998,497"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 20: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 20, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$154,435"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 22: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 22, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$9,958,462"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 23: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 23, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$11,600,973"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 25: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 25, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$76,741"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 26: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 26, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$1,279,434"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 29: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 29, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate insert: "$347,229, including not exceeding $15,000 for investigation of the means of control of the Mormon cricket"; and the House agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 35: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 35 and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert "or"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 36: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 36, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert "or"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 37: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 37, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "$7,801,421"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 38: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 38, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$600,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 39: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 39, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$222,978"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 40: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 40, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$96,596"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 41: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 41, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$1,421,492"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 42: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 42, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$321,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 50: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 50, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$385,669"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 51: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 51, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert: "$423,269"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 53: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 53, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$1,540,879"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 54: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 54, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$1,968,637"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I am deeply disappointed over the result of the conference on this bill. I wish to say, however, that I absolutely absolve the Senate conferees. I know the chairman of the Senate conference made a desperate fight. He did the best he could. He did as well, I am sure, as anybody under the circumstances could have done.

I am disappointed because, as I said to the Senate the other day, the Budget had allowed $500,000 additional to enforce the Food and Drugs Act "as is." The House cut that amount to $250,000. Many things are needed to protect the American people against hazards to health and life. It seems to me a shame to think that we spend $3,000,000 a year to enforce the Meat Inspection Act—desirable, of course—and yet spend less than a million dollars to enforce the Food and Drugs Act. However, with a total appropriation of less than $1,000,000, the amount proposed by the conference, $25,000 will help a little bit.

The time of the Senate is too precious to be consumed by any argument. At some time when the opportunity is afforded, and the condition of the calendar is such that I shall be justified in taking any time, I shall go into this matter in extenso.

There are many things which could be done by the Food and Drug Administration if they had the money. Those things have to do with the health and the very lives of the American people. We ought to have had this added amount of money; but the conference committee has done the best it could, so I shall not interpose any further objection. I do not care to take my seat, however, without thanking the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL] for his valiant effort to accomplish the thing I had in mind, and which I know was in his mind.

So I am satisfied for the moment to let the conference report be adopted; but I do so with a mental reservation and, I think, with a moral reservation. It seems to me outrageous that we cannot have enough money to enforce an act which has to do with the highest welfare of our people. We spend millions in other directions—indeed, in these days we spend billions—but in the last analysis nothing is more important than health, and we have failed to get in this bill the amount of money needed to enforce health measures.

Within reasonable limits, health is a purchasable thing; and when we reflect that for the want of a little money the health and lives of our citizens may be impaired or taken away, it is a shame, as I see it, that we cannot have those funds. The season is too late and there is no time now to go into the matter extensively, but I enter my protest, and at the same time thank the chairman of the committee for the efforts made by our conferees to add more funds to the bill.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Georgia, in charge of the conference report, what the status now is with reference to the appropriation concerning the extermination of noxious weeds.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, the conferees went very thoroughly into the question raised by the Senate amendment, which provided originally for the appropriation of $100,000, in addition to the regular appropriation, for scientific research in the development of ways and means for combating the bind weed and other noxious weeds.

It developed in the course of the conference that this was not exactly a new pest, that the various experiment stations and agricultural colleges of the West have for something like 10 years been conducting a series of investigations to determine the most practical and least expensive methods of combating these weeds. It is agreed very generally that the most effective method yet devised for this purpose is through the use of either sodium chlorate, or of common salt. Both of the methods which have been employed are very expensive. The use of salt injures the land and renders it useless for a long time. Sodium chlorate is imported very largely from abroad. The importations have amounted to over 7,000,000 pounds a year, and the price to the farmer, when it is purchased in small quantities, is approximately 9 cents a pound. All investigations have developed that sodium chlorate is the most effective chemical to kill these weeds and it does not injure the land. If a cheaper method of developing and marketing this chemical, or one of similar value, can be discovered, it will be a great contribution to the extermination of these weeds.

The House conferees finally agreed to an appropriation of $20,000, to be expended by the Bureau of Chemistry and Soils, for the purpose of investigating a method of developing a cheaper means of producing chemicals to combat these noxious weeds. That action was taken after conference with the head of the Bureau of Chemistry and Soils. It develops that there is ample authority conveyed in the bill to permit the Bureau of Chemistry and Soils to work in conjunction with any established agency of the Government. The person who has this work in charge contemplates an investigation and research work at Muscle Shoals, in conjunction with the Tennessee Valley Authority, in the development of the chemicals to be used in combating noxious weeds.

The Senate conferees therefore obtained a concession of $20,000 from the House conferees, and obtained, in addition to the $25,000 heretofore agreed upon, a concession of $15,000 on the appropriation to be expended under the Bureau of Plant Industry for other lines of scientific work to discover new means of combating these weeds.

The Senate conferees therefore secured $60,000 net over the amount contained in the bill as it came from the House originally. I might state to the Senator from Idaho that it was exceedingly difficult to obtain any concession whatever from the House conferees on this amendment, as well as in regard to the one referred to by the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND]. The conferees on the part of the Senate exhausted every argument they could think of. The conference dragged on interminably. The bill passed the Senate on the 29th day of March, and the matter has been pending between the two Houses, practically, ever since that time.

I hope the Senate will agree to the report of the conference committee. I doubt very seriously whether any further concession could be obtained from the House.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have no doubt the conferees on the part of the Senate did the best they could with the problem and I have no desire further to interfere with the consideration of the conference report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

INVESTIGATION OF PLUMBING AND SANITARY SYSTEMS IN FEDERAL BUILDINGS

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, the House of Representatives on April 24, 1935, passed House Joint Resolution 254 providing for an investigation by the United States Public Health Service of the plumbing and sanitary systems in Federal Government buildings, which was referred to the Senate Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

I think the joint resolution should be passed immediately by the Senate. It involves the expenditure of no money. I have conferred with the leader on this side, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], and the leader on the other side, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY], and I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be discharged from the further consideration of the joint resolution, and that the Senate proceed to consider it at this time.

Mr. NORRIS. A parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. NORRIS. If consent shall be granted and the resolution passed, that would not affect the pending business, would it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not if it is done by unanimous consent. The Senator from New York asks unanimous consent that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be discharged from the further consideration of House Joint Resolution 254, and that the joint resolution be now considered.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, is this the joint resolution about which the Senator spoke to me a few moments ago?

Mr. COPELAND. It is.

Mr. ROBINSON. It is the one the Senator discussed also with me, is it?

Mr. COPELAND. It is the same measure.

Mr. ROBINSON. The one pertaining to certain investigations by the Public Health Service?

Mr. COPELAND. That is correct.

Mr. McNARY. I think it well that the joint resolution be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be read by the clerk.

The joint resolution was read as follows:

Whereas since 1933 the danger of the outbreak of epidemics such as amoebic dysentery has become a threat to public health; and

Whereas defective plumbing and cross connections between sewage and water supply lines have been presumptive causes therefor; and

Whereas these dangers increase with the age of plumbing systems; and

Whereas the Government buildings throughout the United States have many of the oldest types of installations: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the United States Public Health Service be, and is hereby, required and directed to make a complete survey of all Government properties for the purpose of eliminating dangers of the type indicated in Government buildings and report to the Congress on or before January 3, 1936, the cost involved in making desired eliminations and improvements.

Sec. 2. The United States Public Health Service be, and is hereby, directed to make a study of the relation of amoebic dysentery to plumbing and issue a report to the Congress on or before January 3, 1937, for the benefit of the medical profession and the plumbing industry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

TENNESSEE VALLEY AUTHORITY

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2357) to amend an act entitled "An act to improve the navigability and to provide for the flood control of the Tennessee River; to provide for reforestation and the proper use of marginal lands in the Tennessee Valley; to provide for the agricultural and industrial development of said valley; to provide for the national defense by the creation of a corporation for the operation of Government properties at and near Muscle Shoals in the State of Alabama; and for other purposes", approved May 18, 1933.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, during the second session of the Seventy-third Congress I introduced a bill in the Senate, which I send to the desk and ask unanimous consent to have read. I do this for I should like to have it appear at this point in my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the clerk will read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill to regulate the expenditure of public moneys heretofore and hereafter available for expenditure in carrying out the act of May 18, 1933, known as the "Tennessee Valley Authority Act of 1933", and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc., That all moneys heretofore or hereafter made available for expenditure in carrying out the purposes of the act of May 18, 1933, known as the "Tennessee Valley Authority Act of 1933", of whatsoever character, shall be deposited and covered into the Treasury of the United States to the credit of a fund to be designated the "Tennessee Valley Authority fund", and be withdrawn therefrom only pursuant to accountable warrants for advances to the credit of an adequately bonded disbursing officer, as determined by the Comptroller General of the United States, or certificates of settlement issued by the General Accounting Office.

Sec. 2. No part of such moneys shall be used to make payment under any formal or informal contract in excess of $100 hereafter entered into except in case of public emergency requiring immediate action, unless the need be advertised so as to permit of full and free competition, and award made to the lowest responsible bidder offering delivery or performance in accordance with the advertised specifications.

Sec. 3. Except in the case of a public emergency requiring immediate action, the facts of which emergency shall be duly entered of record and filed with the contract, no bid shall be accepted until after a lapse of 7 days from the date the bids were opened nor while there is pending a protest filed in writing, either with the Tennessee Valley Authority or the Comptroller General of the United States, or any questions otherwise raised and undetermined by the Comptroller General of the United States, involving the corporation's procedure, the bidding or effect thereof, or other matters affecting the legality of the proposed obligation, or the availability of the money proposed to be charged.

Sec. 4. The Comptroller General is authorized, in his discretion, to allow credit for payments from moneys under the control of the corporation, not otherwise allowable, when shown to be reasonably necessary to the accomplishment of the work authorized by law to be done by the corporation.

Mr. BARBOUR. This bill, Mr. President, required that all expenditures made by the Tennessee Valley Authority thereafter should be passed upon by the Comptroller General, and its introduction was prompted at the time by reason of the awarding by the Tennessee Valley Authority of contracts to others than the low bidders.

I may say in this connection that the fact that the Tennessee Valley Authority did not come within the full purview of the Comptroller General was made known to me in the first instance by a constituent of mine who came to me and complained that while he was the low bidder and a responsible bidder, making a bid on either some machinery or materials which were known to be standard, he had been turned down, and that the Authority had awarded the bid at higher cost to someone else. In order to try to help my constituent I went to the Comptroller General to find out how such a thing as this could have been done, and he told me that under the act creating the Tennessee Valley Authority it was a fact that he had no control as in all other cases, over that particular agency of the Government other than simply purely auditing control. And I want to mention here before I forget it that the bill I have just spoken of was referred to the Committee on Finance and there languished and died.

Now in order to make the situation clear, Mr. President, I want to point out that under existing legislation the Tennessee Valley Authority, of which Muscle Shoals is a part, enjoys a corporate status despite the fact that it is financed by public funds. Public moneys which have been made available for its use are deposited in the Tennessee Valley Authority's private checking account. The proposed legislation would have returned moneys still available on account of the original appropriation of $50,000,000, to the Treasury of the United States, to be withdrawn only upon accountable warrants and, accordingly, brought within the real purview of the Comptroller General.

The proposed measure also would have prevented the Tennessee Valley Authority from awarding contracts within less than 7 days from the time of receipt of bids, and would automatically have stayed the awarding of any contract above a specified small sum when protests had been filed in writing with either the Comptroller General or the Authority. Full and free competitive bidding also was provided for.

In other words, Mr. President, in introducing this bill, calculated to bring all future expenditures by the Tennessee Valley Authority, of which, as I have said, Muscle Shoals is a part, within the law, I did so because I was convinced there exists no valid reason why that Government agency should not be subject to the law as are all other departments and independent establishments.

True, T. V. A. was given a corporate form, apparently so that it could sue and be sued, but no Member of Congress anticipated—at least, in my opinion no one did—that its officials would seize upon the matter of such status as justifying disregard by them of statutory law not specifically set aside by the enactment bringing it into existence; that is, the Tennessee Valley Authority Act of 1933. Yet, just such an attitude has been assumed by the officers of the Authority. Anyway, they have not observed the law with respect to awarding contracts to low bidders ready to supply the particular need. This, in my opinion, is indefensible and always has been indefensible. It involves an improper use of the public funds intrusted to the Authority to do the gigantic work provided for in the law by which it was created; it is unfair, it seems to me, to citizens who are in a position to supply the public needs involved; and whether justified or not, it necessarily subjects such officials of the Government itself to charges of unfairness and to criticism, if not something even worse.

The T. V. A. officials, by reason of the corporate status of the Authority, are claiming to be beyond the reach of the Comptroller General of the United States, the official upon whom the Congress must rely to see that public funds are only lawfully employed. While I am sure there was no such legislative intent, upon investigation I find there exists a technical justification for such assumption of authority and a doubt whether the Comptroller General possesses the means to require the officials of the Authority to observe the law in their uses of public funds. It seems that through giving the Authority a corporate status the public funds involved, direct appropriations and income, do not necessarily leave the Treasury on accountable warrants requiring law observance to justify the giving of credit by accounting officers for expenditures made.

It is a serious matter, because, unlike most corporations authorized by Congress to be created, the Authority necessarily must make vast and numerous purchases. It is engaged in a huge building program, spending millions upon millions of dollars for machinery, equipment, tools, lumber, cement, and supplies of almost every nature and kind. It has a large force of employees, and there are involved pay rolls, travel, and other miscellaneous expenses. It is in reality a large independent establishment of the Government and should function as such—and should function in conformity with the safeguards which through years of experience have been found to be not only expedient but necessary to avoid extravagance, favoritism, and wrongdoing.

The bill provided for a return to the Treasury, as I have said, of all public funds involved, including both appropriations and income from all sources, in order that this money may hereafter be withdrawn only in such manner as will permit the Comptroller General to see that as to all expenditures the law has been obeyed.

My bill further provided, Mr. President, that citizens who feel they have not received at the hands of the Authority officials the consideration to which the law entitles them in the matter of bidding on public business may have 7 days in which to make protest to the Comptroller General in order that he may investigate and determine the protest before arbitrary action is taken by the Authority. This is virtually the procedure now followed with respect to like matters arising in the Government departments and establishments and which is giving satisfaction and beneficial results.

To this there was added in my bill a saving provision to make sure that any special and out-of-the-ordinary condition may be properly cared for. None are anticipated, but it is just possible a situation could arise where to accomplish an authorized corporate activity it would be necessary to contravene some regulatory statutes apparently applicable. If such a situation should arise, the Comptroller General under the last section of the bill would be authorized, upon a showing of such necessity, to give credit accordingly. It is anticipated there will be little need for this authority, but to guard against the possibility of unnecessarily restricting or retarding the work it is believed the authority should be given.

Mr. President, as I have said, this bill, which I introduced in the Seventy-third Congress, second session, and which carried the number S. 3274, languished in committee and never saw the light of day. I now offer that bill as an amendment to the bill now before the Senate and ask that it be printed and lie on the table. In other words, I offer the bill again, in the form of an amendment at this time to the bill now pending.

THE PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. BARBOUR. The Tennessee Valley Authority seems to oppose this suggestion of mine. Anyway, the bill has never come out of committee. It was impossible for me to get anywhere with it. Of course, I cannot say that the T. V. A. officials are afraid to have it enacted into law, because I do not know what their feelings in this respect really are or what their reactions to it actually were when I originally offered the bill, but I can say that entirely aside from what I may call the philosophy of the Tennessee Valley Authority and its competition with private industry, the fact that it lives on the money of the taxpayers, with whom it competes, and without going into any of those deeper or more controversial aspects of the problem which is now again before the Senate, I cannot see how anyone who is for the pending measure, or who is against it, or who is even indifferent to it, can take any exception to the suggestion I make, which is the same as the suggestion I made a year ago, that the Tennessee Valley Authority be brought within the full purview of the Comptroller General and his department. No other agency, no other independent department; no other function of the Government has the same preferred and unusual status or special privileges in this respect as has the Tennessee Valley Authority. It is true, as I mentioned before, that the Comptroller General now does the auditing of the books of that organization, but it is purely an auditing undertaking. He can only count the horses periodically, from time to time, that are left in the barn. He can take no action concerning any which have escaped or have been ill-tended, or have been given away or sold. His is simply a recording function without the real control over anything which he exercises in all other cases.

Perhaps I should say that I believe there is also one other department of the Government which is not fully under the purview of the Comptroller General, for, as I understand it, this is true in respect to the Shipping Board; but, Mr. President, as I understand it, the Shipping Board is now in liquidation, and for that reason it makes no material difference, anyway. And doubtless if it were to be continued actively as a governmental agency or department in the future it would be brought within the full purview of the Comptroller General.

I only mention the Shipping Board, Mr. President, because I want to be perfectly fair in my remarks, and, so, to that end, I qualify my statement that the Tennessee Valley Authority is the only department of the Government that is free from the purview, in the sense that I mean, of the Comptroller General and his department.

I should like to have any Senator explain to me why this particular activity that is the T. V. A. should thus be free from that control which is part of our recognized governmental system. Bear in mind that every penny which goes into the Tennessee Valley Authority is public money, and, as I have said, it now simply goes into their own private, so to speak, account. They draw their own checks for anything for which they want to draw them; they award contracts to anyone to whom they wish to award them; and, while I am not now saying that they purposely draw money to the order of those for whom they should not draw money, or that they necessarily purposely either award contracts to those to whom they should not award them, I do ask, regardless of whether this great activity, the Tennessee Valley Authority, is to continue or is not to continue; regardless whether the measure before the Senate, which will double the capital of the T. V. A., increase the scope of its activities, and, as I understand, validate certain things which the Authority is now doing, which I believe, at least, do not come within the powers granted them in the original act—regardless of all those things, Mr. President, I ask is there a single Senator in this Chamber who can advance a valid reason in the world why the Tennessee Valley Authority should not come under the full and complete purview of the Comptroller General?

That, and that alone, at the moment, is the burden of my entire argument at this time; that is why I have again brought to the fore the bill which I introduced last session and now ask to have considered in the light of having been again offered; this time as an amendment to the pending measure, and when the proper time shall come I will press for its consideration.

I do not want anything that I have said to be misunderstood; I intend no personal implication in anything that I say; I am not trying to antagonize any particular Senator's point of view or any particular Senator's wish.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. BARBOUR. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the Senator's bill simply provide that the Comptroller General shall examine into this activity as he does into all other departments and bureaus of the Government?

Mr. BARBOUR. It does, as I understand it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have not seen the Senator's bill, but I will say that I see no reason in the world why the Comptroller General should not have jurisdiction to make an examination of the accounts of this activity. Of course, that would be in the interest of good government, and if the Senator offers such an amendment as that, I expect to vote for it.

Mr. BARBOUR. I thank the Senator very much; but, as I do not know whether or not the Senator from Tennessee has a full comprehension of what my bill does embrace, may I say it was read a moment ago by the clerk and will appear in the RECORD preceding my remarks. I may add, for it is no secret, that in its preparation I consulted with the Comptroller General and have been aided by his suggestions and advice in respect to this matter, as it would affect the Tennessee Valley Authority, though I, of course, take full responsibility for my proposition.

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall be glad to look into it.

Mr. President, now just one thought more. I certainly do not want to be accused of indulging in a filibuster. I could not filibuster if I wanted to do so; I am not that kind, and I do not approve of filibusters, anyway. As a matter of fact, I do not think there has been any filibuster. If there has been, I do not know whose filibuster it was. Only two Senators have spoken thus far on this subject, both at considerable length, to be sure, but one against the bill and one for it, and I cannot see how their acts can be construed as being a filibuster, and I do not want mine to be so construed.

I wish to say, however, in conclusion, that I feel that the suggestion I make is sound. I cannot see how anyone can controvert a word which I have said or bring a single valid argument to the fore to persuade me not to press for this particular action in respect to this particular bill.

POSTMASTER GENERAL FARLEY

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR], during my absence sometime ago, made quite a little effort as though he wanted to take up the Farley resolution. I never did believe the Senator was serious in any effort to take up the Farley case. I always know my friend—

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will be very happy to take it up at any time which will suit the Senator's convenience, and will make an arrangement by unanimous consent that he shall have double the time that any other Senator on our side shall have. I am ready to vote on it with or without argument, and I will be glad to take it up at any time.

Mr. LONG. The point I am making is that the Senator has sat here ever since I returned and made no effort to call up his report, but every time I leave the city of Washington I read in the newspapers where the Senator from Tennessee gets up and undertakes to call up his report.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; the Senator has not read anything like that in the newspapers, because nothing like that has happened, and I do not believe that the newspapers have been publishing statements of that kind. They were false if they were published. I do not believe the Senator has read anything about it. I am ready to take up the Farley resolution with the Senator any day he will name. Just let him name a day, and I will undertake to get unanimous consent to take up the resolution.

Mr. LONG. The point is that the Senator has absolute control of his own measure. The facts are that while I was in Des Moines I was informed by my office that the Senator made some grandiloquent gesture here and wanted to take up the Farley resolution.

Mr. McKELLAR. The RECORD shows whatever was done. Why does not the Senator refer to the RECORD? The RECORD does not show anything of the kind.

Mr. LONG. Let the Senator look up the RECORD.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator is making these charges, and this particular charge is a false charge, because there is no truth in it. I will be delighted to have a vote on the Farley resolution at any time the Senator is willing to have it. I have not offered to take it up when the Senator was away from here.

Mr. LONG. If the Senator will just pause for a moment and read his own language, I think he will find out that he has probably forgotten, as he has usually done, about matters of this kind.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; I have not forgotten.

Mr. LONG. The trouble about the Senator from Tennessee is that if I did not come here and remind him of what he did the year before he would forget about it.

Mr. McKELLAR. The trouble with the Senator from Louisiana is that he does not know a fact when he meets it in the road, but the Senator is constantly misstating facts on this floor, just as he is now doing. The statement the Senator has made is untrue; that is all there is about it.

Mr. LONG. The great trouble with the Senator is that he does not even know his own record. A year or two ago I had to read to him his own tariff record. I have always maintained a charitable disposition toward my critics. I believe that it is best to convert them.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator is talking about critics. I have not criticized the Senator at all and I am not criticizing him now, except when he makes an attack on me. I want to say to the Senator that he cannot do that and get away with it. He has been getting away with that sort of thing in the Senate, but when he undertakes to attack me I am going to hit back every time. The Senator can understand that. All I am asking of the Senator is, instead of making these false statements before the Senate, to be sure that his facts are correct before he makes the statement.

Mr. LONG. What did the Senator do? Let us get it straight. What did he do?

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Tennessee has courteously asked the Senator from Louisiana time and again, privately and on the floor, to agree to take up the so-called "Farley resolution." I should like now to have the Senator to agree, and I am asking him to agree, to take up the resolution.

Mr. LONG. I am agreeable to taking it up at any time.

Mr. McKELLAR. When? "Any time" does not mean anything.

Mr. LONG. At any time.

Mr. McKELLAR. When does the Senator mean?

Mr. LONG. Any time, beginning now.

Mr. McKELLAR. The resolution cannot be taken up now, because there is another matter before the Senate.

Mr. LONG. The trouble is the Senator has waited every time he could have had the resolution taken up. The Senator does not make any motion; the Senator always gets up at some time when it cannot be taken up. I was present on one occasion when we had a call of the calendar and the Senator got up and moved that the resolution be voted up or voted down when we were supposed to be passing unobjected bills.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent that immediately after the conclusion of the morning business on Monday next, the Farley resolution be taken up for consideration and a vote.

Mr. LONG. "For consideration."

Mr. McKELLAR. And for a vote.

Mr. LONG. What does the Senator mean by that?

Mr. McKELLAR. I mean that after the resolution shall have been considered, it be voted on.

Mr. LONG. Yes. O. K.; I will agree to that; there is no objection to that.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, may the clerk state the proposal? I want to know just what the Senator from Louisiana is "O. K.ing." [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the request for unanimous consent.

The CHIEF CLERK. The request for unanimous consent is that, following the morning business on Monday next, the Senate proceed to consider the so-called "Farley resolution" now on the calendar, and vote on it.

Mr. McNARY. That suits me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. McKELLAR. Now the Senator can have it taken up on Monday.

Mr. LONG. Since the Republican Party has O. K.'d what I O. K.'d, and we have got the Farley resolution coming up, I want to say that I was fearful that the Senator from Tennessee might have some criticism to make about some other remarks I am going to make, and that is why I wanted to get this matter all straightened out before I went a little further.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator is fearful of criticism, he had better not make his remarks.

Mr. LONG. One great trouble about the Senator from Tennessee is that he does not give anybody any credit for the help given him. As a matter of fact, he did not know his own record on the tariff and forgot all about it until I looked up all the articles produced in the State of Tennessee and made the statement on the floor that he had voted for a tariff on every one of them.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I will yield in a moment. I just got the Encyclopaedia Britannica and examined it to see what articles Tennessee produced. Without taking the time to look, because I know the Senator from Tennessee a whole lot better than he knows himself, I made the statement that he did vote for a tariff on the enumerated items I read from the Encyclopaedia. He raised a general holocaust about it, so I sent and got the RECORD; and, sure enough, it showed that he voted for a tariff on nearly everything Tennessee produced, and on nearly everything he had to swap for to get other Senators for a tariff on the things Tennessee produces.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I want to say that the Senator again is utterly oblivious of the facts. The statement the Senator makes about my vote on every article produced in Tennessee is not true. That is all there is to it.

Mr. LONG. I shall get the Senator's record before I conclude my remarks. The Senator has forgotten again. I am not going to fail to convert him this summer. He reminds me of a character we had in our section of the country who was converted every time we held a protracted meeting, but if we did not hold a protracted meeting he failed to be converted during the next winter. The trouble has been with the Senator from Tennessee that every summer we have to hold a revival on the tariff question to make the Senator from Tennessee shut up on it for the next 6 months. I am going to hold that revival in just a few minutes. I have the unfortunate task of having to refer to a compilation prepared by my Republican friends in which they include everybody's record. I shall have that brought here in a little while and read it to the Senate.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. BONE. In view of the fact that these horrible disclosures are now about to be made and because most of us enjoy the sparkling colloquy between the Senator from Louisiana and the Senator from Tennessee, may I ask the Senator from Louisiana if he would like to have a quorum called?

Mr. LONG. I believe it is unnecessary now. The Senator from Tennessee is here and that is the only thing we need to enable us to carry on. As long as the Senator from Tennessee is here we will get along pretty well somehow.

Mr. President, the facts are that the Senator from Tennessee has been championing the free-trade reciprocal agreements which the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] disclosed the other day. Every time anybody gets up and talks about the tariff on this side of the fence the Senator from Tennessee, in a very laudatory way, accuses us of being cheek by jowl with the Republican Party and seeking to vote with the Republicans on that matter. It is one of the gifted ways he has of always referring to the Democrats who try to dispute his attitude on the tariff question. He says those Democratic Senators are cheek by jowl with the Republican Party. The Senator from Tennessee never had anything like that said about him, and it does not make any difference. The Senator from Tennessee has been very lucky. As long as we were protecting Tennessee products he has never had anything to say about it. In other words, it is only a question of whose ox is gored.

However, Mr. President, I did not rise for the purpose of dealing with that particular question. I have some other remarks to make on another matter pending in the Senate, to which I shall address myself; but in the course of my speech, whenever the information comes, I shall read the tariff record of the Senator from Tennessee.

THE RIGHT TO THE SOLDIERS' BONUS

What I rose to speak about is the status of the bonus. I do not want to have the President proceeding without Mr. Farley's advice while we are considering the bonus question. I had it in mind to say to the Senator from Tennessee that I was not going to do anything that might take away from the President of the United States the counsel of his aid; but if the President has any aid who is advising him now, I want to consult with his advisers, directly or indirectly, for the benefit of the Democratic Party.

I want to ask him if they want to do the party a service, and if they want to do the President a service, I want to suggest that as soon as they can they send somebody to him to tell him to pay attention to the hundreds of thousands of telegrams and letters which are coming in to him protesting against his vetoing the soldiers' bonus. I had rather have the opinion of some of those people than of some of the advisers to whom the President is listening.

In this morning's papers and in yesterday morning's New York papers appeared a series of editorials in which an effort is being made to diffuse into the mind of the people erroneous propaganda that the soldiers' bonus is an inflation measure, threatening the country with worse damage, because the $2,200,000,000 will be payable out of Treasury notes to be issued under the Patman plan.

Mr. President, I have in my hand the record of how Senators have voted on the issuance of currency. I make this statement with the RECORD to back it up: There is not a Senator in this body who has not voted in favor of currency being issued by the United States Government against the obligations of the United States. There is hardly a Senator sitting here now or absent now who has not voted that the United States Government should take whatever bond or whatever obligation the United States Government had issued and issue Treasury certificates or Federal Reserve bank currency on that obligation of the Government. Only one exception has been made, and that is the certificates which have been given to the ex-soldiers. Only that one exception stands out today.

If a bank holds a Liberty bond of the United States Government, if a bank holds one of the recent bonds issued by the United States Government, or a Panama Canal bond issued by the United States Government, or any other kind of bond that has ever been issued by the United States Government that is held by the banks, it cannot only draw the interest on those notes of the United States, but it can put up those bonds, clip the coupons semiannually or every quarter, as the case may be under the terms of the bond, and nonetheless, with the bond as collateral, can have issued by the Government its currency which the bank can circulate among the people, based on those bonds.

That is being done throughout the length and breadth of the country right now. What is the reason for that attitude of the so-called "conservative sound-money men", who are today in the United States Senate under a system which they voted, which permits the United States Government to issue any amount of bonds it wants to and which permits the bankers to take those very self-same bonds and have circulating currency issued against them, and nonetheless, with the currency outstanding, still they draw interest on the bonds. How anyone who has ever voted for that kind of thing can justify a vote against issuing Treasury certificates for the payment of the soldiers' bonus, no one has been able to explain and never will be able to explain.

Mr. President, I want to read the record on that matter. Here is the vote shown at page 67 of the bound volume of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 9, 1933, disclosing that 73 Senators voted for and 7 against H. R. 1491, which embodied the principle included in H. R. 1 in that it permitted banks to deposit Government obligations payable in the future and receive money in return for them, the amount of which circulating notes shall be equal to the face value of the direct obligations of the United States so deposited as security.

Just think of that. Every man except seven in the United States Senate, when the bankers came down here with their holy anointed proposition, every Member of the United States Senate with the exception of seven voted for circulating currency to be issued as against the obligations of the United States Government payable in the future in the full face value of the amount. There is only one difference between that situation and the proposal contained in the Patman bill. After they got their circulating currency under H. R. 1491, they still drew their 3½-percent interest and nonetheless had the circulating currency in the meantime.

That is not the only thing. There was also embodied the principle which allows the Federal Reserve banks to furnish Federal Reserve notes to member banks in return for any sort of security so long as the security was satisfactory to the Federal Reserve bank. That was to help out the banks.

This kind of money costs the Federal Reserve banks 27 cents a thousand dollars, the cost of printing. That is all it did cost them. The Federal Reserve banks pay no taxes on any transactions or on the money received and use the credit of the Nation free. This bill bears the signature of Mr. Franklin Delano Roosevelt and it was voted for by every Member of the United States Senate except seven. The seven Senators who voted against it, however, are all, with the exception of one, who is now dead, listed as men who are voting for the present soldiers' bonus.

But, oh, no! The present President of the United States is being appealed to, is being wrongfully advised that he cannot do for the soldiers what he has done for the rest of the bondholders of the country; that he cannot do even half as much for them. The present President, who on March 9, 1933, signed a bill, and who not only signed a bill but who had sponsored in the Senate a bill that allowed a bank to put up any kind of Government obligation, however far in the future it might be payable, and draw down as much currency as the bond amounted to, and draw interest on the bond at the same time—the same President is being called upon to veto, and probably will veto, a bill which gives the soldiers the same thing without the interest.

There is only one difference in the two propositions. The only difference between this bill that we all voted for on March 9, 1933, and the Patman bill is that the soldier gets only the money and does not get the 3½ percent interest in the meantime. That is the only difference; and yet the President of the United States, who is following this kind of counsel and advice—if he is getting any advice from anybody—is leading the Democratic Party to slaughter. He has already led the Democratic Party to slaughter with these various kinds of contradictory pieces of legislation, one granting one thing to one preferred class, and another denying the same thing to a less fortunate class.

Let me analyze that for a minute. If we had passed the Vinson bill we should have had two and a quarter billion dollars of bonds, we will say. Under this bill they could have taken the bonds provided for in the Vinson bill and put up the bonds and issued two and a quarter billion dollars of money and drawn interest on the bonds just the same. There is only one difference in regard to currency between the Patman bill and the Vinson bill. The bank can call in the currency under the Patman bill if it wishes to do so and give its bonds for it; or the bank can take the bonds and have currency issued against them under the Vinson bill and draw interest just the same and still have all the currency it ever started out with; yet the soldier cannot be paid the bonus. The President of the United States, we are told by the public press, if he is being correctly represented before the American people, is being advised to take this course—the man who set his hand and seal in favor of the financial masters of the country drawing interest on money that they never have invested at all. I repeat that statement—drawing interest on what they never have invested at all, living on the interest of what they owe—you have heard that said.

Did you ever hear of a man living on the interest of what he owed? Well, this gang do it under this bill. They actually draw 3½ percent interest on what they owe. The same set of men are the ones behind the President today advising him to make the glaring mistake and miscalculation of common-sense judgment of being led into a proposition to veto the soldiers' bonus.

This is not the only vote we cast. So as to show that it is no mistake, that the same thing was done before that time and after it, I will read another one that occurred after it.

On February 27, 1934, last year, page 3369, bound CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Senate bill 2766 was reported by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. This is what was done by the Senator from Virginia himself, who will vote, I guess, to sustain the veto. He is just about as wrong on this matter, I think, as he is right on some other matters. This bill, Senate bill 2766, provides for an extension of the time for 1 year, with permission to the President to extend it for 2 years further, in which Federal Reserve banks may issue money in return for the deposit of Government obligations. That is what was done by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. The mechanics of the transaction are as follows:

The Federal Reserve agent accepts the security and deposits it with the Federal Reserve banks. The Federal Reserve agent is also chairman of the board who completes the transactions with the Federal Reserve banks. There was no record vote on the bill, but no Senator raised his voice in opposition to it. It went by unanimously in this body.

Are the Members of the United States Senate willing to give the veterans the same rights and privileges with regard to Government obligations that they voted to give the banks of the country on February 27, 1934, and on March 9, 1933?

There was one before that, on July 11, 1932. Fifty-three Senators voted for it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?
Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Did the Senator from Louisiana protest against the passage of the bill to which he has just referred?

Mr. LONG. No; I did not. I did not protest against it. It has been a custom of this country to do that for many years before I came to the Senate. It had long since been an accepted policy of our financial leaders that Congress had approved time and time again.

I wish to say to the Senator from Tennessee that in the year 1917, I believe, I defended State Senator S. J. Harper in the United States court in Alexandria, La., on the charge of sedition and treason, I think. I believe the prosecution was brought under the Espionage Act. Old man Harper wrote a book pointing out that this kind of fraud was going on at that time—that they were bonding the United States for around twenty to twenty-five billion dollars to run a war, when as a matter of fact they did not have to bond the United States for any such thing as that if they did not want to. They indicted the old gentleman and put him on trial in the United States court in Alexandria, La. He was the only man who was tried by a jury during the war on a charge brought under the Espionage Act, throughout the length and breadth of the United States, prior to the armistice of November 11, 1918.

I never did approve of that sort of thing, but it was the accepted law. It got to be so bad, however, that the bankers of the country were able to place on trial for sedition, and to compel the resignation—because this man probably would have had physical violence done to him had he remained in the State senate in those days, when young men like myself were first coming up down in the South—they were able to place on trial a man who dared to criticize the policy by which they bought the bonds of the United States, drawing 4 percent, put them up with the bank, drew the currency and still drew the 4 percent, and never were out a dime.

That went on; and when a proposal to do it again came in here, and it was done, I do not think it will be found that I voted against it. If my name is found at all in connection with the matter, I think it will be found that I voted for the bill. I did. I was one of those who voted for it. The bill was unanimously passed. It became the policy of Mr. Franklin Delano Roosevelt, and I went along with him as far as I could.

I do not mind telling my friend the Senator from Tennessee that at that time I was only trying to save State banks, and managed to do it with the help of many other Senators; but the President of the United States went on record, and he is still on record, that the distressed banks or nondistressed banks should have the right to put up the bonds they had bought from the Government, and not only should they have the right to draw circulating currency to the extent of 100 cents on the dollar, but they had a right to draw the 4-percent interest on the bonds that they put up, on which they had this money issued to them in the first place.

Now, here comes a soldier. Here comes a man who put his body in the front trench. Here comes a man who faced the German charge and the German cannon. Here comes a man who went through the poisonous gases. Here comes a man, whether he was maimed or not, who went through 40 hells of the dreads of the experiences he was to see, and did see, in the service of his country. I want to say this to the Congress of the United States:

You who are here now who were here when the war was declared, and those of us who are here now who came here since the war was declared, sit here as the body corporate, we sit here as the successors in title, we sit here as the same force that sent these men to the war; and we did not send them to the war of their own free will and accord, either. I do not expect to hear that statement challenged. These men were not sent to war of their own free will and accord.

In the first place, they did not want the war declared. The majority of the people of the United States did not want war; and if we had submitted the declaration of war to a popular vote, it would have been voted down by 20 to 1 in the United States the day it was declared, if I am any judge of sentiment down in my part of the country, and if that represents the sentiment in the rest of the United States.

In the second place, when they had declared the war, many young men felt that the only thing they could do then, whether they favored the war or not, was to go; but even then there were not enough, and the bulk of the United States Army had to be collected under the draft law. Many men who volunteered in the United States Army did so because they either knew Congress was going to pass a draft law and take them whether they volunteered or not, or else, after the draft law was passed, they volunteered because it would not be very long before they would have to go under the draft law. Even with that, the bulk of the American Army was taken under the Selective Draft Act; and that is where we got our soldiers to fight Germany, 3,000 miles away from where trouble ought to have started.

The Government officials took those men into the Army. What did they pay them? They gave them $1.25 a day. That is what they gave them. They took a man away from his work and gave him $1.25 a day. They took him away from whatever kind of a job he had built himself into. Why, gentlemen of the Senate, a man does not build himself into a job overnight. Many men sitting in this body think a man can be taken out of his job tomorrow morning and brought back a year later and he can go right back to work in the same job. That is not the way jobs are made. An organization of laborers and superintendents and mechanics is built from the ground up. There is a laborer here who knows this mechanic. There is a mechanic here who knows this foreman. There is a foreman here who knows this machine. There is a machine here that is coordinated with something on the outside. The salesman who sells the output of the factory and the entire operations of any business are interlocked from the bottom right up to the top; and the idea that a man can be taken out of a business today and brought back 2 years later and put back into the same business is entirely fallacious, and nobody but a politician who has not had time to learn anything else would believe any such thing.

So they took those men away for a dollar and two bits a day, a dollar a day, or a dollar and a quarter a day, and they worked them for a dollar and a quarter a day. Notwithstanding the fact that the average man at that time drew from three to four dollars and a half a day, you worked the soldier for a dollar and a quarter a day, and when the soldier came back, who had taken his chances on death every day, who had lain under the tents or on the ground facing what the next day might bring to him; when that man came back from that hazardous toil, maimed or not maimed, with his occupation gone, what did the Congress finally vote to give him? The difference between the wages the lowest common laborer had received while the soldier was in the war, and what the soldier drew while he was in the war. In other words, Congress said, "The average wage of the common laborer while this soldier was in the war was three or four dollars, and the soldier drew $1. Therefore, we give to him an obligation of the United States Government representing the difference between what he received and what the commonest laborer received while that soldier was in the trenches."

Then he was not put back into as good a job as the one he had left. No; he had to find a job. Did all the soldiers find jobs? No. Others had taken their positions. When we entered the war some young man out of the law school, who had built himself up to a few cases, turned those law-suits over to somebody else and went to the trenches. When the war was over he came back. He had not kept up with the advances in jurisprudence; he had not kept up with the clientele; he was no longer known in the professional field. The Government gave him nothing. He started out brand new and probably never got another chance to be known in his profession of the law.

The young men in the universities, the young man in mechanical occupations, the young man in the counting houses, had the same experience. I will give an example of one in a banking house. I said to a young man, "It is your own responsibility whether you go to the war or not. You asked me what you ought to do. I do not advise you what to do. I will tell you what I am going to do. I will go when they call me." He went when they called him. But they called him. He was a single man with no dependents, a young man working as assistant cashier in a bank. When he came back from the war, where did he have to go? There was another man working in his job as assistant cashier of the bank, and another man had risen to the position next to that. He finally found himself working as a sawmill hand, and at the end of 15 years he has never built himself back into as good a job as the one he left.

The Senators and the Representatives here have never been niggardly with anybody except the soldier. There has never been a time in the history of the Congress about which I can find out anything when the Congress has ever been niggardly with anybody else who has worked for the Government, though it has recently been somewhat niggardly with some of the Government employees—but all the time it has been niggardly with the victims of the World War. It has followed nothing but a niggardly policy, temporizing and talking about being "afraid of the soldier vote." I do not ask a Senator to be afraid of the soldier vote, but I do ask Senators if that kind of prejudicial argument is going to drive them away from doing justice through the bonus bill.

What is the reason for not paying the money? Is it because the soldier is not entitled to as much as you would have claimed if you had been there? I ask Senators to think for just a moment. If you bring someone to Washington in civil life, he does not receive less than three or four dollars a day. That is the least anybody brought here now receives. Three or four dollars a day is a pretty cheap wage. As a matter of fact it is a good deal more than that in some cases, even with the commonest Government employee here in Washington.

It makes no difference what kind of Government employee may be brought here, there is no Senator who would stand here on the floor of the Senate and deny to that man some kind of standard compensation.

I was talking to my friend the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], who voted wrong on this bill—voted absolutely wrong on this bill. He is too good a lawyer and he is too good a man to single out the soldier and do him the only injustice I have ever seen him do in this body. The Senator knows, and I know, that there was not any such thing as a livable wage paid to a soldier in the trenches. He knows, and I know, that this policy of issuing bonds and then of issuing the currency on those bonds is a standard policy of this Congress and of the present President of the United States, and was the policy of his predecessors. Why should we today single out the soldiers for discrimination, at a time when, above all times, this country needs money?

I have stood with my friend from Arizona here and fought for the remonetization of silver. Why? Not that Louisiana had any silver mines, but I fought to get more money in circulation in this country because the country needs more money. While you are doing an act of justice to the soldiers—and it is very subnormal justice, at that—if now while you are doing an act of almost compelled justice—because the mind of any Senator here who will be reasonable at all must be compelled to admit that this is an act of simple justice, and that is the most you can make out of it—why not do a double good?

We have been trying to get money into circulation in this country. We have been trying to get this Government of ours to put money into circulation. Time after time we voted here to put more money out among the people. On this side of the Chamber, almost without a single exception, and on the other side of the Chamber many have voted time after time that this country needed more money, that it needed more circulating currency. The bill to which I have been referring, the first one on which we voted, was passed because we thought there ought to be more money in circulation, and that bill was supposed to accomplish our purpose. That was one of the reasons why we passed the bill allowing the bankers to have 3½ percent; it was in order to get more money into circulation in the country.

At the time we enacted these laws the United States Government had about six and a quarter billion of circulating dollars. When the Democratic Party went into power the circulating currency of the United States amounted to around six and a quarter billion dollars. We did not think that was enough, so we enacted these laws providing for more money, and we voted for the laws which allowed the deposit of bonds and the issue of currency by the Government.

How much of a gain was there in money? We here, all of us here, I think, without exception, perhaps with one exception at the most, voted for the circulation of more money. We had six and a quarter billion dollars when we so voted, and today I think we have five and a half billion dollars. We voted for more money, and instead of getting more money, we have three-quarters of a billion dollars less money today than we had when we voted to have more of a circulating medium in the country. I am not by myself when I make that statement, Mr. President. It was made on the floor here the other day on the authority of statistics issued by the Treasury Department.

Not only can I say that that is what we intended to do—that is, to issue more money—but the present President of the United States was practically committed to the policy, and the reason why he signed the bill to which I have been referring was that there was a need for a bigger and more expansive circulating currency. We had six and a quarter billion hundred-cent dollars. Now we have five and a half billion 59-cent dollars. That is the amount of money there is in the country.

The President did reduce the gold content in the dollar so that the dollar is worth 59 cents instead of a dollar, but we had six and a quarter billions of hundred-cent dollars before he started, and now we have wound up with five and a half billions of 59-cent dollars.

We have taken all of the gold into the United States Treasury, and today there is in the United States Treasury $9,000,000,000 worth of gold, and there are only five and a half billion dollars of money in circulation, not including silver. The United States Treasury today has $9,000,000,000 in gold, and only five and a half billion dollars of paper money is outstanding.

If we issued the two and a quarter billion dollars, there would be outstanding about seven and a half billion dollars' worth of currency as against $9,000,000,000 in gold.

We sound-money men—of whom I am one, a genuine sound-money man—have been running on the old Bank of England theory that we ought to have 40 cents in gold in the Treasury for every dollar of paper money or any other kind of money that is out. In other words, the sound money was on this basis—Wall Street and the Bank of England gave it to us—that the Treasury ought not to have outstanding more money than could be covered by the gold on hand in the proportion of 40 cents to the dollar.

What would that mean today? That would mean that the United States Government could have outstanding, without there being inflation under the rule of these money masters, twenty-two and a half billion dollars. Right today, under the theory of the law, the United States, on the 40-cent-reserve theory, could still have outstanding twenty-two and a half billion dollars of money, and not have inflated a dime.

I heard the Senator from Pennsylvania, Mr. Reed, when he was here during the last Congress, plead day after day that the Congress of the United States ought to protect the gold reserve of 40 cents in gold for every dollar of circulating medium, and now we are down to a proposition of issuing currency against an obligation of the United States Government payable in the future, and what do we hear said when we propose to issue money against a reserve of 40 cents in gold for every dollar issued? We hear the cry of "inflation" against paying 100 cents. They do not even want an issue of seven and a half billions of dollars against $9,000,000,000 of reserve. They are even making the contention here before the Congress of the United States that because in the present case it is the soldier and because it is the poor man instead of the banker who is getting this money, that it is inflation, when as a matter of fact there will be a reserve of $1.20 in gold to each $1 of currency circulating.

There never was a grander outrage ever perpetuated on a simple-minded American people than the presentation of this flimsy pretext of the President to veto this bill, and any man who believes he knows anything about the money business, the soldiers' bonus, of human nature, or anything else, who will go back and advise the President of the United States to veto the soldiers' bonus; if he has the welfare of the United States at heart or if he has the welfare of the Democratic Party at heart and still does such a thing, he ought to be bored for the hollow horn. Any man who would go to the President and make that kind of pretended argument and present that kind of cynical and imaginative checkered scheme should be bored for the hollow horn.

There have been times when I would have said that the mind of the President is not so simple as to accept that kind of argument. There have been times when I would have said that these silly kinds of ridiculous, contradictory illusions could not have approached and affected the mentality of the present occupant of the White House. I say, there have been times when I would have said that, Mr. President, but I wonder if the time has come now when the present President is being properly represented. Can the man who pronounced that a bank could take a Government obligation and draw 100 cents on the dollar and still draw the 3½- or 4-percent interest on the Government obligation, notwithstanding the fact that it had dollar for dollar in currency at the same time; can the same man who advocated that policy on the theory that 40 cents in gold was a sufficient base for the issuance of a dollar in currency; can that same man now be heard to say that a soldier who fought in the war for America's salvation and perpetuation cannot take the Government's obligation and get currency for it which shall be issued against a reserve of a dollar and twenty cents in gold, which shall be issued without interest, and at a time when the issue of such circulating medium will do more good for this country than at any other time since the present incumbent has been President of the United States?

What has happened to the President? What has happened to the President? I guess old Barney Baruch is advising him again. [Laughter in the galleries.] Old Barney is still around. I hear Barney's voice without seeing him. There is an old song, "I hear you calling me." I do hear him calling. I can just imagine that every time the President of the United States has placed upon his doorstep the means by which he can do immense good to humanity, by which he can sail within the confines of all policies prescribed by himself and by his predecessors, whenever that time comes when, according to all accepted standards, there is an opportunity for good to be done to millions of people, there must be somebody calling. Somebody is calling the President. "Somewhere a voice is calling!" Whose voice is calling? Why is it calling? For what is it calling? Only one thing, and none other. They have got this thing cooked up. They are going to have a high old hog-killing time around here. They have some more fish to fry. They need everything the Government has got, and they do not want any resource of the United States Government to get beyond their own grasp. They have another trip on the Nourmahal planned to come off before long. Vincent Astor will have that old boat fixed up and steamed up again and some loud-smelling victuals for the folks who come on. Oh, there will have to be another trip on the Nourmahal.

The President says he goes out on the Nourmahal to find out the conditions of the country. He says that he cannot find out just how the country is going along in Washington, but that he gets on that boat and goes fishing and comes back and knows just all about it. [Laughter in the galleries.]

Bless your soul, there will be another trip on the Nourmahal. That boat almost had its proper name—that Nourmahal. It should have been called the "Normal Haul." Their normal haul is a subsidy contract that has to be signed by the President of the United States or by some of his appointees to carry the mail down to South America and over to Cuba. Sometimes they will carry about two letters and they will get about $6,000 for making one trip with a mail sack with two letters in it, and sometimes they will get from $900 to $3,000 for every letter they take to some of these little old countries under one of these ship-subsidy contracts. The main man in that business is this little man by the name of "Brother Vincent Astor." He and his clique are in it. They have this ship-subsidy business under the International Mercantile Marine Co. all cornered off. They have a virtual monopoly of it, and they have set up a kind of royal family rule. It seems that so long as the name "Roosevelt" can be used in connection with that business it ends all argument. In other words if the Teddy Roosevelt, Jr., and the Kermit Roosevelt clique can be kept satisfied nobody can criticize the Franklin Delano Roosevelt side.

In other words they have this world preempted. It is kind of like it was in the days of Richard I. So long as Richard I, Coeur de Lion, led the Crusaders and his brother, Prince John, kept pretty well in line at home, those two represented the two sides of English thought. And so the two sides of governmental and financial thought are lined up with the Franklin Delano Roosevelt and the Kermit-Teddy Roosevelt, Jr., elements.

As we read in the newspapers soon after the last campaign was over, when I had gone out and begged the washerwoman and deck hands to donate money for the party, the President took a vacation cruise down around Florida, and we read in the papers that Kermit Roosevelt was working to settle the old family feud so that everything would be hunky-dory and lovely in the family, so Kermit Roosevelt and Vincent Astor sailed Franklin Delano Roosevelt, President-soon-to-be, on this Nourmahal yacht, and away they went down around among the waters of the British. Now and then they would be joined by Sir Somebody and Count Something or Nothing. And finally, when they made the last trip, when the time came, according to the President of the United States, that he had to get away to find out what the people of the United States were thinking about, and how they were getting along, they not only dodged out on this Nourmahal $5,000,000 yacht, they not only got out into the British waters, but they had dinner out there in the British waters with the Duke and the Duchess of Kent, the duke being one of the sons of King George the Fifth and Queen Mary the Four-Fifths. [Laughter in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEWIS in the chair). Ladies and gentlemen who are in the galleries, the Senate is pleased to have you here as its guests. The eminent Senator addressing this body has the right to dignified attention. I am obliged to tell you the rules of the Senate prohibit visitors from engaging in conversation or laughter or such manifestations as might ordinarily be indulged in in the moving-picture shows. It is hoped there will be no more of it.

Mr. LONG. I do not wonder that the gallery does regard that kind of business out of that Nourmahal as a moving-picture show. There have been times, Mr. President, when I should have said the mentality of the President of the United States was above that kind of thing. I say, there have been times when I should have said that he was above that kind of chicanery. There have been times when I would not have believed he could have been taken on a wild-goose chase or run around in the waters of Great Britain with the duke and the duchess at a time when he is endeavoring to learn something about what is happening in the cotton patches and the wheat fields and down around these concentration camps, where the poor devils stand in line at night with soup cups in their hands trying to get something to eat. There have been times, as I said, when I thought he would have had better sense than that. There have been such times.

Now he comes back to find out what is to be done.

I only have the public press for my authority. I do not know how much of it is true; I do not know how much of it is untrue. I again have to admit that I am a new man in the field of legislative experience at the most. I have been in this body now only for a little over 3 years, and I have not attended all the proceedings during the 3 years; I have not even attended as many committee meetings as many of my colleagues have attended during that time. So I must confess that what might be called my apprenticeship has been more or less slight in the legislative field. However, I never have been able to figure out, on the lines of common sense, how a man is going to be able to go out before the people of the United States of America and say, "I sponsored a bill to give the bankers the right to draw a hundred cents on every dollar of Government obligations, payable in the future, which they wanted to put up and draw interest at the same time", and then say that the man who took the chance of his life during the World War, maimed or not, should not draw a hundred cents without interest. I never have been able to fathom how that is going to be explained to the average mind of the Senate; and I assume that the average mind of the Senate is as good as or better than the average mind on the outside of the Senate—and I think it is. I do not know as yet, and I have not heard anybody say as yet, how that is going to be explained.

There is not anything but influence from the highest order being used here now, calling upon gentlemen as a party matter to act in a certain way. If it is a party matter—and it is not—it was the Democratic Party that sent the soldiers to war; it was a Democratic administration that sent these men 3,000 miles away from home to "make the world safe for democracy"; and now it is the Democratic administration professing democracy that comes back and says to a soldier, "How do you stand? As equals? No. You have got obligation of this Government"—a very poor one to start with, inasmuch as the most we were willing to give him was the difference in the wages that a field hand drew and the wages the soldier drew while he was in the Army and faced all the dangers which he surmounted. "You have got a Government obligation which represents common day-hand wages during the time you faced the rifles of the Germans and the tear gas of the Austrians. That is all you have." We have given the banks the right to put up whatever obligations they may and secure currency, although they are no better than are the obligations of the soldiers. They ought not to have been any better. Will any Member of the Senate tell me that he gave the soldier a worse obligation than he gave the banks? If so, it is admission that he did not treat the soldier right in the first instance. But the bank has an obligation. All right; put it up; a hundred cents on the dollar in currency is paid and goes out.

The soldier has an obligation. All right; no, you do not get any currency. He says, "Why, no; I am not asking you to give me the 4-percent interest that the bank draws on its bonds, and also gets a hundred cents on the dollar in currency; I am not asking you for so much as you gave the bank." What is the answer? The answer has not up to this time been made in this body, and no answer upon which a man can stand will be made in this body.

My friend, the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE], reminds me of a significant fact. The banks went out and bought up many of these Government bonds at all the way from 85 cents on the dollar up; these wonderful patriots went out and bought up Liberty bonds at 85, 86, 87, 90, and 95 cents on the dollar, and some of them, perhaps, for a dollar; but notwithstanding the fact that the banks bought such bonds for 85 cents they were allowed to put up that 85 cents worth of stuff and get a dollar of money and draw 4-percent interest on it at the same time. That is what the Congress has seen done; that is what the Congress allowed to be done.

When the soldier who has been given less than a field hand's wage for a similar period of service comes back here he is not allowed to get dollar for dollar of the meager compensation he is given, notwithstanding the fact that he is to draw no interest on it.

I wish to say, Mr. President, that I have got less respect for a man who would use a soldier, a laborer, or anybody else to flaunt a demagogic, unjustifiable argument than I have for anybody else; I have no faith in cowardice in voting; but I have still less respect for those who would create the opinion that because a man who was a soldier now holds a Government obligation he has not as much right to draw money on that obligation of the Government as has a bank the right to draw money, although at the same time the bank may draw interest on the obligation.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. BONE. I wonder what the Senator thinks of the proposal of the Senator from California [Mr. McAdoo] who made the suggestion during the present session—and I think it was made also at a previous session—that the proposed issue of Treasury notes which were to be employed to pay the bonus should be underwritten by a legislative pledge to create a fund designed literally to amortize those Treasury notes; that is to say, it would be called a sinking fund, but fundamentally its purpose was to amortize the issue, if I may use that expression. It would provide by taxation for the payment of the notes over a period of years, but in that way we would not be paying anything but the principal, and the notes would retain really, in a legal way, the characteristics of a debt.

Personally I have given some thought to that matter, because the proposal did not make the money pure fiat money but did allow it to retain, in fact, compelled it to retain, something of the character of a debt, on the theory that something cannot be obtained for nothing. However, at least, it avoided the payment of interest by requiring only the payment of the principal through taxation. I should like to have the Senator from Louisiana tell us, if he feels the question is fair, what he thinks of the proposal to amortize a debt of that character by the method indicated.

Mr. LONG. I would not have had any objections to amortizing that debt in that manner. It would not affect it one way or the other. It would have taken away, and I so stated at the time, the flimsy pretense that was being urged against the issuance of currency in that it would have provided a sinking fund for the retirement of the currency, which at least would have been said to be as sound as a sinking fund for the retirement of bonds and much more solvent, because there was no interest to be paid. I do not think that is necessary; but I should have no objection to such a provision being tacked on to this bill now.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield further to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. BONE. I am sorry to divert the Senator, but I am wondering if he does not agree with me that at least the sinking funds would be created by taxation, and the absence of the interest burden to the bonus debt would in the long run leave the credit of the United States Government much better off than if bonds were issued?

Mr. LONG. Yes; it would leave the Government $1,800,000,000 better off by the 3 percent at 20 years alone. It would be that much better off and would be much sounder. That, however, is not the main reason why the bill will be vetoed, if it shall be vetoed.

The President is on record here as favoring far more unsound proposals in the form of issuing circulating currency than is that. At a time when the Treasury did not have anything like as much gold he was willing to issue a hundred cents on the dollar for every bond that was outstanding. If they had issued currency on all the bonds outstanding at that time we would have had $19,000,000,000 worth of currency. He just might as well say now that he authorized $19,000,000,000 worth of currency under the act of March 9, 1933, as to say that the Patman bill is inflationary. One would be the same as the other.

Mr. President, I guess we are up against it with the President.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield further to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. BONE. I hope my friend from Louisiana will not think I am trying to interrupt his speech, but I want to refresh his memory about one thing that doubtless he will recall. The workers who stayed at home during the World War were compelled to purchase Liberty bonds; in a great many instances there were regular monthly deductions from their wages; and then they were pinched later and were compelled in many instances, many of them coming under my observation, to sell the bonds to the banks for 85 cents on the dollar.

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir. I was one of the men at home who helped perform that fraud on the American people. I was one of the men who went out into the lumber camps and into the lumber mills and into the turpentine camps and out on the farms and induced the employers to make the men who were working for them take a bond and pay for it out of their wages; and when the time came that a man had to pay the merchants and the bankers in the fall of the year, just about the time that he had his bond paid for, or nearly paid for, he would have to turn that bond over to a bank for 80 or 85 or 90 cents on the dollar, and then the bank took the bond and sold it for a dollar. So greedy were they that they were like the little old man running a gambling house in Port Barre, La., who did not have sense enough to keep a good thing when he had it; so greedy were they that, with this kind of manipulation, they were ripping the American people wide open and skinning them going and coming, buying bonds for less than par, getting full currency for them, and drawing 4-percent interest at the same time. Nobody denies that, because it is a fact; there is not a Member of the Senate who will question it; no one dares to question it, for it is a fact. But they were not satisfied even with that. They had to go over into Germany and down into Bolivia and into Venezuela and other foreign countries and float out the hair and hide of the American people until they bankrupted the United States.

I started to tell about the little old man in Port Barre. He had a pretty good little game he was running there. He had a dice game where he would throw out six dice. He had a magnet arranged so he could put his foot on a little clutch at the back of the counter and make all of them come up sixes. He had another one by which he could make them all come up aces. He had fleeced the gamblers coming and going. But he was not satisfied. Every night when business would get dull he would slip over to Baton Rouge, across the river, and sit in another man's game, where the other man had some other kind of a skin-game he was working.

So, with all the fleecing these financial masters were doing of the American people, skinning them coming and going, right and left, they still could not be satisfied, but had to go over and fish around in England and Germany and France and down around Venezuela, and they took the pants off of them and left them with practically nothing to wear.

However, I will say this for them: They did not risk their own money very much. They were always playing with the balance of the American people's money. Whatever loss there was they usually found a way of putting it back on the American people. Then they would come to Congress and have Congress finance something to make them whole, and we did it. I shall prove that to you before I get through.

After they had flimflammed the American people and skinned them coming and going to make up for the bonds they had bought in Germany and Bolivia and France, they would go down to the Federal Reserve bank and get themselves made whole. How would they do that? They went down into Louisiana and Arkansas and Mississippi and had the Federal Reserve bank examiners, under our old friend Andy W. Mellon and his clique of second-story workers, say, "Here, we are not going to have the Federal Reserve bank issuing new currency and lending you money on these non-liquid assets."

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, the Senator from Louisiana is libeling the second-story operators by a comparison of that kind. [Laughter.]

Mr. LONG. But they cannot come out and complain. That is the trouble. Mellon can stand it, but they cannot. I can make the comparison because they do not dare identify themselves. It is not very fair, I will admit, to the second-story workers.

Here is what was done. This financial crowd went to the banks—I was helping to keep some of them open in those days—and said, "You little old bank at Winfield"—that is the town from which I come, and that is always a good example; lots of people have heard about Winfield—"this mortgage you have here on Jim Jones' store is no good. It is not liquid. It is not turn-overable on the market tomorrow. This obligation that you have over here on Sam Brown's farm is not liquid. Get rid of these nonliquid assets and get some liquid assets."

About that time they would send in somebody from the Chase National Bank or the National City Bank to give them a list of Bolivian bonds and German bonds and Peruvian bonds and various other bonds, a flotation of bonds down in Brazil in the State of San Paulo, those coffee bonds which they floated. They floated those devilish things to where they were so high that a cat could not jump over them, and the minute they got those German marks and those Brazilian and Peruvian bonds, out of their own hands because they found out they were stuck with them, what did they do?

They said, "The Peruvian bonds have gone down." They said, "The Brazilian bonds have gone down." They said, "The German and Bolivian bonds have gone down." But if anyone had looked into the Chase National Bank he would not have found a German bond there. If he had looked into the National City Bank, he would not have found a Peruvian bond in their vaults. But they went down to Tennessee and into other States and said, "Here, it is not fair to tax these big banks to keep these little insolvent banks open. You ought to close them up so the big solvent banks of the country can operate", and the devilish, contemptible United States Government did it, too. If there had not been four or five of us here who bearded the lion in his den in the United States Senate on March 5, 1933, they would have completed the job from center to circumference and from Dan to Beer-sheba. We had to break with this man we elected President of the United States and tell him to go to hell with his patronage to keep them from ruining us on the 5th day of March 1933, and ever since that day he has been trying to ruin every man that broke with him.

No; they are not through with us. Some day the story will be told in the United States. Some day this story will be understood in the United States. Some day the men who sold out the soul and body of the American people and practiced these discriminations against the men who faced the enemy for the salvation of this country are going to be known in these United States, and I am going to be one of those who will tell it. They may think they can pull off this kind of swindle on the American people and get away with it, but they cannot do it. They cannot operate that kind of hokum and get by with it in the United States when the facts become known, and for the life of me I cannot understand how anybody can follow a philosophy of that kind and believe in the kind of propaganda which is going on in the United States today.

They did more. They did worse than that. They came back and hooked up this banking law which was introduced into the Congress on the 5th day of March 1933 and made themselves solvent in whole. They did more than that. There was a reason why they had to have that law. I did not discover it then. There was a reason why they wanted to put these little banks out of business. It was that had not the United States Federal Reserve bank stood in the way there would not have been one of those little banks down there that might not have maintained a suit for damages against the pyramided concerns which put out those flotations in the United States. But there has not been one of them that could bring suit. I have consulted with several of them and we thought about suing some of the concerns that floated those bonds, but we found we were up against a brace game.

We thought about suing these racketeers and these crooks and these thieves on some of those Peruvian and Brazilian and Bolivian and German bonds which they sold in this country, but we found we were up against a brace game. We found out that the men who had our lives momentarily in their hands were in charge of the situation, and the trail went too high and they were too closely identified with our immediate life for us to dare to take a chance on rescuing what those thieves had skinned us out of, so we had to stand it. That is what we had to do. They had bank laws written so that we had very little chance to do anything about it. So much for that.

Now we come back to the soldiers. Stand by your bank law? Oh, no; that is meant for the bankers. That is meant for Mr. Morgan. That is why the House of Morgan and the House of Rockefeller are down there today. They finance the revolutions in those southern countries. When Mr. Rockefeller wanted to get hold of Venezuela to put foreign oil in the United States that he could produce down there with slave labor, so as to keep the oil produced in this country from being sold in competition with it except on his conditions and under such control as he was willing to have, he financed every war that was going on down there in those countries, either at the expense of the Treasury of the Government of the United States or by flotations which they worked off on the American people out of the Federal Reserve bank, and the Treasury Department was used to put them over.

Do not forget that at the time they were making the banks throughout this country take these flotations from the big banks, the Treasury Department was issuing statement after statement that the banks ought to liquefy and get hold of these bonds. They had old Barney Baruch publish a long interview in the American Magazine and in all the newspapers. He was running the Hoover administration and he has been running this administration pretty well ever since, when he wants to do so. Old Barney is getting out from under. There is such a thing as a rat leaving a sinking ship, but the ship is somewhere near sinking when he leaves it. Old Barney is not that good—or, rather, he is not that bad.

There is such a thing as a bird flying when he sees you are going to shoot at him. We boys used to go out in the woods and try to get another kind of bird that does not wait for you to get ready to get a shot at him, but flies before you ever get a gun in your hand. I remember one time when I tried to shoot an old crow that I saw. I was riding along in a buggy and saw the crow on top of an old log standing off in the field, so I just rode up right behind a thicket so the crow could not see me at all and reached into my buggy to get the gun to shoot the crow. Thick as that thicket was, the minute my right hand got back near the gun the old crow flew away. [Laughter.] The minute Brother Barney Baruch saw this thing squiggling he "got his" and got out, and appeared before the committee and, oh, he was a good man, and we have not seen him since. [Laughter.]

He is gone for good. He stood with the Hoover administration until it was wrecked, inside and out. He issued articles—I put one of them in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the other day—saying that German bonds ought to be sold to the American people and others to the tune of about $8,000,000,000, I believe. Mr. Hoover was flattened out worse than a pancake, and took his crusade over to Palo Alto, Calif., where, under the shade of the umbrellas, and cooled by the breezes wafted from the palms, he could sit and watch the wreckage, as old Nero watched the burning of Rome—but old Brother Baruch came right on back down to the White House and got hold of another President.

We have Presidents and Presidents, but Baruch goes on forever; and his clique, Baruch and Morgan and Rockefeller, have managed to see to it that, notwithstanding the prerogatives and the rights that have been granted to them, none have been granted to the two or three million soldiers who are the holders of these certificates today. These men have wrecked and they have pillaged, and they have profited from every pillage.

Today the Chase National Bank, the National City Bank, the houses of the imperial financiers of America, who undertake to keep the soldiers from being paid this obligation of the Government in a medium they are accustomed to using, and who are granted interest, while the soldiers would not be granted interest—today they use the processes and the financial resources of the Government to carry on their exploitation.

I understand there is a drive on even to call in Members of the House and the Senate as a party measure. I understand that they want to call in Democrats and say that the President of the United States has raised the banner and declared it to be a policy of the Democratic Party to sustain this veto. Let the Democratic Party rally around that kind of standard a few more times and see what is left of the Democratic Party. The Republicans have always been able to use the Democrats pretty well. They have managed to keep us from reforming very much. Somebody told me in my very early days in politics that some old Republican, when things were looking very bad in his State or in the United States, was asked the question, "Well, what is the Republican Party to do?" His reply was, "You can always depend upon the Democratic Party to do some damn-fool trick that will make the election simple before the time comes around."

I do not know how long ago that occurred; but I can say that if the Democratic Party is led behind this kind of travesty and disaster, if it is led behind this kind of outrage, if it is allowed to invoke this kind of discrimination, if it is allowed to issue money to the banker for 100 cents on the dollar for a bond that the banker bought for 85 cents on the dollar, and give him 4 percent after he has already gotten back the circulating medium, and then turn around to a soldier who has faced the trenches, who has faced death, who has faced danger and destruction, and decline to give him 100 cents on the dollar without interest, then the Democratic Party can be depended upon to do whatever is necessary to make it easy for the Republicans.

I have been in various States of the Union. The people are not such a dad-gummed set of simple-minded nitwits as the high-minded politicians would have us believe. The people have not that little sense. Somebody ought to go down here to the White House and advise this man. As long as he asked me to come around there, I advised him. [Laughter.] You go and ask him and see what he says. I understand that he does not ask you to come around there very often when you advise him, but as long as I went around there I advised him. I did not need any advice or I should not have gone around there.

I went to the White House to advise the President, and he needed every bit of the advice I gave him; and I gave him some good advice. He took some of it. If he had not taken some of it he would have been a whole lot worse off than he is now, and he is badly enough off as it is. Yes, sir. I advised him what it meant when he started out with that banking law to close up all the State banks in the United States, and when they did not take my advice I came down here and fought them on the floor of the Senate; and as soon as the Senate adjourned I went back over there and advised him again. I was driving from one end and advising at the other end; and finally they managed to take the advice. They finally sent me word that they had decided to let the State banks come in, but instead of passing the bill I had introduced they wanted to put another name on it.

I said, "That is all right. You need not worry about having my name on the bill." Then we put the bill in here, or the resolution, or the amendment, in the name of some other Senator, and it went over to the House; and one of the Representatives over there reformed it, and took that name off, and put on his own name. [Laughter.] The result was that the other Senator did not have his name on it, and I did not have my name on it. Both our names were lost from the bill before we got through, and I was rather glad of it, because the House Member really at heart had been working and fighting to do what I was trying to do.

I did not care about whose name went on the bill. I knew I had introduced it here on the 5th day of March, and the 6th day of March, and the 7th day of March, and every other day, until we finally got it into the law; but if I were advising the President today, I should not advise him to send me to slaughter. If he wants to send himself to slaughter, that is all right; but that is not going to save me, Mr. President, and it is not going to save you. The President cannot commit political suicide and save me by doing it. If he commits political suicide he is an ex-President, and even an ex-President means something, you know; but an ex-Senator is not anything. [Laughter.] He is worse off than if he had never been anywhere.

If I were advising the President, when he sent for me I should go down there and advise him in this fashion:

"Here, let me tell you something. Let me tell you something, sir:

"You were in the service during the World War, Mr. Franklin Delano Roosevelt. How much money did you get for your services? Of course, sir, we know that you gave your services to the country during the World War as a matter of patriotism only; but how much did you get?"

He will tell you he got $10,000 for that year's work.

"How many cannon did you face, sir?"

"None."

"How many nights did you sleep on the ground, sir?"

"None."

"How many nights did you hear the rain on the tents? How many days and nights did you hear the crack of German rifles and endure the smell of poison gas? How many times did you see the flames of the burning fires of hell and destruction and carnage searing the lives and the souls of men?"

He will say, "None."

"And yet you got $10,000, Mr. Roosevelt, for the patriotic services which you gave to the country in the scourge of that war. It is not going to look well, Mr. Roosevelt, for you today to say to these men who bled and who fought and who died that they cannot exchange the little, flimsy, nefarious, puny, putrid obligation that the Government has given them, as little as it is, for circulating money of the United States, when you have given that right to every banker in the country, and allowed them to draw interest on it at the same time."

That is how I would advise the President. He might not give me any jobs, and he never did. Bless your soul, I would advise him just the same.

Who was it that said?—

Someone must speak the truth to the king in the presence of the people, and then, if necessary, someone must speak the truth to the people in the presence of the king.

The time has arrived in America when someone should shoulder that obligation.

We have a motion pending here to reconsider. I do not mind stating to the Chair and to the Members of the Senate and to the people of the country that it is not our intention to press any motion to reconsider. We only thought that pending this maelstrom of discussion over the T. V. A., and pending the funeral of our comrade, the late Senator from New Mexico, Mr. Cutting, it would be well to have a few days' pause in this body, that men might have time to reflect and study the provisions of the bill. Thus far, no one has irrevocably committed himself against it, because there has been a sparring between men as to which form the bonus should take. Some have hoped for the Vinson plan, and some have hoped for the Patman plan. The American Legion has sponsored the Vinson plan, and the Veterans of Foreign Wars have sponsored the Patman plan; but when the Patman plan was adopted the American Legion accepted the Patman plan, and the Veterans of Foreign Wars were joined by the American Legion in their crusade, and the form of bonus legislation which Congress saw fit to adopt was the combined desire of the American Legion and of the Veterans of Foreign Wars and of all other soldier bodies.

There is another class. Someone referred the other day to my friend the priest from Detroit, or just outside Detroit, Father Coughlin, who had advocated the bonus plan of the Patman bill.

I wish to say, Mr. President, that the only reason why the Reverend Father Coughlin could have started the wheels to moving behind hundreds of thousands of telegrams was because he is on the right track. Certainly he could start things moving, because this thing is right. There is not a voice raised against it now. There is not a voice that can be raised against it.

I say to my Republican friends on the other side, here is their vote. They are not asked to do a thing here that they have not already done. The Republicans are being called upon to vote for sound money. Here is the record of what the Republicans of the Senate did on the 9th day of March, every one of the Republicans except one, the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY], and Senator Dale, who is now dead. Every Republican in this body with those exceptions voted that the obligations of the United States Government could be pledged for circulating currency 100 cents on the dollar. Not only did they vote that, but they voted that 4-percent interest could be drawn on the obligations, or 3 percent, as the case might be, notwithstanding the fact that the holders had put up the bonds and had drawn a hundred cents on the dollar in circulating currency at the same time. That is what the Republican Party did, and that is what the Democratic Party did.

I will show an enactment of Hoover. I will show what Hoover's administration did. What did the Republicans and Democrats do? It was the joint action of the Democrats and the Republicans, 53 yeas and 18 nays, on the 11th day of July 1932—and I also was one voting with the majority in that case—everyone voting that the national banks should be allowed to deposit Government obligations payable in 1945. Hear me. We voted that the national banks of the United States should be allowed to deposit the obligations of the United States payable in the year 1945.

What reason can be given for not allowing the soldiers to put up Government obligations payable in 1935? Under Hoover, in 1932, we voted in this body that if the bankers put up the obligations of 1945 they could draw a hundred cents on the dollar. Distinguished Senators voted for that bill who are now prominent in the Republican Party. We took the same course later.

I look down the list, and I see the name of my friend the Senator from Tennessee, of my friend the Senator from Maryland, of myself from Louisiana, and of the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY]. The junior Senator from Kentucky was absent that day. But we find that these party leaders and these party men, both the Republicans and the Democrats, have voted once, twice, three times, four times, five times, that an obligation of the United States Government payable in the year 1945 could be put up, the full amount of currency issued, and the interest drawn on it at the same time.

I look at the list and find that my friend the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] voted for that on March 9. All of us voted for it as a good thing to do.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. Since the Senator from Louisiana gets so much logic and support out of referring to the records of other Senators, and also to the record of the President of the United States during the World War, and draws the deadly parallel, I hope he also will make a reference to his own service in the World War, as well as to that of the President of the United States, so that we may have the comparison.

Mr. LONG. I have covered that to the satisfaction of my people many, many times, and to the satisfaction of myself.

Mr. TYDINGS. Let me cover it a little bit for the Senator.

Mr. LONG. In the Senator's own time he can cover it. If he has a thing to say about my record in the World War, he can rise and say anything about it.

Mr. TYDINGS. I can, and nobody can stop me.

Mr. LONG. I will not try to stop the Senator.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator had better not try.

Mr. LONG. Oh, well. I am talking about the Senator's record on the banks.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am talking about the Senator's record on the war.

Mr. LONG. I am going to talk about the Senator's record on the banks; then he can talk about my record on the war. I am talking about the Senator's record on banking. I am talking about the Senator's record, and I am sure the Senator from Maryland has no record for which he has to apologize.

Mr. TYDINGS. No; even if the Senator has—

Mr. LONG. I am going to read exactly what we had before us, for fear I may offend someone. I had no idea of offending anyone. If there is any vote here for which I have to answer—and there probably is—I shall not become offended when I am faced with it. Quite often I am faced with some vote where it is a little difficult for me to answer right up as I would like to, but my friends in the Senate do not mind referring to it.

On July 11, 1932, 53 Senators voted for and only 18 against. That is the record, and I am going to read what they voted for. Here are the words:

Shall be allowed to deposit Government obligations payable in 1945 or in the future and receive new money in return for them, and at the same time continue to receive interest on the bonds deposited to secure the money.

I voted for that. I do not see why the Senator from Maryland should be offended. I voted for that thing, too.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am always offended when I hear the President of the United States belittled, whether the President is a Democrat or a Republican.

Mr. LONG. Very well. The Senator made a speech here the other day that was not any too complimentary toward the President.

Mr. TYDINGS. There was no reflection in that speech, and the Senator from Louisiana knows it; and he must not say those things, or he is likely to bring on some extraneous debate.

Mr. LONG. I heard the Senator say that he did not think we were getting along any too well with the Government we have here right now. That is as I understood his speech. I may have misinterpreted it. I will let him place his own interpretation on his speech. I have my quarrel with the President of the United States, and that is my business. The Senator from Maryland did not have anything to do with nominating the President. I did. If the Senator from Maryland had had his way, we would not have nominated him, and I want to say that he was nearer right than I was. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair must again implore the occupants of the galleries to respect both the laws and the decisions of this body. Manifestations of laughter and amusement are unbecoming this place, and we trust our guests will not voluntarily continue violating the regulations.

The Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I shall read this language again, since I was interrupted, in order to get my line of thought better before the Members of the body. The question we voted on was, Shall national banks "be allowed to deposit Government obligations payable in 1945 or in the future and receive new money in return for them and at the same time continue to receive interest on the bonds deposited to secure the money"? That was the question.

How did we all vote? Here is the record of the vote. I am one of those who voted that the banks might deposit these obligations which were not due until 1945. I voted that way. My friend the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] voted the same way. Here are some of the names which I will put down. Let us look down the list and see what happened to the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. He voted for that. We had them all. But it was the banks who were putting up the bonds. The leader of the Democratic Party voted that way at that time. I voted that way.

The only difference between the banks and the soldiers was that the banks got 4 percent interest, while they had the currency, and the soldiers do not get interest. The only other difference was that some of the banks bought these bonds for 80 and 90 cents on the dollar, and the soldier gave a hundred cents on the dollar in services, plus. I am one of those who would have been glad to pay him 200 cents on the dollar, plus, for the chances he took which I did not take.

So we had the bill. This was under Hoover. I want to say that there is not a man here who followed Hoover, there is not a man here who has followed Roosevelt, who can justify his vote under either one of them, and at the same time vote against putting up Government obligations payable in the future and allowing the soldiers to draw money on them, just as we allowed the banks to do. This is what they did. There is only one difference; the soldier receives no interest and the banks did get interest.

I refer now to the Borah-Glass amendment.

Here is the list of the Senators who voted for that bill, and I want to say that if Senators will be just as consistent in the future as they have been with regard to this legislation every one of them will vote for this soldiers' bonus bill. I find here the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST]. Here is the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN]. I wonder how the Senator from Vermont voted the other day. I am sure he will not mind being chided a little bit because I want to gain a vote. Let me see the RECORD on the soldiers' bonus vote the other day. I want to appeal to some of the Senators with their own logic, if they are getting out of line. The Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] is out of line.

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN] is out of line. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] is out of line, and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] has jumped the fence—one of the few times in his life, and he is out of line. They are out of line with their own logic. They have jumped over on the other side of the fence and met themselves coming back.

Here are some more Senators. Here is the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES]. He voted that way. The Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] voted that way. Let us see some of those who got mixed up the other day. There are just a few of them. Here is the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY]—he voted for that measure. All of them, nearly, voted that way. In going on right down the line they will all be found to have voted that way. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] voted for that measure.

Here is the name of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON]. That Senator wanted to discount this Government obligation payable in the future to the soldiers at 66 percent, the other day. How did he vote when the bank measure came up? I am very sorry he is not here, because he certainly ought to hear me. He has probably some other business to attend to. How did he vote? The senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] voted to let the bank put up a bond due in 1945 and draw 100 cents on the dollar and 4 percent interest on the bond, and he is one of the main men they are depending upon to steer the ship, to keep the President from having a veto overridden—he and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON].

Mr. President, it is a case of making fish out of one and fowl out of the other.

That is the sort of proposition which the soldier is up against today in this matter, and that is what the American people are up against. It is not a Democratic Party policy. Oh, no; it is not a Democratic policy. Any time the Democratic Party wants to come in with a bill and say that we are going to stop the banks of this country from putting up Government bonds and drawing down money on them, and that we are going to stop the soldiers from putting up Government bonds and drawing down money on them, I will vote with other Senators for such a bill.

Now let us hear from some of you sound-money men. Let us not make a goose out of one and a gander out of the other. Any time anyone wants to say that it is an unsound principle of law for a bank to put up a Government bond and draw full payment on it and still hold the bond and draw the interest on the bond, I will go him one better. I will say, "Let no soldier have that privilege either." That is exactly what I will say.

But oh, we are called on now to take another stand. In looking over this list it will be found that the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. COOLIDGE] voted with me and the 53 other Members in the Senate, and the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] voted the same way—to let them put up these bonds payable in 1945 and draw 100 cents on the dollar. And I am satisfied if my friend the senior Senator from Massachusetts were here he would feel ashamed if he thought he was applying one rule to a banker's 1945 bond and another rule to a soldier's 1945 bond. The only injustice which has been done is the injustice which has been done against the soldier, because there has been taken away from him the right to draw interest while he had the currency, whereas in the case of the banker he was given the right to draw interest during the time he has the currency. That is the only injustice which is done on a fair comparison of these matters, unless it be the fact that the bankers were allowed to take bonds they bought for 85 cents and get a dollar in currency and draw a dollar in interest.

We cannot find anyone who can defend such actions. Look over this list. If that had been Hoover's policy which we Democrats voted for and which the Republicans voted for—if that had been Hoover's policy which the Democrats had come in and undone, then we could say it is the policy of the Democratic Party not to have that done. But, oh, no; we did not do any such thing. Here we come in with the Democratic Party.

Were we going to undo the Glass-Borah bill of 1932? I see my friend from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] is in the Chamber now. He will bear me out in everything that I quote from the RECORD about it. Were we going to undo the Glass-Borah bill of 1932? On the contrary, when we came along in 1933, 5 days after Franklin D. Roosevelt was inaugurated, 5 days after the new Senate had organized, what did we have? Here is the bill we voted. We voted that banks be permitted to deposit Government obligations payable in the future and receive money in return for them. How much? Why, we were afraid they might discount them, so the Roosevelt administration tied the knot a little bit tighter. We did not want to take the chance, because there might be some kind of man who would say that they ought not to be allowed to draw a dollar's worth of currency for a dollar bond; we were afraid that they might say that we were going to allow them to have only 90 cents worth of money for a dollar bond on which they were still drawing interest; so we said we are not going to risk any ruling of the Federal Reserve System to interfere with that, and we wrote it into the law that—

The amount of which circulating notes shall be equal to the face value of the direct obligation of the United States so deposited as security.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRAZIER in the chair). Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. In order that the record may be clear on the matter, let me say there may be a very honest difference of opinion as to whether there is any analogy between the two situations the Senator is discussing. The Senator is familiar with the fact that a part of our circulating currency ever since the Civil War was known as national-bank currency, by which the obligations of the United States which the national banks had bought and upon which they drew 2 percent interest—as the possessors of these national bonds which were issued during the Civil War to obtain money with which to carry on the war—could be taken and deposited in the Treasury, and draw out national-bank notes which would be taken back to their banks and signed by the president and cashier of the bank and issued by the bank to the public.

Mr. LONG. That is right.

Mr. BARKLEY. That was a large part of our national currency at that time and has continued to be. There has never been any authority in any bank or any institution or any corporation or any individual to enjoy the right to issue money based on the bonds and obligations of the United States except national banks. No corporation can do it; no State bank can do it. None but national banks, which are the creature of the Federal Government, have ever enjoyed the right to issue money based upon the obligations of the National Government. The act to which the Senator refers, if I recall—and I have not read it since he has been discussing it—extended the circulating privilege to the Liberty bonds and other bonds of the United States Government payable in the future.

Mr. LONG. And the Federal Reserve banks.

Mr. BARKLEY. And the Federal Reserve banks.

Mr. LONG. That included a lot of State banks.

Mr. BARKLEY. Oh, no!

Mr. LONG. Yes; many of them were Federal Reserve banks.

Mr. BARKLEY. Oh, no; the Federal Reserve bank is not a State bank.

Mr. LONG. Yes, Mr. President.

Mr. BARKLEY. Oh, no!

Mr. LONG. I beg the Senator's pardon!

Mr. BARKLEY. A State bank may be a member of the Federal Reserve System, but it is not a Federal Reserve bank.

Mr. LONG. Oh, yes; it is.

Mr. BARKLEY. But the point is that the Senators seems to be arguing that any individual who held an obligation of the United States payable in 1935 should have the same right to issue currency upon it as a national bank has always had. Of course, such privilege has never been extended to individuals, and I dare say Congress would not extend the right to circulate money and to issue money to any individual or any organization outside of a bank over which the United States had control. So there is really no analogy between what we did here in March 1933 and what he is proposing now.

Mr. LONG. Yes; there is no analogy. That is just what I have been stating, if the Senator had not got the point.

Mr. BARKLEY. Oh, yes; I got the point. The Senator's points are not so dense as not to be gotten.

Mr. LONG. We may not agree on it; but the point the Senator is making is that Morgan's national bank ought to have the right, but that the soldiers who fought to keep Morgan's bank in existence ought not to have the right.

Mr. BARKLEY. No; I am not making any such point. I am talking about the fact that it has been the settled policy of this country for three-quarters of a century to allow all banks, which are the creatures of our Federal Government, to issue money upon the obligations of our Government, but no individual has ever been allowed to issue money upon them, and no individual could with safety be allowed to issue money in the sense that banks are.

Mr. LONG. Is not the soldier a creature of the Federal Government?

Mr. BARKLEY. No; the Federal Government is more a creature of the soldier than the soldier is a creature of the Federal Government.

Mr. LONG. I should like to know what is the difference in the embalming fluid which they pour into a national bank that makes them holy to the point where they have so many more rights than the soldier whom they make stand up in front of a German gun.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the Senator believe that any individual holding any obligation against the United States, whether it is an adjusted certificate called a "bonus certificate", or any other obligation payable in the future, ought to have the right to go to the Treasury of the United States and deposit that obligation and put money back in his pocket to lend out to the people, as we authorize in the case of banks?

Mr. LONG. I believe if we give the national banks of this country the right to exchange bonds for money and to have the interest on it, there is no more reason to prefer them than there is to prefer anybody else. Furthermore, what is the difference? If I had a bond and could not get currency on it, I could go to some bank, hand it over to the bank, and let it do it for me. There would be no trouble about that. There is no man living who cannot find a way of getting his bond into a national bank if he wants to get currency. That is no trouble. The only difference is that my friend from Kentucky and others managed to dodge it, and I am not like them.

Mr. BARKLEY. We may not be as "artful dodgers" as is the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. I do not have to dodge anything. The Senator is a good dodger, but I guess he has had to dodge so much he has worn himself out in the past. I still have a good many dodges coming to me.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator need not be worried about my dodging ability. I certainly do not accept him as the standard by which I either dodge or stand still.

Mr. LONG. I would not like to have the Senator accept me as a standard.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is one thing about which the Senator from Louisiana and I agree.

Mr. LONG. We can be friends on that, and I will always say to my people and to the people of Kentucky that the Senator is not to be found in any fault for having gone along with me, because if there is any man on this floor who can be depended upon for being wrong at least two-thirds or four-fifths of the time—

Mr. BARKLEY. It is the Senator from Louisiana. [Laughter.]

Mr. LONG. Go ahead; have it as you want it. But here is a point, Mr. President, that they cannot explain, and when my friend from Kentucky goes home tonight and thinks this situation over for another night I think he will look upon it differently. I can tell that his conscience is paining him now about this matter. I know when a good man's conscience is beginning to hurt him; I can tell it. One of the few things that the Lord endowed me with is to be able to know such things.

Mr. BARKLEY. In addition to the Senator's other qualities, is he now advertising himself as a clairvoyant?

Mr. LONG. What does that mean?

Mr. BARKLEY. I think the Senator has consulted many of them and been given wrong advice. [Laughter.]

Mr. LONG. Maybe so. I am not a mind reader. I want the thought put in language that the others can understand, although I understand what the Senator from Kentucky said. [Laughter.]

Mr. BARKLEY. In addition to the other many qualities of the Senator, we all admire his modesty.

Mr. LONG. I would not want the Senator to have to look up high-sounding words and then come in and spring them on me.

Mr. BARKLEY. I realize that I am making a vain effort to educate the Senator from Louisiana, but I am willing to undertake the task if he will be amenable.

Mr. LONG. No; I would not want the Senator's education; I would want to have a chance of a better education than that. In other words, I have been told that the educator has too much opportunity of molding the opinions of those whom he educates. However, let me get through with my explanation. The Senator has interrupted me several times, at which I have not protested. I am not filibustering against the pending bill; I am arguing for the bonus, which we will have before us in time. We have now a bill before us of which I am heartily in favor.

Mr. BARKLEY. What is the Senator's position on the bill which is before the Senate?

Mr. LONG. I am for it; I always voted for the Tennessee Valley measure. I vote right all the time. The Senator will never find me wrong; but the Senator from Kentucky has been here year after year and day after day and has found out that the law once was that 2-percent bonds, such as the Panama Canal bonds, and so forth, drew 100 cents on the dollar in currency and then, later on, under the Hoover administration, under the Glass-Borah resolution, that privilege was extended to all the banks in the Federal Reserve System. It was provided that the Federal Reserve banks could issue money on obligations which they held, and all members of the System could avail themselves by using the Federal Reserve System to do it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I want to educate the Senator a little further, and I believe that, in spite of his obstinacy, it can be done. When the Federal Reserve Act was passed in 1914 it was expected and provided that gradually the circulating privilege should be withdrawn from all Government obligations. My recollection is that the Federal Reserve Act itself provided a way by which the national-bank notes based upon Government bonds should be gradually withdrawn; but, of course, the depression came on and there was a cry for more money; the Federal Reserve banks and the Federal Reserve System did not operate automatically; and there was not enough money, according to the view of many Members of the Senate, to supply a sufficient amount of circulating medium. So the bill to which the Senator has referred was passed extending temporarily the circulating privilege to all Government obligations. It was not a permanent extension, as I recall, but only a temporary extension to cover a period which was supposed to be sufficiently long to enable us to get out of the depression. Whether it has worked or been of no great benefit may be a matter of dispute, but that was the object which the Congress had when it passed the law to which the Senator has referred.

Mr. LONG. The Senator says that this law was passed to help get us out of trouble; but the fact, nonetheless, is that we passed a bill giving to the Federal Reserve banks and the member banks of the Federal Reserve System that privilege. A bank did not have to be a national bank to have that privilege—nothing of the kind. That shows I know more about banking than the Senator from Kentucky thinks he knows.

Mr. BARKLEY. I said a while ago, and I have known all the time that any State bank could qualify for membership in the Federal Reserve System.

Mr. LONG. Certainly. In my home city there was only one national bank and the others were State banks and they were all in the Federal Reserve System.

Mr. BARKLEY. Before the depression and before 1933 many of the State banks took advantage of this privilege and joined the Federal Reserve System.

Mr. LONG. Now we are getting nearer home.

Mr. BARKLEY. And now we have passed an amended act and also provided a guaranty of bank deposits, and nearly all of them, in one way or another, are included in the Federal Reserve System, which was not the case prior to 1933.

Mr. LONG. That goes to show that the national banks can issue currency. The Senator from Kentucky brings himself finally to the same understanding that I was trying to bring to the other Members of the Senate, that nearly all the banks have a right to take any kind of obligation of the Government and secure currency on it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Let us keep that clear. All the banks that are insured—

Mr. LONG. That embraces nearly all of them.

Mr. BARKLEY. All the banks that are insured under the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation are not members of the Federal Reserve System.

Mr. LONG. Not necessarily, but nearly all of them are; that is getting to be more and more true; and under the provisions of the Glass bill more of them are expected to come in every day. Those banks can take the bonds and obligations of the United States Government which are payable 10, 12, or 14 years from now, and get a hundred cents of currency on the dollar on them. They can take United States Liberty bonds or any other kind of Government bonds, whether it is a 4¼-percent bond or 4½-percent bond, or whatever it may be, and get a hundred cents on the dollar in money for them, and still draw the interest on the bonds. That refers to every kind of Government bond; there is not a Government bond of any kind or character that they cannot get money on today under the amendment to the Federal Reserve Act. Who voted for that? All of us voted for it. The Senator from Kentucky has admitted his vote for it; the junior Senator from Texas voted for it; the senior Senator from Texas voted for it. The Senator from Virginia not only voted for it but he was one of those who sponsored it.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator referred to the vote of the junior Senator from Texas on some measure.

Mr. LONG. I refer to the vote of the Senator on the bill permitting the banks to put up their Government bonds and get currency on them and still draw the interest.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator means when they put them up at the Federal Reserve banks?

Mr. LONG. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. They can put up commercial paper and get money on it, and why should the Government want to dishonor its own bonds?

Mr. LONG. I voted with the Senator on that question; I am not criticizing his vote, for I voted with him.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator, for once, agrees that the Senator from Texas was right?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir; and what I am asking the Senator to do now is to let the soldier do the same thing that we let the banks do; that is all.

Mr. CONNALLY. Oh, no.

Mr. LONG. Oh, yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the Senator want the soldier to issue currency?

Mr. LONG. Oh, no; the Senator knows what I want.

Mr. BARKLEY. Unfortunately, I do not, I am frank to say.

Mr. LONG. Then I will tell the Senator.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator wants the soldier to do the same thing the banks do.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President—

Mr. LONG. I will yield to my friend from Virginia if he desires me to yield.

Mr. GLASS. I merely want the RECORD to show that the Senator from Virginia did not advocate that provision of the law. He presented the bill that contained the provision and voted for it upon the very definite assurance that it never would be used, but it was used.

Mr. LONG. I know the Senator voted for it under the very definite assurance that it would not be used, and it was used. Since the Senator has already voted that way once, the best thing to do is to go along and vote with us now.

Mr. GLASS. I think it has been used too much.

Mr. LONG. All I am trying to do is to secure action. I would not practice any deception on the Senator from Virginia, but I would certainly like to have his vote.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President—

Mr. LONG. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I wonder if the Senator from Louisiana at this point in his remarks would indicate for the RECORD, so that those who are interested in this question may understand about the real facts, what classes of Government securities prior to the enactment of the statute to which he refers were used for the purposes he has indicated—that is, to underlie currency issues. Possibly the Senator may have the data on his desk.

Mr. LONG. I can remember, generally speaking, that the Government bonds which were drawing about 2 percent interest originally had that privilege.

Mr. BONE. What were the restrictions as to the type of security that was qualified under the law as a basis for currency?

Mr. LONG. There were bonds that only drew, as my recollection goes, 2-percent interest; I believe they were called "Panama Canal bonds." They could be put up and currency secured, and the bonds would still draw 2-percent interest, and the banks would also have the currency.

Mr. BONE. They were low-yield bonds.

Mr. LONG. They were low-yield bonds, but finally we extended that privilege until it took in all the other bonds of the Government, such as Liberty bonds. That not only was done by the Hoover administration, but my friend from Virginia, myself, my friend from Texas, and my friends from Kentucky and from Arkansas and from Mississippi were roped in again on the 9th day of March 1933, 7 or 8 months later.

That bill was broadened—the same Glass-Borah bill that we voted on July 11, 1932. We were roped in under the Roosevelt administration, and that time we did not have 18 negative votes as we had 7 months before. That time nearly everybody got in line. That time we had 73 yeas and 7 nays, which amended the bill so as to most specifically provide that there had to be issued dollar for dollar. We had 73 yeas and 7 nays, and the bill was signed by the President most gloriously as being a good piece of legislation.

That is the record. Whatever may have been the motive and whatever may have been the purpose, that is the record. The bankers have that record, we have that record, the President has that record, the Democratic Party has that record, and the Republican Party has that record.

When the President of the United States is called on to veto this soldiers' bonus bill, an outstanding obligation of the Government of the United States payable in 1945, we are met with the fact that we have this precedent of July 11, 1932, providing that this currency should be issued as against the obligations payable in the year 1945; that is, an obligation of the United States that is payable as early as the year 1945 should have the currency issued against it, and the holder of the bonds should draw his interest nonetheless, though he had his 100 cents on the dollar in currency in the meantime.

We followed that up with an action that was taken on the 27th day of February 1934, and before that with the act of March 9, 1933. There was only one difference. It might have been said that Hoover was more liberal than Roosevelt, because the Hoover policy was that we ought not to issue any of this currency; for instance, I think it will be found that the former Senator from Pennsylvania, Mr. Reed, was protesting against the bill. Yes; I remember when we voted on the Glass-Borah amendment Mr. Reed, who was then in this body from Pennsylvania, protested most vigorously that it was an unsound act, and he pleaded here on the floor of the Senate, as I remember, that we should not depart from the traditional gold policy of 40 cents in gold to maintain and secure every dollar in currency.

Today we have $9,000,000,000 in gold and $5,500,000,000 worth of money. When we issue the $2,250,000,000 of notes we will have $9,000,000,000 in gold to secure $7,750,000,000 in Treasury notes. In the one case Mr. Reed was standing out for 40 cents in gold against every dollar of paper money. In the instant case we have Senators fighting because they maintain that $1.20 in gold is not enough to maintain $1 in currency. The only difference is that the banks were allowed to put up the bonds of the Government and draw 100 cents on the dollar and draw the interest at the same time, perhaps on a bond that they had bought below par, whereas this is a case in which the soldier draws no interest whatever.

That is the only distinction made between them. The only distinction is that in the one case we were proceeding on the theory of 40 cents in gold for $1 in currency, whereas in this case we proceed on the basis of $1.20 in gold for $1 in currency; the other difference being that the soldier draws no interest whereas the banks draw interest.

Mr. President, it is the most preposterous thing with which we have ever dealt. As a political proposition, it is something else. I can always fight a political campaign when I am right. I could even fight the bill which is sponsored by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] having to do with the T. V. A. I would not be afraid to fight the T. V. A. as a political principle if I did not think it was right. I remember a time when I went into a city in my State and fought the granting of an additional franchise to a public utility, notwithstanding its pledge of a much reduced charge. I did not care. I would not care in this instance.

I would honor any Senator fighting against any measure if he believed it to be unsound, prejudicial, or demagogic; but to come here and say to the soldier, who has been given an obligation printed in good bold type and on pretty paper of the Government, that we cannot take that obligation to secure circulating currency, backed up by $1.20 of gold for $1 in currency, when we have allowed the banks to issue a dollar in currency for a dollar of obligation and draw interest on it at the same time—I say it is a political monstrosity that no party can defend and no man can defend, either in his own conscience or in a political campaign.

That is my advice to the President and that is my advice to the Senate. Neither one of them has to take it. If they do not want to take it, that is their business. I will go my way and they can go their way. Perhaps my people some day will see it differently. It does not make any difference to me when they do or when they do not. Any time they want this seat they can have it, and it will not make me mad for them to give it to somebody else, because the kind of legislation we are voting here does not make me any too proud of this position compared with some of the other positions I have held and other activities in which I have engaged.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. The Senator is quite resourceful, particularly in controversies. Perhaps he can tell me what nobody else has been able to tell me. He speaks of $1.20 of gold as security against $1 of these notes. Of what account is that security? If one is caught with it he is fined and put in jail.

Mr. LONG. I cannot answer the Senator.

Mr. GLASS. No; the Senator from Louisiana cannot.

Mr. LONG. I cannot answer the Senator. In other words, the Senator asked me to give him an explanation for the President's fiscal, financial, specie policy of the United States Government. I do not think there is a man alive who can answer his question. I would not undertake to do it.

Mr. GLASS. Another thing: Is not the Senator somewhat mistaken—it seems to me so—that any bank can get dollar for dollar on United States bonds that it puts up? Is there not a so-called "reserve" of 40 percent behind every Federal Reserve note that is issued? Mind you, I do not think the reserve is worth a continental, because they would put a man in jail and fine him if he should be caught with it. I do not regard that as reserve. But as I understand the law it simply permitted, for a period of time, member banks of the Federal Reserve System to lodge, as security with the Federal Reserve bank, United States bonds in place of eligible commercial paper. However, I do not understand that we have repealed the legal requirement that all Federal Reserve notes shall have behind them 40 percent of so-called "gold reserve."

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I do not know that I understand the Senator's question, because, further, I do not understand the Government's law and never will understand its law on the gold question. It is impossible for me to answer the Senator. If I undertook to do so, I would probably have Senators paying less attention to some of the things I have said on something about which I know more. Nobody understands it, and that is why I almost laugh up my sleeve when Senators begin to talk about protecting sound money. It is the most ridiculous thing I ever heard of.

If Mr. Roosevelt or anybody following Mr. Roosevelt vetoes this bill on a sound-money basis, on the basis that he has to have a standard, sound, dependable money, I shall be tempted to say there is no need for me to try to fight anything.

For any President who ever issued this bill—I guess it is like the balance of the bills I have in my pocket—to talk about having great scruples on the score of the dependability of money, to issue a bill payable in gold, and to have you arrested if you ask for the gold, and then talk about having to protect the money basis is too laughable to talk about.

I have not criticized our money system. I am not criticizing it, because I have taken it just as it is. I have taken the dollar as it is. I have taken the gold as it is. I have taken the policy of the law as it is, and as we have all voted for it, and just stood on that, and said nothing further; but today our dollar is what?

There is no specie. The dollar is a promise of the people of the United States, if it is that, and no more. I hesitate to say that it is as good as the Patman dollar would be, because we have a proviso that money shall be issued, and the dollar certificate is supposed to represent the right of a man to go and demand a dollar; and yet we have a law that says that if the man is found with a dollar in his pocket he is arrested. That is the whole thing.

If you can figure that out for me, you can beat me. I have in my pocket an order that purports to give me a right to go down to the Treasury and demand gold. It says, "redeemable in gold on demand at the United States Treasury"; and yet I have voted for a bill which provides that if I take that $10 order and go down to the United States Treasury, and a man there gives me $10 for it, both he and I have to go to jail for violating the gold law! So you see how our scruples are going to persist; and that is why I ask my conservative-minded friends in this body to think a while before they vote against us on this bill. Think a while.

My God! You have voted for so much worse things here that this thing looks pretty. You have voted for so much more unreachably things that this is a conservative act, because at least you understand it. You will not be arrested if you live within the terms of it, whereas in the case of the rest of them that you voted for, you would be arrested.

Talk about a money statute that is going to result in something that is flimsy and inflationary, when we talk about a base of currency and have no base! There is no gold standard in the United States. Talk about being on a gold standard! We are not on any standard at all. We are on a standard, according to which, if the authorities want to issue money they issue money, and if you demand the money you go to jail. What that standard is I do not know. They ought not to have on that bill the picture of the United States Treasury as the place to which you are to go. They ought to have on it the picture of the United States penitentiary, because that is where you would go if you should demand the money. That is the difference. [Laughter.]

So to put up that kind of an argument on the gold standard is out of the question. The suggestion I have made today is made for the first time, so far as I know, but I will bet everything I have that within less than 60 days the authorities will put a picture of the penitentiary on some of these bills because people are liable to get bold, and they had better have a word of warning sounded to them before they get too bold.

I am not going to detain the Senate any longer. I have spoken far longer than I expected to speak. I have felt, however, that I should yield to all interruptions. I have placed these facts before the Senate in the hope that if and when the President sees fit to veto this bill, the Members of the Senate will carry along with the policy we have adopted and furnish the necessary votes to override the veto.

TENNESSEE VALLEY AUTHORITY

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2357) to amend an act entitled "An act to improve the navigability and to provide for the flood control of the Tennessee River; to provide for reforestation and the proper use of marginal lands in the Tennessee Valley; to provide for the agricultural and industrial development of said valley; to provide for the national defense by the creation of a corporation for the operation of Government properties at and near Muscle Shoals, in the State of Alabama, and for other purposes", approved May 18, 1933.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, it had been my hope that the consideration of Senate bill 2357 would be delayed until a later date. My reason for suggesting that course is that there are two phases of the bill which, I think, will be clarified by the Supreme Court decision which is bound to be coming along at an early date.

The first of the two phases of the bill which I think are objectionable is with reference to the limit of the constitutional authority as to the use of subsidiary power. The second phase is the matter of Government guaranteeing both principal and interest of the bonds under the proposed amendment to the Tennessee Valley Act.

To say that these two phases of the bill are incidental to the major legislation, I think, rather understates the proposal. We find in section 6 of the pending bill, which is an amendment to section 10 of the original act, authority for the Board to enter into contracts for the sale of power on—

Such terms and conditions, including resale rate schedules, * * * as in its judgment may be necessary or desirable—

And so forth. That is the phase of the bill which I desire to discuss for a little while.

The question of whether or not this authority is within the constitutional limitations of Congress was discussed by Judge Grubb in the suit of Ashwander against Tennessee Valley Authority as found in the Federal Supplement, volume 8, page 893. In paragraphs 5 to 7 Judge Grubb makes this finding:

The United States is a government of enumerated powers conferred, in express terms or by necessary implication, on it by the Constitution. No power is conferred on it to engage in any private business, unless incidental to some power specifically granted. The power to produce, distribute, and sell electric power or any other commodity, generally, is not in terms granted and must be connected with a granted power in order to exist. In this case, it is sought to be connected with the power to improve navigable rivers, the power to provide for the national defense, or the power to make needful regulations concerning Government-owned property. The Government has the right to create electric power to aid its operations under any one or all of these granted powers. It also has the implied right to dispose of any surplus power not used for the named purposes to prevent waste. It has no power to produce and sell electric power, except as incidental to a granted power, as in case of the disposition of such a surplus. This is especially true within the limits of a State of the United States. If the program of the Tennessee Valley Authority involves only the salvaging of excess or unused electric power, produced in aid of its operations in improving the navigation of the Tennessee River, or in relation to its operation at the Wilson Dam, or the nitrate plants, there located for the national defense, or for the benefit of lands owned by it in the Government reservations at or in the vicinity of Muscle Shoals, its right to dispose of such excess electric power cannot be questioned. This implies the existence of a surplus in its legitimate operation and the power of disposition would be so limited. If its program is more extensive, and amounts to an engaging in and carrying on, independent of the question of surplus power and without relation to a granted power, the general business of producing and selling electric power within the limits of Alabama, it is ultra vires of the power actually conferred or that could have been conferred by Congress on the Tennessee Valley Authority by its act of incorporation.

There is no question here but that there is a right to improve the Tennessee River. Section 10 of the present law lays down what the authority is. Section 10 of the existing law is as follows:

The Board is hereby empowered and authorized to sell the surplus power not used in its operations, and for operation of locks and other works generated by it, to States, counties, municipalities, corporations, partnerships, or individuals, according to the policies hereinafter set forth; and to carry out said authority, the Board is authorized to enter into contracts for such sale for a term not exceeding 20 years, and in the sale of such current by the Board it shall give preference to States, counties, municipalities, and cooperative organizations of citizens or farmers, not organized or doing business for profit, but primarily for the purpose of supplying electricity to its own citizens or members: Provided, That all contracts made with private companies or individuals for the sale of power, which power is to be resold for a profit, shall contain a provision authorizing the Board to cancel said contract upon 5 years' notice in writing, if the Board needs said power to supply the demands of States, counties, or municipalities. In order to promote and encourage the fullest possible use of electric light and power on farms within reasonable distance of any of its transmission lines the Board in its discretion shall have power to construct transmission lines to farms and small villages that are not otherwise supplied with electricity at reasonable rates, and to make such rules and regulations governing such sale and distribution of such electric power as in its judgment may be just and equitable.

The point to which I want to call attention is the fact that this authority is limited to those places known as "farms" and "villages" which are not supplied with electrical service at a reasonable rate. In other words, it is suggested here that the Tennessee Valley Board is to have the authority to impose the judgment of a Federal unit on a locality as to whether or not they are receiving electricity at a reasonable rate.

In my judgment, that is an expansion of power beyond the limit that is incidental to the Tennessee Valley Authority in the matter of creating any of the specific things for which it is authorized under the law; that is, navigation, flood control, and so forth. That being the case, I think there can be no question that the amendment we are now considering would be an amplification of the authority heretofore granted, because it goes much further than the previous authorization. The bill provides that they shall have power—

To include in any contract for the sale of power such terms and conditions, including resale rate schedules, and to provide for such rules and regulations as in its judgment may be necessary or desirable for carrying out the purposes of this act, and in case the purchaser shall fail to comply with any such terms and conditions, or violate any such rules and regulations, said contract may provide that it shall be voidable at the election of the Board: Provided further, That in order to supply farms and small villages with electric power directly from its transmission lines as contemplated by this section, the Board in its discretion shall have power to acquire existing transmission lines and facilities: And provided further, That the terms "States", "counties", and

"municipalities", as used in this act, shall be construed to include the public agencies of any of them unless the context requires a different construction.

I desire to call attention to the fact that that is an expansion of the authority heretofore granted. In other words, the Tennessee Valley Authority would be granted a super power, over and above the authority granted a particular locality by a State.

I find that the decision in the case to which I have referred refers to that very question. On page 897, paragraph 9, I find this statement:

Under our dual system of government, the United States, in the exercise of its constitutional powers, even within the confines of one of the States, has paramount power over the State. In matters of internal concern not affecting any constitutional power of the National Government, the State, under the reservation contained in the tenth amendment, has exclusive authority. If the Tennessee Valley Authority, within this State, is engaging in a proprietary adventure, unrelated to any power conferred upon it or on its principal by the Constitution, then it is doing an unauthorized thing. Engaging in the business of producing and selling electric power, as a utility, it would become subject to State regulation, and likely be in competition with private utilities, or with the State or its municipalities, while so engaged. It is contrary to the genius of our dual government, that the National Government should do business in a proprietary capacity, of an internal nature, and not related to a constitutional power, within the limits of a State, and occupy extensive areas of territory therein for that purpose. It would be fraught with possibilities of collision between such governments and individuals. The Tennessee Valley Authority, if the averments of the bill are sustained, is engaged in producing and selling electric power in Alabama, in an enterprise having no substantial relation to the improvements of navigation or any constitutional power, on an elaborate scale, building dams designed for maximum electric power production to increase surplus power; fixing rates and terms in displacement of State functions, with the declared purpose to increase the magnitude of the enterprise in the future. This is not a plan involving only the disposing of surplus electric power necessarily created in the improvement of the navigation of the Tennessee River.

The motion to dismiss the bill of complaint is overruled.

Let me suggest that if the contention of those who say that this is constitutional is sustained, the Tennessee Valley Authority, through its Board, would have a perfect right to take over the taxable property of the State of Tennessee or of the State of Alabama, and in that way they would be dominating the tax revenues of those States, because every time they take over a utility and it is taken into the hands of the Federal Government, it is removed from the tax resources of the State, and the State is deprived of revenue, the county is deprived of revenue, and the locality is deprived of revenue. Whether or not the Congress ought to be passing a law disposing of or confiscating the taxable property of a State is a very serious question.

We have it here proposed that this Board shall have authority not only to go in and construct transmission lines but that they shall have the right to acquire transmission lines, to take over the transmission lines of private companies. It is also proposed to give them authority to buy generating plants, and thus to empower them absolutely to dominate the electrical situation of any locality which they may choose to enter.

I can see here an absolutely direct conflict between the rights of the States and their taxing power and the efforts of the Federal Government to impose the orders of an agency of the Government upon a locality.

I find that under section 12 (a) the Board would be authorized—

To acquire, within transmission distance from any dam where such power is generated by the Corporation, (a) existing distribution facilities and incidental works—

That would mean the entire wire equipment of any municipality—including generating plants.

Which means the dynamos, the entire generating plants. They could take over these plants.

What has the State of Tennessee to say about that? If the Board goes in there and says, "We are going to take over this plant", they deprive the particular municipality of taxable property in existence there, and they deprive it of that property without the consent of the people in the locality without any indication as to whether or not they want the Government to take it over.

The Board would be authorized to acquire—

Interconnecting transmission lines, or to acquire any interest in such facilities, incidental works, and lines, and to dispose of them to States, counties, municipalities, and nonprofit organizations.

What does that mean? Not all of our public-utility plants are high-line plants or belong to large organizations. In many a locality in the United States an individual or a local corporation or a local concern or a local partnership owns the municipal electric-light plant. Under this bill we shall have the Federal Government going in there and saying to this organization, "We are going to take over your plant." It may be said that they will not do it; but since I have had any experience with Government bureaus I have never known any bureau to be given any authority without being perfectly willing and ready to exercise it upon the slightest provocation.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Three cities in Tennessee have voted on the question of whether they would use T. V. A. power—Chattanooga, Knoxville, and Memphis—and by a very large majority they all favored the proposal. I do not think there would be any opposition on the part of Tennessee, because the power and light rates will be reduced tremendously, and in that way there will be a great saving to the people of the State.

Mr. DICKINSON. I have some data with reference to what was done in the city of Knoxville. I shall give those data after a while. I think a type of influence was used there which even the Senator himself cannot justify. I also appreciate the fact that every inducement was held out to the cities in question. I do not believe that at the present time the best engineers in the Tennessee Valley Authority can estimate what the future cost of producing this electric energy will be, for the reason that so many phases of the project are still in process of construction. I saw a beautiful moving-picture film, paid for by the Tennessee Valley Authority, paid for by the money which has been given it by the Federal taxpayers. Every phase shown was a construction phase. It showed massive dams in process of construction. I find, in the first place, that most Federal enterprises which are constructed with the taxpayers' money cost a good deal more than the original estimate. Second, we always find that there are many things to be done which were not included in the original estimate. For that reason, it is my judgment that no board of engineers, or other authority, is able to tell the people of Tennessee at what rate they can be furnished electrical energy 3 years from this time.

If the Tennessee Valley Authority can continue to be supported by bonds guaranteed both as to principal and interest by the Government, that may be one thing; but, in my judgment, a time will come when the people of this country will say that an undertaking such as the Tennessee Valley Authority will have to pay its own way; otherwise, it will have to be disposed of.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I suppose the Senator is familiar with the fact that while $50,000,000 of bonds have been authorized, none have been issued or used, and the bond feature of the pending bill is in lieu of the $50,000,000 bond issue authorized by the original act.

Mr. DICKINSON. Yes; I am familiar with that, and I stated on the floor of the Senate the other day that none of the bonds have been issued, according to the Tennessee Valley Authority. In view of the fact that the Senator has brought up the question, I will say that my objection to the amendment is based not only on the fact that it provides for increasing the authorization of the bonds from $50,000,000 to $100,000,000 but on another ground. The Panama Canal bonds, as I recall, are not guaranteed as to both principal and interest by the Government. The pending measure proposes that these bonds are to be guaranteed principal and interest by the Federal Government.

Let me read the language on page 9 of the bill:

Such bonds shall be fully and unconditionally guaranteed both as to interest and principal by the United States, and such guaranty shall be expressed on the face thereof, and such bonds shall be lawful investments, and may be accepted as security, for all fiduciary, trust, and public funds, the investment or deposit of which shall be under the authority or control of the United States or any officer or officers thereof.

My objection is due to the fact that under the terms of this measure we are putting the people of Iowa into the electric-light business in the State of Tennessee and in the State of Alabama. We are putting the people of Pennsylvania, as taxpayers, into the electric-light business and into the production of electrical energy in the State of Tennessee and in the State of Alabama.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator will recall that ample precedent for this action has long since been established by legislation providing for the construction of the Boulder Dam and other dams of like character.

Mr. DICKINSON. The Boulder Dam does not have its bonds guaranteed by the Federal Government. The first time we ever guaranteed such bonds was recently, when we guaranteed the bonds of the Federal land banks. The Boulder Dam bonds are not guaranteed, and the pending bill would not be anywhere near so effective were it not for the fact that it provides that the bonds to be issued under its terms shall be guaranteed by the Federal Government. That is my judgment. If I am wrong about it, I should like to be corrected.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not recall whether or not the Boulder Dam bonds are guaranteed.

Mr. DICKINSON. I am speaking from memory with reference to Boulder Dam. I find that we have gone into the business of having various types of bonds, both principal and interest, guaranteed by the Federal Government.

Only the other day I took up the question of whether or not the Government had previously guaranteed the principal and interest, of various types of bonds, and on April 19 I made the following statement, as published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

Under the Home Owners' Loan Corporation we authorized, first, an issuance of bonds guaranteed by the Government, both as to principal and interest, of $2,000,000,000. We have recently passed a measure providing an additional authorization of $1,750,000,000.

Under the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation there was an original authorization of $2,000,000,000. Under the Reconstruction Finance Corporation authority has been given to issue $5,550,000,000.

This, together with the $50,000,000 authorized in the case of the Tennessee Valley Authority, made a total authorization of something like $11,350,000,000.

As I have previously stated, the Tennessee Valley Authority bonds were not guaranteed. Under the proposed amendment they are to be guaranteed.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not wish to have the Senator misunderstand my position on the bond provision in this bill. The Senator realizes that this bill will repeal section 15 of the existing law, the Tennessee Valley Act. I do not mind saying to the Senator that when the original Tennessee Valley Act was passed I was opposed to putting in section 15 of the act. I did not want to put in any provision for a bond issue. I accepted it as a compromise with others who were interested in the legislation, and it went in the act in that way.

The pending bill will repeal that provision for a bond issue; and while in another section it doubles the amount of bonds which may be issued, it limits the section and its operation to 5 years, and likewise limits the reasons for issuing the bonds to specific purposes which I explained at some length yesterday, and which I do not desire to go over again. However, before anything of that kind can be done, before any bonds can be issued under that section, the consent of the private company which makes the sale must be obtained. Unless the private company shall consent, no bonds will ever be issued under the section, because it is confined to that specific thing, and in any event it expires in 5 years. At the end of that time no bond issues will be possible under that section. So it seems to me that the section which this bill carries on the bond question, from my standpoint or from the standpoint of anyone who agrees with me that it would be better not to have any bond issue, is a great improvement over the existing law.

Mr. DICKINSON. As I understand the existing law, it refers to the Panama Canal authorization.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes. The bonds issued under existing law have the same status that the bonds issued under the Panama Canal bill had and now have.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Iowa, if it will not divert him too far, if he will at some stage of his observations point out in what manner the bill sponsored by the able Senator from Nebraska affects the plants along the river from Dubuque down through the States of Iowa and Illinois? Perhaps my observation is not clear.

Mr. DICKINSON. Does the Senator mean the Keokuk Dam Co.?

Mr. LEWIS. Yes; the Keokuk Dam Co., if that is the designation, and another which connects the State of Illinois and the State of Iowa, serving both. I am a little anxious to know, if the Senator can tell me, whether the bill sponsored by the able Senator from Nebraska would affect the property being used now to serve Illinois and Iowa, whether at Dubuque or other places. I really do not know their names; I only remember the plants.

Mr. DICKINSON. It is my impression the Keokuk Power Co. is an individual corporation which has its right from the Federal Power Commission.

Mr. LEWIS. I do not mean to divert the Senator at this particular moment.

Mr. DICKINSON. It is my judgment that they sold their bonds purely on their own rights, and that the Government would not be involved there unless there was an authority of that type which would have jurisdiction over that locality or which would attempt to acquire it.

Mr. LEWIS. What is the opinion of the able Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if I understand the question of the Senator from Illinois, it presents an entirely new thought. I was not aware that anybody claimed that the provision in the pending bill would in any way affect the bonds or the dams or the property referred to by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. If such is the conclusion, of course that would cause me to dismiss the matter from my mind.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator from Iowa claim that it would?

Mr. DICKINSON. I do not think it would.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think it has any effect upon it in any way.

Mr. DICKINSON. I do not believe the Board would have any jurisdiction whatever.

Mr. LEWIS. I thank the Senators.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GIBSON in the chair) laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. PITTMAN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported favorably Executive I, Seventy-fourth Congress, first session, being a convention with Canada regarding certain damages resulting from the operation of the Consolidated Mining & Smelting Co., Trail, British Columbia, and submitted a report (Ex. Rept. No. 5) thereon.

Mr. SHEPPARD, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported favorably the nominations of sundry officers in the Regular Army.

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of sundry postmasters.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reports will be placed on the Executive Calendar.

If there be no further reports of committees, the calendar is in order.

UNITED STATES TARIFF COMMISSION

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Thomas W. Page, of Virginia, to be a member of the United States Tariff Commission.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE

The legislative clerk read the nomination of John W. Knutson to be assistant dental surgeon, Public Health Service.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of George R. Jones to be assistant dental surgeon, Public Health Service.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent that nominations of postmasters be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

MINISTER TO RUMANIA

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, at this point may I submit a parliamentary inquiry? I inquire if the President has been notified of the confirmation of the nomination of the Minister to Rumania, confirmed as of yesterday, I believe?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The President has not been notified.

Mr. LEWIS. When, in the nature of proceedings and under our rules, would the information go to the White House?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. When the Senate shall have had one more executive session.

Mr. LEWIS. I thank the Chair.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY

Mr. McKELLAR. I move that the Senate adjourn until Monday next.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 3 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, May 13, 1935, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS

Executive nominations received by the Senate May 10, 1935

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS

James R. Landy, of Olivia, Minn., to be collector of internal revenue for the district of Minnesota, to fill an existing vacancy.

APPOINTMENTS BY TRANSFER IN THE REGULAR ARMY

TO QUARTERMASTER CORPS

First Lt. Roy Madison Foster, Infantry, with rank from September 6, 1928.

TO ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT

First Lt. Leslie Alfred Skinner, Air Corps (detailed in Ordnance Department), with rank from August 1, 1929.

TO CHEMICAL WARFARE SERVICE

Second Lt. Ephraim Helmoth Hampton, Infantry, with rank from June 12, 1930.

CONFIRMATIONS

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate May 10, 1935

UNITED STATES TARIFF COMMISSION

Thomas W. Page to be a member of the United States Tariff Commission.

PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE

John W. Knutson to be assistant dental surgeon.
George E. Jones to be assistant dental surgeon.

POSTMASTERS

KANSAS

Christian Biesterfeld, Dorrance.
Walter C. Reeder, Kinsley.
Louis A. Kopachek, Leonardville.
Hugh Lee, Louisburg.

MONTANA

Jay E. Sharp, Lodge Grass.
Ben Wholf, Opheim.

NEBRASKA

Francis J. Brennan, Alliance.
Clarke W. Kelley, Beaver City.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, MAY 10, 1935

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Blessed Heavenly Father of us all, our land, with one accord, has placed the crown jewels on the holy temples of mother, the sweetest and most endearing of all names. Today we would wear, as a sacred tribute to her, the white flower of love and purity. Just now we would be silent beneath the weight of thoughts so sweet and memories so beautiful, in which we rejoice. To her we owe the debt of thanksgiving, which can never be canceled. In the travail of motherhood she went to the gates of death that we might live. In her arms we were cradled as she read the language of our smiles and the meaning of our tears. She soothed our childish sorrows; her knees were our first altar as she folded our hands in prayer; it was here that we began to breathe the air of another clime; from here she led us forth, with the purest thoughts, and put her touch upon our shaping lives. Almighty God, while time lasts, may we not cease to revere her heavenly name. If, in the journey of the years, it abide, our homes will remain pure and the genius of the Republic will live. Through Jesus Christ our Savior, in whose name we pray. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 2 minutes immediately following the address by the gentleman from California [Mr. McGROARTY] on Mother's Day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

MR. HOOVER WORRIES ABOUT "SLAVERY"

Mr. HILDEBRANDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HILDEBRANDT. Mr. Speaker, our late unlamented President, Mr. Hoover, is again worried about the welfare of the American people. He apparently thinks we are drifting from liberty into slavery. In his statement issued in San Francisco he declares that "people must be taught not to change their souls and spirits for the fallacious promises of material comforts."

This is the old strategy of an exploiting class and its apologists—to tell the people not to be fooled by offers of material comforts, but to center their attention on moral and spiritual matters. There was more truth than poetry in the radical labor verses that quoted the capitalist as saying that the workers would "get pie in the sky" and should not insist upon bread while on earth. That is the advice usually offered by the man who is legally robbing you. It is virtually the advice that Mr. Hoover offers to the millions of Americans who have been gouged and stolen from by the parasites of Wall Street.

There was a time when Mr. Hoover's fine words and sonorous phrases would get considerable approval. That time is past. It has been remarked, "You can't eat the Constitution." It can be added that you cannot eat these high-sounding paragraphs about liberty. When people have sufficient of their material needs, they can really begin to pay proper attention to the spiritual and moral values on which Mr. Hoover dilates—then and not till then.

It is "liberty"—in Mr. Hoover's opinion and the opinions of Andrew Mellon, Ogden Mills, and their colleagues—when a few have the "liberty" to take away the earnings of the many. It is "slavery", in their view, when a government insists upon regulation of production and distribution so that people are assured of their needs and even perhaps a few comforts. Well, the vast majority of the American people do not see it that way.

This is on a par with the blurbs emanating from Governor Talmadge, of Georgia, who, virtually joining hands with Mr. Hoover, complains about "a mixture of communism, frenzied finance, and wet-nursing" and wants us to "go back to Americanism", which is another way of advocating that we go back to the misery of a few years ago when hungry and tattered men marched into Washington to be beaten and jailed and when Mr. Hoover's soldiery gassed and abused the former soldiers who in Anacostia's flats were waiting for the bonus promised them in the days of the "war for democracy."

We want no more of that kind of Americanism. We want the kind of Americanism that looks after the men and women who do the Nation's useful work.

William Jennings Bryan said—in the 1896 campaign, if I recall correctly—that "The man who wants the people to destroy the government is an anarchist and the man who wants the government to destroy the people is a 'patriot.'"

That summarizes fairly accurately the attitude of organized big business in this country, which is its attitude in every country. It wants the Government to serve as its instrument and agent to the detriment of the common people and for the benefit of a few heartless and ruthless corporations. That is its bullion brand of patriotism. The desperate poor man who, amid much injustice and poverty, gets resentful toward the Government is immediately characterized by big business as an "anarchist" or the wealthy exploiter who thinks the law should be used solely to enable him to grind profits from the toil and destitution of the producing class, and that we designate as "patriot" the man who wants to right our civic wrongs.

The other day attention was called to the kidnaping and brutal beating in Gallup, N. Mex., of an attorney, David Levison, and a journalist, Robert Miner, who went to New Mexico to arrange for the legal defense of people arrested in labor troubles. It was remarked that this case comes entirely within the Lindbergh Kidnaping Act adopted by Congress. It was urged that the Attorney General prosecute these terrorists.

This incident is another proof that the real anarchists are the trusts and monopolies and their agents, while the real patriots are the champions of the people who produce the Nation's wealth. Our kidnaping law, like many other statutes, has been invoked on occasion for punishment of kidnapers of prominent and wealthy men and women—which is the proper thing, of course, for kidnaping is a vicious and horrible crime. Let it also be invoked, however, for punishing thugs and assassins employed by corporations to kidnap and maltreat labor leaders.

From those whom Theodore Roosevelt called "the malefactors of great wealth" we hear much about "law and order." They are ardently in favor of the use of the policeman's club and the gun and bayonet of the militiaman or soldier for the protection of the persons and the property of the rich. They are not so keen about the utilization of these same weapons for protecting workingmen, workingwomen, and their defenders. What a difference it makes "whose ox is gored!"

After these many years of increasing concentration of wealth; of increasing arrogance on the part of the capitalist class; of greater subservience by public officials to Wall Street; and of wide-spread poverty that has caused bread lines, hunger marches, and relief doles that are appalling, it will be welcome news to find the agencies of government used in behalf of the toilers. Every step in that direction should assuredly be encouraged. Everything that the administration does for that purpose is to be commended. Nevertheless, it will find, I think, that "regulation" is not enough—that you cannot mend a rotten apple—that you cannot cure a cancer or blood disorder by putting on an adhesive plaster—and that, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GILDEA] said recently, "What is needed is a major operation."

Witnessing the pain and torment and poverty that must be eliminated from our national life, I recall the eloquent words of Henry George:

Civilization so based cannot continue. The eternal laws of the universe forbid it. Ruins of dead empires testify and the witness that is in every soul answers that it cannot be—we slander the Just One. A merciful man would have better ordered the world; a just man would crush with his foot such an ulcerous anthill.

It is not the Almighty, but we, who are responsible for the vice and misery that fester amid our civilization.

AMERICA FOR AMERICANS

Mr. BACON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a speech by my colleague the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following address by Representative MARTIN L. DIES, of Texas, made over a National Broadcasting Co. network Monday night, May 6, during the program "Congress speaks":

The most acute and distressing problem that confronts us is that of unemployment. We have already spent billions of dollars in an attempt to furnish jobs and relief to the 10,000,000 idle people in the Nation. We are now preparing to spend nearly $5,000,000,000 to put 3,500,000 idle people to work, and we are making radical changes in our economic laws in an effort to prevent the recurrence of this condition.

It is a strange paradox that while so many learned theorists have been busy discovering causes of the unemployment and proposing remedies of every character and description, few leaders have pointed out the fundamental cause of unemployment in this country.

It is, of course, true that many factors combined to produce the wide-spread and prolonged unemployment in this country. The unparalleled credit inflation prior to 1929, which was succeeded by inevitable deflation; the introduction of labor-saving devices, which displaced man power; the severe disparity between agricultural and industrial prices, with the consequent impairment of the farmers' purchasing power and the serious decline of export trade, which normally furnishes employment to 10,000,000 people, were all important but secondary causes of unemployment. The primary cause was immigration. If we had not permitted millions of aliens to enter this country, the secondary causes which I have enumerated would not have been sufficient to produce any serious unemployment in this country, although we would have, no doubt, experienced an economic depression.

That this short-sighted policy is responsible for the present unemployment can be proven by simple mathematics. We now have in this country 16,500,000 foreign born and 7,500,000 aliens. We have approximately 10,000,000 unemployed. If we had refused admission to the 16,500,000 foreign born who are living in this country today, we would have no unemployment problem to distress and harass us.

Even if we had excluded the 7,500,000 aliens which the records show are living in this Nation at this very moment, our unemployment would be normal. And if we were to deport the 3,500,000 aliens who are illegally in this country, we would reduce unemployment as much as we hope to do through the expenditure of $5,000,000,000.

As an indication of the number of aliens entering this country illegally, the value of seizures by the border patrol of vehicles used in smuggling aliens for the year 1933 was $283,744. This included 13 airships valued at $89,500.

Of the 7,500,000 aliens who are in this country there are from 1,000,000 to 1,500,000 on public relief. This leaves about 6,000,000 aliens who are deriving their livelihood from jobs which American citizens should fill and would fill if we had the same laws that are in force in other countries. So that from any angle of approach it must be evident to every thinking American citizen that the unemployment problem was transferred to America from foreign lands.

But you ask, and properly so, what are we going to do about it? I agree with you that there is nothing we can do so long as our policy is dominated by sentimentality, fatuous internationalism, industrial greed, and alien political influence. So long as we permit America to be made the asylum for the peoples of other lands and the dumping ground for Europe and so long as politicians fear the vote and influence of alien groups and blocs in the great cities, there is nothing that we can do except to continue to struggle with the unemployment problem of other nations and tax our people to the limit of endurance to provide relief for the 1,500,000 aliens and for the 9,000,000 Americans whose jobs have been taken by foreigners. But when the time comes, as surely it will, that we adopt and develop an American policy based not upon racial and religious hatred but upon the stern law of self-preservation, and the ancient truth that charity should begin at home there is much that we can do. In the first place, we can permanently close, lock, and bar the gates of this country to any pioneer immigration and then throw the key away. There is certainly no need for immigration during the next 50 years. We have our hands full to furnish employment to the natural increase of our own population and to give to the youth of today and tomorrow their place underneath the sun.

Of course, the anti-restrictionists employ the threadbare argument that we have already reduced immigration to a minimum and that under the quota only 150,000 immigrants can come to this country annually from quota countries. It is pointed out that immigration to the United States had been trivial and unimportant since 1930. It is true that on September 8, 1930, the White House issued a press release pointing out that the public-charge clause had a special significance in times of wide-spread unemployment, and as a result of the strict interpretation of the public-charge provision, from September 8, 1930, until recently the number of aliens entering under the quota dwindled to a low level.

By reason of the strict enforcement of this section, about 900,000 aliens who might have been admitted during normal times were prevented from entering the United States to increase unemployment.

The American consuls estimate that in 47 out of 68 quota countries there are at this very moment 992,000 aliens who are anxious to enter the United States in spite of the unemployment here.

It must not be forgotten that the 900,000 aliens prevented from entering this country since 1930 were only kept out by unusual administrative action and not by law. This administrative reduction is admittedly to last only during the acute stages of the depression. As Mr. Simmons, Chief of the Visa Division, Department of State, said in his press release of April 30, 1934: "With the improvement in economic conditions, which is already setting in, the significance of the public-charge clause will proportionately decrease."

In other words, administrative strictness in interpreting the public-charge provision is now being relaxed, until we will soon be admitting from quota countries 153,000 aliens each year. This is proven by the fact that last year's immigration statistics show an increase of 50 percent in quota immigration—that is, new seed immigrants—an 8-percent increase in total aliens admitted, and a 60-percent decrease in alien deportations, as well as a 50-percent increase in deserting seamen, alien stowaways, and the like. During the 10 years of quota restriction 3,687,547 aliens of all classes have legally entered this country, 2,010,896 of whom were new immigrants. But while the 1924 quota law did reduce the number of aliens coming legally from quota countries, a serious mistake was made when the quota was not applied to the Western Hemisphere. This left both side doors open, and predatory employers and profit-seeking steamship companies were quick to take advantage of this mistake. These nonquota countries, and especially Mexico, supplied the cheap pauper labor that had formerly come from southern and eastern Europe. The legal and illegal entries from the nonquota countries, together with the increased smuggling of aliens and the desertion of alien seamen from quota nations, have done much to neutralize the beneficial effects of the 1924 Immigration Act. In other words, while we closed some of the doors, we left others open, and through these open doors aliens continued to enter in large numbers.

My bill, H. R. 5921, proposes to reduce the quota 60 percent. This will leave 40 percent of the present quota to be used to gradually reunite families. My bill applies the quota to the Western Hemisphere, so that under its terms, with the exception of near relatives admitted gradually under the quota to reunite families, all immigration will be a thing of the past. Of course, my bill does not interfere with tourists, visitors, clergymen, etc., who come here for temporary periods and not for permanent residence.

My bill also provides that all aliens admitted for permanent residence in this country must take steps to qualify for citizenship 12 months from date, and those aliens who fail to do so will be promptly deported. Since the 3,500,000 aliens unlawfully in this country cannot qualify for citizenship, they will be immediately deported. My bill also provides for the deportation of alien criminals, Communists, dope peddlers, smugglers, gangsters, and the like. I know that one of the specious arguments used against my bill is the so-called "hardship cases." It was to meet this argument that my bill left 40 percent of the present quotas to reunite families gradually where they are not likely to become public charges or to take jobs away from American citizens.

I know it will be charged that it will result in many hardship cases to deport the millions of aliens unlawfully in this country. In regard to hardship cases resulting from deportation, the Commissioner of Immigration, Mr. MacCormack, admitted that not more than 5 percent of all deportation cases could be properly classified as hardship cases. When it is considered that this percentage took into consideration the five-hundred-and-some-odd carry-overs from the previous year it can be conservatively stated that not more than 30 percent are bona fide hardship cases. In my opinion, 3,500,000 aliens unlawfully in this country can be deported without working undue hardship upon them or their families. Of course, in the enforcement of any law, someone must suffer. When a criminal is sent to the penitentiary his wife and family are compelled to suffer, but no one will contend that we should let these criminals go unpunished simply because their families will suffer. There is one sure way that the alien can prevent the separation of families, and that is to take his family back to the old country with him or not to come to this country unless he can bring his family with him.

So it will not be the Government that is separating the families. It will be the families themselves who prefer to remain in the United States rather than to go to their native country with their deported relative. It is a question of who shall suffer, American citizens or the alien and his relatives. As between the two, it is the alien who should suffer. When he entered the country unlawfully he knew that he was violating our laws and subjecting himself to punishment. America is not responsible for his suffering, and why should our own citizens be punished to keep him from paying the price of his own misconduct?

As to the individual cases of unusual merit, where the aliens were merely guilty of a technical breach, or where the records were improperly kept, I am perfectly willing that special bills shall be passed granting clemency. But I am not willing that discretionary power shall be vested in some Secretary of Labor, who may not be sympathetic with restriction, to deport or not to deport as he or she sees fit.

Not only must we permanently exclude new immigration from every country and deport the aliens unlawfully in our midst but we must go one step further. We must pass a law similar to that in force in all other enlightened nations that will make it impossible for any employer to employ any alien so long as American citizens are walking the streets in search for jobs. If the 3,500,000 aliens in our midst are deported and new-seed immigration permanently excluded and every job given to Americans before any alien can be employed, the unemployment problem will be solved in the United States and there will be no need to appropriate billions of dollars out of the Treasury to furnish relief and work. This would constitute a major act of permanent recovery and would not violate the Constitution or constitute any departure from fundamental principles or the ancient landmarks of the fathers.

I know that there are sentimentalists, internationalists, and some greedy employers in this country, and politicians kowtowing to alien-minded voters, who will denounce this program as un-American. It makes no difference to them that all other enlightened countries have adopted drastic measures in the protection of their nationals. Under the laws of Mexico, Sweden, Belgium, Great Britain, France, the Netherlands, and Germany immigration is virtually prohibited and aliens are deported without fear or favor, and no alien can hold any job until their citizens are first employed.

On May 1, while I was in New York, I witnessed a parade of 100,000 Communists. I did not see an American in the crowd. Many of them are aliens that should be deported and others are foreign born who should have their naturalization papers canceled. Not a one carried an American flag, and they openly insulted and derided everything that we hold sacred in America. Well-dressed and apparently well fed, they sang the Internationale and treated with base ingratitude the land that feeds them. Although they are infinitely better off than the starving peasant of Russia, they prefer the Russian Government to the American. What would happen in Russia if 100,000 people marched through the streets of Moscow singing the Star-Spangled Banner and advocating the overthrow of the Russian Government and the establishment of the American system in its place? The ruthlessness with which the Soviet Government has massacred its enemies demonstrated what would happen. There would be 100,000 less people in Russia than before the parade.

Our immigration policy introduced into our midst alien political, economic, and social ideas. There can be no compromise between the American system and the foreign. Our conception of individual liberty, private initiative, and inherent rights of the citizenship is diametrically opposed to the theory of collectivism and state socialism which prevails in most of the foreign lands. Communism, socialism, fascism, and Hitlerism have one underlying cardinal principle in common. They hold that the individual should be the pawn or creature of the state; that the state is everything and the individual nothing. They destroy freedom of speech, freedom of thought, and the right to worship God according to the dictates of one's conscience. None of these systems rest on the active growth and moral value of the individuals, without whom the state is a fiction or a monster. Mussolini's formula is: "Everything for the state, nothing outside the state, and nothing against the state." The American principle, as distinguished from the foreign philosophy, is that the state was created to serve the individual, and that the citizen is a sovereign crowned with the ballot and surrounded with certain inherent and inalienable rights which cannot be destroyed or abridged by the Government.

And so the titanic struggle in the United States is between American individualism on the one hand and European collectivism or state socialism on the other. American individualism does not mean the establishment of an industrial or financial feudalism controlled by a few men or interests. Such unrestrained individualism does not conform to the spirit of the American institutions of government. There are some who construe American individualism to mean the concentration of wealth and power into the hands of a few. This is the European idea, and never was American in origin or principle.

The question is, Shall a few, whether that few be feudal lords under a system of concentrated ownership and control or a dictatorship under systems such as prevail in Russia and Italy, govern the masses, or shall individual and political freedom be preserved? Shall American individualism, as proclaimed by Thomas Jefferson, applied by Andrew Jackson, and interpreted by Woodrow Wilson, be retained as the basis of our political, religious, and economic life, or shall we embrace the foreign philosophy of an enthroned and governing minority, whether that minority be the Communist of Russia, the Fascist of Italy, or the great industrial and financial lords who seek control of the wealth and natural resources and the industrial power of the country?

There is no middle ground or compromise. Either we are for or against America. If we are for America, we must be for the exclusion of new-seed immigrants and the deportation of those unlawfully here. If we are for America, we are for those cardinal principles which are essentially American, such as liberty of speech, thought, and action consistent with the public weal and the maintenance of a government that will be the servant of the people and not the master.

Those who are seeking to weaken our immigration and deportation and naturalization laws by piecemeal legislation, such as removing the educational qualifications for citizenship, and even the obligation to defend their country in time of war, the legalizing of illegal entrants, the giving of discretionary power to the Secretary of Labor to deport or not to deport as she sees fit, the enlargement of nonquota classes, the nullification of public-charge provision by the acceptance of worthless bonds, and all other such antirestriction measures which are now pending in Congress, are working against the best interests of this country.

The motives which actuate these various antirestriction blocs are immaterial and beside the question. The fact is that all of them the internationalist, the sentimentalist, the greedy employer, or the steamship company seeking quick profits, and the aliens themselves and their relatives are all working for the same results. Though actuated by different motives they have the same goal. They have hurled the challenge and thrown down the gauntlet.

They are engaged in a great offensive. They secure hearings on their bills without any difficulty and get them reported out without delay. On the other hand, hearings are granted to us on restriction measures during the closing days of the session, when it is too late to secure favorable action. Even when, after the greatest difficulty, we secured passage of restriction measures in the House we cannot get a vote in the Senate as was illustrated by my two exclusion and deportation bills which passed the House in previous sessions only to die in the Senate for want of any active support.

While we are on the defensive we are not "licked." We shall continue to appeal to the American people until public sentiment is so thoroughly aroused and crystallized in this Nation that the majority of the people will demand immediate action. I am appealing to you, my fellow countrymen, to adopt the American slogan: America for Americans. The only way we can deport aliens is to deport them, and the only way to restrict immigration is to restrict it, and the only way to furnish employment to the idle American citizen is to give available jobs to American citizens before a single alien can be employed.

In closing, may I express my deep gratitude to the National Broadcasting Co. for affording us the opportunity to present the American case at the bar of intelligence and patriotic public opinion?

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. COLDEN. Mr. Speaker, in deference to my colleague the gentleman from California [Mr. McGROARTY], who is to address us on the subject of Mother's Day, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently a quorum is not present.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

[Roll No. 72]

Andrew, Mass.	Ditter	Keller	Rogers, N. H.
Bankhead	Dockweiler	Kennedy, N. Y.	Romjue

Dies	Jenckes, Ind.	Robinson, Utah
Dirksen	Kee	Robson, Ky.

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and twenty-one Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California, under the special order of the House, to address the House for 15 minutes.

MOTHER'S DAY

Mr. McGROARTY. Mr. Speaker, it is by the kindness of our illustrious and beloved Speaker, who is essentially a kind man, and the courtesy of the Membership of this House, that I am to recall to your minds today the fact that this is the annual memorial of national Mother's Day.

Some years ago this great idea was born in the soul of a great-souled woman, a native of West Virginia and now a resident of the city of Philadelphia. Her idea was so beautiful and so tender that it obtained national proportions and even world-wide proportions. Next Sunday is the date on which Mother's Day will be celebrated all over the civilized world. It is a beautiful idea, a tender thought; and for a few brief moments this morning I think we may well interrupt legislative proceedings to give thought to the mothers of the world and to our own mothers in particular.

The custom has been, I regret to say, to make this day rather lugubrious and almost maudlin, a sorrowful day, a day of tears and weeping. This is all wrong. Mother's Day should be the happiest day in the year, if for no other reason than that mothers are the happiest people in the world.

The vogue in mothers seems to have changed. The fashion in mothers in these modern times—even the fashion in grandmothers—has changed. I know of an instance where a young girl came home from a party about half past 12 at night. Half an hour later when she was about to seek her pillow and go to sleep she heard the front door click and she "yoo-hooed." The answer came from below, "Don't worry, dear, this is mother." Mother got home about 1 o'clock, and then she said: "Dear, shall I lock the door?" And the girl said: "No, don't. Grandmother has not come home yet." [Laughter.]

When I was a boy, or before that, the custom was that when mother had reached the age of, say, 40 or 45 years, she was retired, a nice chair was found for her in the chimney nook, we gave her some knitting needles and put a white cap on her head and told her that that was all for mother. It is not so now at all. Mothers just begin to start out when they are about 45 years of age now, and grandmothers about 5 years later begin to step out. Mothers used to be regarded essentially as cooks. Mother was boss of the kitchen, and so she ruled the household through the kitchen on the theory that the best way to a man's heart is through his stomach. Mothers do not bother with kitchens any more, there are too many good bakeries, too many good delicatessen stores; so she is relieved of that and many other burdens she was forced to bear in former times. Not all mothers are good cooks any more. I remember hearing of an instance of the Klondike gold rush some years ago. A young fellow bearing a heavy pack was wending his weary way, slipping on the ice up the White Horse Trail.

Along the trail some enterprising chap had set up a little cafe or restaurant. He had a sign over the door of the cafe which read: "Come in and get some coffee like your mother used to make." So this lad went wearily in, slipped his pack off his back and said in a tired voice to the man: "Do you make coffee like my mother used to make?" The man said, "Yes, son, I do." The kid said: "Well, give me a cup of tea." [Laughter.]

I am trying to make this a happy day for you and myself. It is the tenderest day that could possibly fall upon the calendar of the year. Indeed, it is so tender that after the Chaplain had concluded his exquisitely beautiful prayer, I felt that not another word should be said. The prayer of the Chaplain will be put into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for all time, but something greater than that will happen to the Chaplain's prayer, and already has happened. The words he uttered are already registered at the great white throne of God.

Now, my dear colleagues, I have been thinking what would be the best way for us to observe Mother's Day. I am sure that the best way is not the way the shopkeepers would lead us into; that is, to buy expensive presents to send to mother and get rid of it in that way. The best gift you can send to your mother, if she is living today, is yourself. If she is living a short distance go see her. No gift that money could buy would make your mother as happy as your own presence, that she might put her arms around you again. That will be good for you, my dear colleagues. It is the same now as when you were children. You used to go to your mother with your trials, your troubles, and your griefs. Here in this great legislative body we have our trials, our griefs, and our discouragements. Go to your mother with them. You will come back to this chamber next week renewed in faith, renewed in strength, and renewed in courage. You will be of better service to your country because you have again been at your mother's knee, which was the source and should still be the source of all strength and faith to you.

If your mother be not within distance to see her next Sunday, send her a message. Write her a long letter. Mothers, you know, are lonely people when their sons are away from them. They have a love that no other love can compare with. There are many kinds of love in the world. There is the love of a man for a maid, the desperate, strong love of a sister for a brother, the love of a friend for a friend. All these loves may fade and falter, but the love of a mother for her child, for her son or daughter, never falters. It is eternal. No fire can quench this love. So if you are not within distance of her next Sunday, send her a long letter. Forget the cares of state. Forget your own troubles and your own worries and think of her who went down into the valley of the shadow and staked her own life against the desperate and bitter adventure of giving life to you.

I trust no colleague of mine will let this opportunity pass. And may I say more than that. If your mother be not in this world any more, you can still send her a message. Go out at night and look up at the tracery of the stars and send her a message where she is, where she is walking with God in the fields of asphodel, by the still waters. She will hear and God will let her stop to hear and will rejoice with inexpressible joy in knowing that you had a thought of her.

I just want to take this very brief moment, my colleagues, from the cares of state, through the kindness of the Speaker and your courtesy, to give this tender thought to the tenderest thing in all this world—a mother. Sunday is Mother's Day. Remember it and keep it holy. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SNYDER] for 3 minutes.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I am sure I voice the sentiment of all those under the sound of my voice when I say that we were buoyed up to a higher plane of inspiration, both in mind and in soul, by listening to this wonderful Mother's Day address. We Pennsylvanians are doubly honored today. Mr. McGROARTY spent the first 35 years of his life in the grand old Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. California borrowed him to make him the poet laureate of the Golden Gate State.

We are also honored today as Members of Congress, and especially we Pennsylvanians, because under the sound of my voice this very minute is seated the "originator" of "Mother's Day." Miss Anna Jarvis, formerly of West Virginia and now of Philadelphia, who was inspired to create Mother's Day because her mother, down in Webster, W. Va., had in her day the most beautiful flower garden in all that region, and her favorite flower was the carnation. Every time anybody came to the Jarvis homestead, the mother of Miss Jarvis would always pin on them a carnation, it mattered not whether the caller was a miner, a farmer, or one of the tramps or hoboes that used to come along. As Miss Anna Jarvis, who, as I previously stated, is seated under the sound of my voice, got along in years, she thought it would be a noble tribute to motherhood to have set aside one day each year as "Mother's Day"; thus she took steps to have President Wilson proclaim the second Sunday of May as "Mother's Day."

Someone has well said:

Love in the highway is the same as love in the byway and, whether you live under the northern pine or under the southern palm, it is ever the same.

This statement and sentiment I think is especially true when it comes to mother's love, and it has been most fitting and appropriate that the Seventy-fourth Congress unanimously set aside these few minutes to have our most worthy colleague from California bring before our mental gaze once more these finer threads and sentiments that always find their way to a front seat in our mental balcony, when so vividly portrayed as was done by the gentleman from California.

At this point I wish to insert an editorial from the Philadelphia Evening Bulletin, paying just tribute to the one who has just delivered our Mother's Day address:

There have been many poets in Congress; but so far as available history goes, JOHN STEVEN MCGROARTY, elected this month, will be the first with the accredited title of poet laureate. MCGROARTY, well known as the author of the Mission Play, and to everyone on the west coast as a master of prose and verse, will represent a California district; but Pennsylvania is his birthplace, and in this State he began his literary career. Born in Foster Township, Luzerne County, August 20, 1862, the new Member of the House, who was elected poet laureate of California by the Golden State's legislature last year, remains loyal to the State of his birth.

It has also been suggested to me that it is fitting to incorporate in my remarks the following quotations taken from several hundred expressing sentiments concerning Mother's Day:

"In my next general order I shall ask every Grand Army man of the Republic to give proper observance to Mother's Day. It will afford me pleasure to do this. There is no class of men living whose mothers were as patriotic, heroic, and made such sacrifices as ours did." (Gen. Henry M. Nevius, commander in chief, Grand Army of the Republic, 1909. G. A. R. officially adopted Mother's Day. Anna Jarvis, founder Mother's Day, was made honorary member of Ohio post.)

"I am strongly in favor of Mother's Day." (Admiral R. E. Coontz, United States Navy.)

"It is a great pleasure to aid in the celebration of Mother's Day." (Ernest Lee Jaencke, Acting Secretary, United States Navy, Washington.)

"The U. S. S. Tennessee will feature Mother's Day, and we are desirous of making it mean so much to our men." (Chaplain N. Park, Jr., U. S. S. Tennessee, San Pedro, Calif.)

"Mother's Day has been helpful in many ways throughout the length and breadth of our land. We all bless you, Miss Jarvis, for the happiness you have brought to many of us through Mother's Day." (C. N. Dickens, captain, Chaplain Corps, United States Navy.)

"Mother's Day means so much to men in foreign countries. We have sent you pictures and printed material showing some of our meetings, banquets, etc. When we get back to Quantico, Va., marine barracks (the largest marine base in United States), we want to have you down there sometime to one of our large Mother's Day programs, and we will have an immense crowd." (Chaplain, United States Marines, Shanghai, China.)

"The fraternal system of 188 societies and membership of 10,000,000 are all anchored to the truthful knowledge you are the author of Mother's Day and honor your distinction in establishing this day first."

"The idea is beautiful. Ministers should preach about influence of mother's love." (Bishop Whittaker, Protestant Episcopal, Philadelphia.)

Mr. GRAY of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the Cross and Goldsborough amendments offered to the banking bill.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] when the House may expect the Home Owners' Loan Corporation bill to be reported by the conferees. It has been 4 weeks since this bill was referred to conference, and, as I understand it, there is only a minor matter that they object to, and I cannot see why it is being held up all this time.

Mr. GRAY of Indiana. What has that to do with my unanimous-consent request? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I may say that there have been unusual reasons for the delay in agreeing on a conference report on the Home Owners' Loan Corporation Extension Act. The delay has been due in most part to the illness of one of the Senators on the conference, and in part because of the rush of business in the House for the last 2 weeks. We held a preliminary conference on yesterday. We are meeting against this afternoon, and we hope in a day or two to be able to present a conference report to the House.

NATIONAL BOY SCOUT JAMBOREE

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I offer a joint resolution, which is now at the Clerk's desk, to permit the temporary entry into the United States, under certain conditions, of alien participants and officials of the National Boy Scout Jamboree, to be held in the United States in 1935, and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I think there should be some explanation of the resolution. While I think the resolution is all right, I think the matter should be explained to the House.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. These Boy Scouts who are going to attend this jamboree are coming here from all parts of the world. Every country is sending one or two Boy Scouts to participate in our national sports in Washington next month. This joint resolution would simply permit them to enter without paying a head tax or a visa fee. We are taking the same position in passing this resolution that we did with respect to the participants of other countries in the Olympic Games. They came here without the payment of $8 as a head tax.

Mr. SNELL. We did this 2 years ago for the participants in the Olympic Games held here?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Yes; they are coming here with the consent and under the regulation of the Department of Labor and the Department of State and the other Government officials.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this would be all right if the resolution provides safeguards for their return.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. It does.

Mr. BLANTON. Are there proper safeguards in the resolution to insure the prompt return of all of them after this jamboree?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. This is under the regulations of both the Department of State and the Department of Labor.

Mr. BLANTON. But I want to know that their prompt return is assured. How many could come in under the resolution?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Each country is going to send a Boy Scout group.

Mr. BLANTON. A "group" could mean a great many. Are they limited as to the number of Boy Scouts they may send?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. There is no limitation at all.

Mr. BLANTON. There should be a proper limitation. Mr. Speaker, before we agree to this request, we would like to hear the resolution read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That alien participants, officials, and other accredited members of delegations to the National Boy Scout Jamboree, to be held in the United States in 1935, and members of the immediate families of the foregoing, all of whom are non-immigrants—

Mr. BLANTON (interrupting the reading of the joint resolution). That is far enough. Under that language a hundred thousand could come over. I object, Mr. Speaker, if they are going to bring their families in here. If beside the Boy Scout participants, foreign "officials", and foreign "members of delegations", and foreign "members of the immediate families of the foregoing" may all come across our borders, many of them will stay here, and we already have at least 6,500,000 aliens here from foreign countries holding American jobs away from starving Americans now on relief. It is all right for the Boy Scouts to come in when their prompt return is definitely assured, but the families do not have to participate in the national games, but a possible army of officials and delegations are not necessary.

Mr. RANKIN. Does the gentleman consider this an insidious move to bring in some immigrants?

Mr. BLANTON. I am a little suspicious about it, because there have been so many notorious anarchists brought in. I have lost confidence in our bureau. When Emma Goldman, who was the former notorious anarchist pal of that notorious anarchist Alexander Berkman, can be permitted to come in, I have not much confidence in regulations our present careless Immigration Bureau will prescribe for our protection.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his objection for a moment and let the rest of the resolution be read, and then give me a chance to make a statement? Then if the gentleman wishes to object, he can do so.

Mr. BLANTON. This language already read is too all-absorbing and too all-enveloping and too all-embracing. I must object to the resolution.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I will explain to the gentleman the urgency of the matter. This was given to me by the Department, and they asked for its urgent consideration.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat suspicious of an Immigration Bureau and a Department of Labor that will let Emma Goldman, the anarchist pal of Alexander Berkman, come in here and then call Emma "an innocent old lady who was an anarchist", when for 20 years she has been a most dangerous and notorious anarchist, and it had cost our Government a tremendous amount of money to put her out and to deport her and Alexander Berkman following the World War.

I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his objection a moment?

Mr. BLANTON. No; I must object. I want to get some safeguards put in this resolution to protect American jobs for Americans.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Will the gentleman withhold his objection so that I may make a statement?

Mr. BLANTON. No; I am going to object. Mr. Speaker, this should not come up here until we can look into it a little closer and properly safeguard it. The word "officials" and also the words "and other accredited members of delegations" and also the words "and members of the immediate families of the foregoing", all being in addition to the Boy Scouts themselves, are entirely too all-embracing, and under such language a whole army of additional foreigners could come in the United States from Italy, Greece, Japan, Russia, the Philippines, Germany, France, England, and from every other country scattered over the entire world. And the worst of it all is that there are no safeguarding provisions that I deem satisfactory to assure their prompt return out of this country after this so-called "jamboree" is over.

We are already in what I consider too much of a foreign jamboree. We have over 6,500,000 aliens in the United States who have been taking American jobs that belong to Americans. If all of these aliens in the United States have no jobs, they are on relief. If we could deport them and get them out of this country, and keep them out, there would be plenty of American jobs for Americans.

This is one matter that I have made up my mind definitely to watch, and no more bills with my consent are to be passed here that will admit any more aliens into the United States.

The time has come when the Members of this Congress who think more of American citizens, walking the streets without jobs, with their wives and little children starving, than they do of foreigners from foreign countries to make a determined, uncompromising fight to stop other aliens from coming across our borders and to deport the millions of aliens who are now here unlawfully. I am one who is pledged to make such fight. This is one issue upon which I will not compromise. This is a fight to the finish. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I object to the resolution.

THE LATE CLYDE KELLY

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD in connection with the death of Hon. Clyde Kelly, and to include therein resolutions adopted by the National Council of Mail Users.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, the House of Representatives was notified of the sad death of the Honorable Clyde Kelly on Monday, April 29, by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, the Honorable GEORGE P. DARROW.

He was buried on Wednesday, May 1, in the beautiful Mahoning Union Cemetery at Marchand, Pa. The services were held in the Presbyterian Church of Punxsutawney, Pa., some 8 miles from the cemetery.

Dr. Guy D. Wallace, pastor of the First United Presbyterian Church of Washington, D. C.; Rev. Joseph Hillman, pastor of the Chevy Chase Presbyterian Church; and Rev. H. C. Humpke, pastor of the Punxsutawney Church, conducted the services.

The honorary pallbearers were Hon. JAMES M. MEAD, of Buffalo, chairman of the Post Office Committee of the House of Representatives and long-time personal friend and associate of the deceased, and other members of the committee, including Hon. D. C. DOBBINS, of Illinois, Hon. MARTIN L. SWEENEY, of Ohio, and Hon. PHILIP A. GOODWIN, of New York. Hon. JOSEPH GRAY and Hon. THEODORE L. MORITZ, Members of Congress from Pennsylvania, also officiated. The Post Office Department was represented by Hon. Stephen A. Cisler, general superintendent of the Railway Mail Service; M. E. Evans, assistant superintendent, fifteenth division, Railway Mail Service; John M. Keyes, assistant postmaster, Buffalo, N. Y.; and others. Fowler W. Barker, operating engineer of the Aeronautics Chamber of Commerce, represented the commercial air mail lines. Also included were numerous friends of the deceased prominent in State and National affairs.

The active pallbearers consisted of representatives of the employees, as follows: William M. Collins and Frank Bennett, president and vice president, respectively, of the Railway Mail Association; Edward J. Gainor, president, and William J. Gorman, treasurer, of the National Association of Letter Carriers; Leo E. George, president, and Gilbert E. Hyatt, legislative representative, of the National Federation of Post Office Clerks.

The ceremonies were attended by employees of the Postal Service from as far away as could reach Punxsutawney in time for the services. These included delegates representing Chicago, Cincinnati, Pittsburgh, Philadelphia, New York City, Buffalo, and numerous cities in surrounding States.

One of the most significant and touching incidents was the tribute which the flyers of the Air Mail Service gave to the deceased. This was the dropping of roses on the grave from these planes in which they had flown Members of Congress and officials of the Post Office Department from Washington.

A fitting tribute to the father of the air mail legislation.

Mr. Kelly was elected to the Sixty-third Congress and then to the Sixty-fifth Congress, remaining a Member of the House until the conclusion of the Seventy-third Congress. Throughout the greater part of his service as a Member of Congress, Mr. Kelly served as a member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, where he distinguished himself by reason of his superior knowledge of the activities of the Postal Service. He sponsored numerous bills and was always intensely concerned with the expansion and improved facilities of that great business institution.

Both the personnel and the patrons of the service recognized his splendid leadership, and on many occasions it was said of him that he was the best-informed legislator on postal affairs. Indicative of the high appreciation of his valuable work on the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads are the resolutions adopted by the National Council of Business Mail Users, which I am including in my remarks:

NATIONAL COUNCIL OF BUSINESS MAIL USERS, INC.,
Chicago, Ill., May 2, 1935.

Resolutions adopted by the board of directors of the National Council of Business Mail Users, Inc., on May 2, 1935, at Chicago, Ill.

Whereas the board of directors of the National Council of Business Mail Users, Inc., have heard with deepest regret the news of the untimely death of Hon. Clyde Kelly, of Pennsylvania; and

Whereas during the 20 years that he was a Member of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States and the many years he was a member of the Post Office and Post Roads Committee of that honorable body, Mr. Kelly and the National Council of Business Mail Users enjoyed a common interest and worked in common understanding on all proposals for advancing the welfare of the Postal Service; and

Whereas the National Council of Business Mail Users came to know, respect, and honor Mr. Kelly as an able legislator on postal problems, an authoritative writer on the subject of the Post Office, and a constructive force in the upbuilding of this great business department of our Government; and

Whereas Mr. Kelly as a legislator and as a man was, in his own words, inspired by that "faith of Americans in a postal establishment which follows steadfastly the goal of service": Be it

Resolved, That the National Council of Business Mail Users record its profound regret at the death of Hon. Clyde Kelly, and express its deepest sympathy to the members of his family, and to his friends and colleagues in the Congress of the United States; and further, that in his contributions to the development, expansions, and upbuilding of the Postal Service of the United States, we believe Mr. Kelly has left his own best and most imperishable monument; and, further, that in the name of every business user of the mails there should be carried onward his spirit of devotion to the progress and welfare of the Postal Service, expressed in the verses of his favorite poem:

There followeth after me today,
A youth whose feet must pass this way.
This chasm which has been as naught to me
To that fair-haired youth may a pitfall be.
He, too, must cross in the twilight dim,
Good friend, I am building this bridge for him.

THOMAS QUINN BEESLEY,
Executive Director.

For the Board:
HOMER J. BUCKLEY.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a joint resolution of the House of the following title:

H. J. Res. 254. Joint resolution providing for an investigation by the United States Public Health Service of the plumbing and sanitary systems in Federal Government buildings.

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6718) entitled "An act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture and for the Farm Credit Administration for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and for other purposes."

AMEND EMERGENCY FARM MORTGAGE ACT OF 1933, FEDERAL FARM LOAN ACT, AGRICULTURAL MARKETING ACT, AND FARM CREDIT ACT OF 1933

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5440) to amend the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act of 1933, to amend the Federal Farm Loan Act, to amend the Agricultural Marketing Act, and to amend the Farm Credit Act of 1933, and for other purposes.

Mr. DALY. Will the gentleman withhold that? Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 2 minutes.

Mr. JONES. I will yield to the gentleman in general debate on this bill.

The motion of Mr. JONES was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. Igoe in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALY].

Mr. DALY. Mr. Chairman, the Associated Press circulated yesterday through the country a report that I was opposed to holding the convention of the Democratic Party next year in Philadelphia. That report is absolutely without foundation. Far from opposing Philadelphia for holding the Democratic National Convention next year, I am very strongly in favor of it and will also extend an invitation to the Republican Party to hold their convention there next year. We have accommodations of the most splendid kind in every detail. We have fine hotels, magnificent suburbs, everything that will make for the comfort of visitors.

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DALY. I yield.

Mr. McFARLANE. I wish the gentleman would keep the police from unjustifiably molesting tourists on the boulevards in Philadelphia.

Mr. DALY. If the tourists obeyed the traffic regulations of Philadelphia they would not be molested. [Laughter.]

To the Republicans, I want to invite you to Philadelphia, where we are well able to take care of you. In fact, we have been taking good care of the Republicans there for the last few years. We can furnish you what you want, anything and everything. We will even let you have FISH if you want him.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 1 minute more.

Mr. DALY. Mr. Chairman, in the 1 minute that I have I just want to say, bring the Democratic Convention to Philadelphia, and we will give Pennsylvania's electoral vote next year to Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DALY. Yes.

Mr. McFARLANE. Just to keep the RECORD straight, I was not molested in Philadelphia, as the gentleman suggests, at any time, but a good friend of mine was, and I asked the question in fun, for that purpose.

Mr. DALY. The only reason the gentleman was not molested was that he got his friend to pose as a Congressman. [Laughter.]

Mr. McFARLANE. Oh, no; that is not so.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has again expired.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, this measure for the most part is composed of mechanical amendments which are found advisable in the administration of the Farm Credit Act. Its provisions will facilitate the operation of that institution. Under the act at the present time, of the $2,200,000,000 made available for the use of the Farm Credit Administration, a limit of $600,000,000 is placed on Commissioner's loans. Sufficient loans and commitments have been made to take up the latter fund. It will be recalled that while the regular land-bank loans are limited to 50 percent of the value of the property, plus 20 percent of the improvements, the Commissioner's loans may be made up to 75 percent. Naturally there is a demand for Commissioner's loans. This simply takes that limit off and permits all of the funds which the institution has to be used for either the land bank or the Commissioner's loans. In other words, it takes the limit off the funds available for Commissioner's loans.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. PARSONS. Has anything been inserted in the way of amendment that the land banks may change their policy of loaning the farmers who are in drainage districts?

Mr. JONES. I do not believe that that is in the bill. That is an administrative matter. They may make loans if the security is sufficient and the outstanding obligations do not interfere. Where the district bonds are in default the banks cannot get a first mortgage. In some of the districts these district obligations have been refinanced. In such cases the banks are making loans.

Mr. PARSONS. In sections along rivers like the Mississippi and the Ohio, where they have a number of drainage districts, it has been the policy of the Federal land banks not to make loans to farmers whose farms and lands are within a drainage district because of the excessive taxes levied for drainage purposes.

Mr. JONES. There are some bills pending that would cover the subject which the gentleman has in mind. He understands, of course, if any loans are made on other than a business basis some provision would need to be made for funds for that purpose. As suggested, a way has been provided if the districts refinance their defaulted obligations.

Mr. PARSONS. I wondered if the gentleman could give us any idea as to whether any one of these bills will be reported and acted upon at this session.

Mr. JONES. I cannot tell the gentleman at this time. We have several hundred bills before the committee and it is impossible to predict at this time what the future will bring forth in respect to them.

Section 2 of this extends the time within which Commissioner's loans are to be repaid. The present limit is 13 years. The new provision enables them to be made for the same length of time as land bank loans.

Mr. DUNCAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. DUNCAN. A great many farm Commissioner's loans have already been made, and they must be amortized over a period of 13 years.

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. DUNCAN. Is there anything in this act that will give them relief?

Mr. JONES. These loans could be refinanced and put on a longer time basis. I suppose this policy will be suited to the needs of each particular case. I doubt whether there will be general refinancing. One of the sections will permit these loans for improvements as well as for the purposes they may now be made.

Mr. DUNCAN. Then, as I understand, they may make another application and have these loans refinanced or extended in the same way new loans are made under this act.

Mr. JONES. Yes. Then it also changes the definition so that a man buying a farm or shortly to become a farmer may apply for this same character of loan. The next section extends the time during which the Commissioner's loan may be made. The time is extended until 1940.

Another amendment facilitates the matter of the execution of releases when the loan is paid off. Heretofore releases have had to come to Washington to be signed. In order to facilitate transactions it is stipulated that the Federal land banks in various districts may execute these releases.

There is another provision in section 5 which authorizes the intermediate-credit banks to rediscount the paper of other branches of the institution, whereas now they are limited to the production-credit feature. The method of issuing debentures is broadened so that consolidated debentures may be issued. Also, loans may be made under the added provision for additional purpose, including farm service.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Does it permit the co-ops to decentralize into branches and get out from under a central State responsibility? For instance, my colleague knows that in some States the cooperatives were formerly one State organization but now they are decentralized into branches with no State-wide responsibility.

Mr. JONES. All these loans must be made on a business basis and have behind them proper security.

Mr. BLANTON. And could loans be made to separate branches all over a State?

Mr. JONES. If a branch owned the facilities or owned the property on which the loan was made.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman who is chairman of the committee is in favor of this bill?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. COLDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. COLDEN. Will the small farms in California, the fruit and poultry farms of from 1 to 5 acres, come within the provisions of this bill?

Mr. JONES. They are covered if they are recognized as farms by the administration. I understand that the size of the farm is not the test. It is a matter of value and of use. Even small poultry farms are eligible for a loan.

Mr. COLDEN. Can the gentleman give an illustration of what the Department holds to be a farm?

Mr. JONES. I do not think there is any general definition as to that. As I understand it, they pass on the matter when it is presented to them. It is pretty hard to lay down a definite line and say this is a farm and this is not. I understand they have taken care of a good many of these small units.

The bill also permits cooperatives to retain their stock when their loan is paid off if they care to do so.

These measures in the main merely facilitate the operation of the land-bank system. In my judgment some very, very fine work has been done by the Farm Credit Administration.

Without taking further time of the committee, because all of the money available for Commissioner's loans has been exhausted in loans or commitments and I am anxious to get the bill through for that reason, I shall not go into a full explanation. I would like to file for the RECORD an explanation showing the fine line of work that has been done by this Farm Credit Administration.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Does this bill contain any provision to correct the policy of the land banks of discriminating against great sections of our country like the lowlands of southeastern Missouri and Arkansas, where they have refused to lend any money or to recognize these great sections of our own fertile land in need of help simply because they are within a drainage district?

Mr. JONES. The Farm Credit Administration claims they have rejected no section of the country and that each transaction is considered on the basis of its merits. The Congress, of course, cannot determine whether this farm or that farm is entitled to a loan. The Farm Credit Administration claims they do not turn down any farm or any section of the country where there is reasonable promise of a return on the investment. I do not think we can go further than that.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. They have adopted the policy in our State, and in one or two other States of which I know, of refusing any loan in any drainage district because they are afraid some person might fail to pay his drainage assessment and that thereby the loan would be jeopardized.

Mr. JONES. They have made some loans in drainage districts. I do not know about the one to which the gentleman refers, but I am sure the gentleman is misinformed.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. I am speaking for 10 counties in southeast Missouri.

Mr. MITCHELL of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. MITCHELL of Tennessee. Is not one of the things accomplished by these amendments a lowering of the rate of interest on these loans?

Mr. JONES. Additional funds are made available for Commissioner's loans; and the committee, as the gentleman knows, will offer an amendment which will make the rate of interest for the intervening 3-year period that is covered by the present act and by the Wheeler amendment available for that purpose.

Mr. BLANTON. This bill comes from the gentleman's committee with a unanimous report, does it not?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. TRUAX. In view of the fact that I have received a good many letters and telegrams urging me to support the Wheeler amendment, can the gentleman inform me whether if I support the bill as presented in the House I shall be complying with the wishes of my constituents?

Mr. JONES. In large measure the gentleman will be; and I think it is the best we can possibly get. I would add further, that the amendment intended to be offered by the committee is acceptable to the Senator.

Mr. TRUAX. Senator Wheeler?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. TRUAX. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. JONES. I submit herewith a detailed explanation of the different features of the bill:

STATEMENT CONCERNING PROPOSED FARM CREDIT ACT OF 1935

Section 1: This section provides a short title for the act.

Section 2, subsection (a): Under the present provisions of section 32 of the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act of 1933 each Land Bank Commissioner's loan must be made on an amortized basis providing for payment of principal and interest within a period of not more than 13 years, unless the loan is secured wholly by a first or second lien on real property and the purpose of the loan is to reduce and refinance an existing mortgage. Through the elimination of the phrase "and made for the purpose of reducing and refinancing an existing mortgage", the amendment will remove the latter limitation and permit the making of loans secured by first or second liens on real property with maturities up to 43 years.

Subsection (b): At the present time Land Bank Commissioner's loans cannot be made for the purpose of financing purchases of farm property or for the construction of improvements. By enlarging the purposes for which Commissioner's loans may be made to include all those for which the Federal land banks are authorized to make loans, this situation is ameliorated. Further, subsection (b), in the last sentence thereof, removes whatever doubt may exist in regard to the authority of the Land Bank Commissioner to refinance an indebtedness which has not been assumed personally by the borrower but which is secured by a lien on all or a part of the property accepted as security for the loan.

Subsection (c): By the addition of the phrase "at the time, or shortly to become", this amendment will make the definition of the term "farmer" in the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act of 1933 identical with the term "farmer" as it is defined in the Federal Farm Loan Act, as amended. The object of the amendment is to give full operative effect to the amendment in subsection (b).

Subsection (d): The purposes of this subsection are: First, to extend until February 1, 1940, the time within which loans can be made by the Land Bank Commissioner; second, to remove the present limitation—$600,000,000—on the amount of bonds of the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation which may be used in making such loans; and, third, to permit such loans to be made in consolidated farm-loan bonds, if acceptable to the borrower.

Subsection (e): At the present time Land Bank Commissioner's loans are made and closed by the Federal land banks, which have been appointed the agents of the Commissioner for this purpose. Numerous requests are now being received from borrowers for the release of portions of the mortgaged security from the lien of the mortgages, to permit sales of portions of the security, the conveying of rights-of-way for road-building operations, and similar purposes. It has therefore been necessary for the Land Bank Commissioner and the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation formally to authorize the Federal land banks to execute such releases, subordinations, and similar instruments on behalf of the Commissioner and the Corporation, under recorded powers of attorney. This practice not only results in heavy expense but presents serious legal questions in many States, involving the power of the Corporation to delegate such authority to the Federal land banks and the power of the latter to act in such capacities. Subsection (e) is designed to obviate such uncertainty and expense.

Section 4: The national farm-loan association program is designed to build up surpluses in the associations from which they can meet operating expenses and losses during periods of depressed farm prices. Many of the associations are accumulating substantial surpluses as a result of the recent abnormal volume of farm-mortgage business. Since the supervisory power vested in the Farm Credit Administration does not now permit the Land Bank Commissioner to control by regulation the declaration of dividends by national farm-loan associations, this section, by amending the fourth sentence of section 24 of the Federal Farm Loan Act, subjects the declaration and payment of such dividends to the approval of the Land Bank Commissioner.

Section 5: Subsection (a) amends paragraph (1) of subsection (a) of section 202 of the Federal Farm Loan Act, as amended, to authorize Federal intermediate-credit banks to discount paper for banks for cooperatives, and/or to make loans to such banks. It is believed that the proposed arrangement will prove mutually beneficial to the banks for cooperatives and to the Federal intermediate-credit banks, in that it will enable them to develop a larger volume of cooperative business, thus utilizing more fully their potential lending capacities.

Subsection (b) amends paragraph (3) of subsection (a) of said section 202 to authorize Federal intermediate-credit banks to charge commissions for accepting drafts and bills of exchange drawn upon the banks by cooperative associations. It is thought that since Congress empowered the banks to accept drafts and bills of exchange for cooperative associations, it must have intended the banks to charge the usual commission rates; but the act is silent on this point. The amendment is designed to permit such charges to be made at rates approved by the Governor.

Subsection (c) repeals subsection (d) of said section 202, since the provisions in respect to interest and discount rates to be charged by Federal intermediate-credit banks are consolidated and clarified in section 7 of the bill.

Section 6: General lack of knowledge, on the part of the investing public in regard to the ultimate joint liability of all Federal intermediate-credit banks for the debentures issued by any such bank, results in customer preference and a disinclination on the part of some investors to purchase debentures issued by certain banks; and this same lack of knowledge also tends to prevent the public sale of the debentures at the most favorable rates.

Subsections (a) and (b) amend section 203 of the Federal Farm Loan Act, as amended, to authorize the issuance of consolidated debentures by Federal intermediate credit banks, following substantially the same procedure as that followed by the Federal land banks in the issue of their consolidated bonds; and to provide that Federal intermediate credit bank debentures shall be legally acceptable as lawful investments, and security, for all fiduciary, trust, and public funds held under the authority or control of officers of the United States, thus broadening the field of investors to whom debentures may be sold. This provision is comparable to existing provisions with respect to farm-loan bonds and bonds of the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation.

Section 7: This section amends subsection (a) of section 204 of the Federal Farm Loan Act, as amended, to provide that rates of discount and interest charged by any Federal intermediate-credit bank shall be subject to approval by the Intermediate Credit Commissioner; and that, except with the approval of the Governor, they shall not exceed by more than 1 percent per annum the rate borne by the last preceding issue of debentures which the bank issued or in which it participated. This amendment is designed to clarify the method of fixing interest and discount rates, and to authorize the Governor, in his discretion, to permit a bank to charge interest or discount at a rate more than 1 percent in excess of the rate borne by the last preceding issue of debentures when, in his opinion, it is proper to do so. Conditions in the money market may change rapidly, so that the 1-percent spread between rates paid on debentures and rates of interest and discount charged by the banks may not be adequate for the most effective operation of the banks.

References in the present act to the Federal Farm Loan Board are eliminated. The proviso in section 204 (a) relating to the classification of loans and debentures and the differentiation in rates of interest charged on loans in the same classes has been omitted, since no practical method of exercising this power has been discovered.

Section 8: This section will add a new subsection to section 208 of the Federal Farm Loan Act to authorize various Government departments, boards, commissions, independent establishments, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, the Federal Reserve Board, and the Federal Reserve banks, upon request of the Governor, to furnish any Federal intermediate-credit bank, in confidence, any information they may have relating to the condition of any institution with which the bank has, or contemplates having, financial relations. This is comparable to the privilege which the Reconstruction Finance Corporation now enjoys.

Section 9: Under existing legislation, the Governor of the Farm Credit Administration and the banks for cooperatives are authorized to make physical facility loans only to cooperative marketing associations. This section, by amending paragraph (2) of subsection (a) of section 7 of the Agricultural Marketing Act, will broaden the present authority to include the making of loans for physical facilities for all cooperative business purposes.

Section 10: At the present time, the amount which may be loaned by the Governor or by any bank for cooperatives for the construction or acquisition of physical facilities may not exceed 60 percent of the value of the facilities which are to be constructed or acquired with the proceeds of the loan. This section, by amending paragraph (1) of subsection (c) of section 7 of the Agricultural Marketing Act, will permit any physical facility loan to be made for an amount not exceeding 60 percent of the appraised value of the security therefor.

Section 11: This section amends subsection (a) of section 8 of the Agricultural Marketing Act to provide, in substance: First, that the maximum interest rate to be charged on any loan to a cooperative association shall be 6 percent; second, that the rate to be charged on a loan for the construction or acquisition of physical facilities shall conform, as nearly as practicable, to the prevailing rate on mortgage loans made to members of national farm-loan associations; third, that the rates of interest on commodity loans shall be prescribed by the Governor; and fourth, that the rate of interest on any other type of loan made to a cooperative association shall conform, as nearly as practicable, to a rate 1 percent in excess of the prevailing interest rate charged production-credit associations by the Federal intermediate-credit bank of the district in which the cooperative association is located.

Section 12: This amendment to subsection (a) of section 15 of the Agricultural Marketing Act will attain two results: First, the definition of cooperative associations eligible to borrow from the Governor of the Farm Credit Administration and from the banks for cooperatives will be clarified and broadened to include cooperative associations in which farmers act together in furnishing farm business services—at the present time farmers' cooperative property insurance associations and associations engaged in supplying certain other farm business services are ineligible to borrow; second, the addition of a new sentence to the last paragraph of subsection (a) will enable the Government and governmental agencies to use the facilities of large cooperative purchasing and marketing associations without jeopardizing the status of such associations under the Capper-Volstead Act and the Agricultural Marketing Act.

Sections 13 and 14: These are amendments to sections 34 and 41 of the Farm Credit Act of 1933 which will authorize the banks for cooperatives to borrow from, and to buy, sell, or discount paper with, the Federal intermediate credit banks, a power which they do not have under existing legislation. These amendments are correlative to subsection (a) of section 5 of the bill.

Section 15: Section 15 is designed to accomplish three purposes: Subsection (a), by amending the first sentence of subsection (a) of section 35 of the Farm Credit Act of 1933, will authorize the Governor to except borrowers whose loans are secured by commodities from the present requirements that each borrower from a bank for cooperatives must own stock in the bank in an amount equal in fair book value to $100 per $2,000, or a fraction thereof, of the amount of the loan. Subsection (b) will authorize a bank for cooperatives to permit the retention of stock in the bank by borrowers who have discharged their loans, a privilege which they do not now have. Subsection (c), by adding a new subsection to section 35 of the Farm Credit Act of 1933, will give each bank for cooperatives the authority to realize, in partial or total liquidation of indebtedness, upon the stock of such bank held by defaulting borrowers.

Section 16: Section 16, by amending section 66 of the Farm Credit Act of 1933, will make the present limitation ($10,000) on the salary which any officer or employee of a production-credit corporation or bank for cooperatives may receive applicable only to the salaries paid to such officers or employees by that institution, and will have the effect of permitting any such institution to participate in the payment of a salary in excess of $10,000 to the general agent, who serves as a coordinating officer and is the joint employee of the four major district institutions. It is essential that each production credit corporation and bank for cooperatives be permitted to participate with the Federal land bank and Federal intermediate-credit bank of the district in paying for the position of general agent a salary which will enable them to secure and retain the best available talent.

Sections 17 and 18: It has been determined to be desirable to extend for an additional period of 2 years the present authority of the Land Bank Commissioner, under section 30 of the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act of 1933, to make loans to joint-stock land banks in order to further their orderly liquidation, continuing in effect those provisions which require, as a condition of any such loan, that the borrowing bank grant a reduction to 5 percent in the rate of interest paid by borrowers from such bank and agree to defer for a comparable period the foreclosure of mortgages, except under certain stated circumstances; and also to extend likewise the authority of the Commissioner, under section 31 of the same act, to make loans to such banks for the purpose of securing the forbearance of the foreclosure of first mortgages for default in principal or interest payments or delinquencies in tax payments, retaining the present requirement for a reduction in interest charges paid by borrowers. These objectives will be accomplished by sections 17 and 18 of the bill.

Section 19: This section contains the usual constitutional saving clause, and expressly reserves to Congress the right to alter, amend, or repeal the act.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL].

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to go into a detailed explanation of the various phases of this bill, but as I have read it over it seems to me that in general it has to do with regulatory measures covering the lending of money, and that these amendments as a whole liberalize these lending regulations and in general provide more money to be loaned to the farmers under very reasonable rates of interest.

The one thing in this bill in which I am especially interested is the amendment which I understand will be offered by the committee reducing the interest rate on the farm loans that have been made and that are to be made for the period of 1 year at 3½ percent and the next 2 years at 4 percent. It seems to me this is a step in the right direction; that it is of definite aid to the farmers; that it is something we can understand; and that the farmer himself can understand. Furthermore, it does not run contrary to any economic law; does not destroy or break down anything else and is constructive in every detail.

The trouble with most of our legislation in the past, where we were going to help the farmer, is that it is so complicated that no one understands it, and eventually it is doubtful whether it aids the farmers or not; but here is something that is in the right direction; everyone knows what you mean, and no one can say that it is economically unsound. It is a fair thing for the Government to do; does not cost anyone or the Government anything, because the Government itself can borrow this money at a less interest rate than it is proposed under this bill to lend it to the farmers, and it does bring direct benefits to agriculture.

Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of the amendment that will be offered, and I hope it will receive the unanimous endorsement of this House. [Applause.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN].

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein some tables to which I shall refer.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, since we all seem to be agreed on the bill presented by the Committee on Agriculture, I wish to address myself for a few moments to another subject and to expose, if I may, some of the false propaganda with which the country is now being flooded on the subject of electric light and power rates.

Mr. Chairman, "ways that are dark" and "tricks that are vain" are being resorted to by the Power Trust in their frenzied efforts to defeat legislation now pending before Congress—legislation that has for its object the protection of the ultimate consumers of electric light and power from the excessive rates they have been compelled to pay, as well as the protection of innocent investors from being further plundered through the sale of worthless watered stocks.

They have a "brain trust" of their own, composed of men who are so flexible in their arguments, if not in their thinking, that they will argue, and attempt to prove, anything their masters want the public to believe. They have such a lack of knowledge of, or confidence in, the intelligence of the American people that they brazenly garble facts or juggle statistics to try to prove that the Power Trust is a real benefactor.

Chief among these juggling spokesmen of the power interests is one Dr. Warren A. Persons, of New York City, who calls himself a "consulting economist." Dr. Persons recently issued a report on the "Comparison of net monthly bills and rates for specific domestic service of municipal and private electric plants in the United States" that is so grossly misleading that it would all but "make the angels weep."

It was evidently prepared for the power interests, for a synopsis of its misleading features was sent out over the country and was published in practically every Power Trust newspaper in the United States. A great many papers that are not in sympathy with the malpractices of the power monopolies were misled into publishing extracts from this misleading document, or into printing "canned" editorials, prepared and sent out by these interests, extolling the accuracy of this Persons report or heralding its "revelations" as a "complete answer" to the contention that light and power rates are too high.

This Persons report reminds us of Shakespeare's query:

What plea so tainted and corrupt but being seasoned with a gracious voice obscures the show of evil?

Its sole object seems to have been to prove that rates charged by private power companies are lower than the rates charged by publicly owned plants, regardless of the facts.

Dr. Persons, in this report, does not follow the research procedure of the unbiased investigator who first gathers all relevant facts and then proceeds to analyze them. Instead, he exercises "a shrewd and limited selection" of those facts which suit his purpose and indulges in certain manipulations which invite sweeping criticism. If it were not for the publicity which this report has received it would not merit serious consideration.

Let me call your attention to some of the unfair comparisons made by Dr. Persons. He compares the rates in Buffalo, N. Y., which is served by a private power company, with the rates in Tacoma, Wash., which is served by a publicly owned plant. But he fails to tell you that although Tacoma has the lowest light and power rates in the United States, yet last year the Tacoma plant paid $145,575 taxes, gave to the city of Tacoma $200,545 free service, set aside for depreciation $441,053, paid interest on its indebtedness to the amount of $435,332, and still made a net profit of $508,190.

He fails also to call attention to the fact that Buffalo, N. Y., is just across the line from Ontario, Canada, where they have the lowest light and power rates in America, even lower than Tacoma, Wash., the psychological effect of which forces the private companies to lower their rates in Buffalo and the surrounding territory.

Dr. Persons tells you that the power companies pay 13 percent of their gross revenues for taxes. I do not agree with that statement; it seems to me to be an exaggeration. But even if that figure is correct, it would still leave a balance in favor of the Tacoma plant of $600,981.

He also cites Los Angeles, Calif., which has both a public and a private plant, but he fails to call your attention to the fact that the low rates charged by the public plant forces the private plant to come down to meet the competition. He also fails to tell you that the public plant in Los Angeles paid $26,647 taxes last year, contributed to the city in cash $1,296,570, gave free service to the city of Los Angeles amounting to $1,079,463, set aside $2,086,899 for depreciation, paid interest on its indebtedness in the amount of $1,528,385, and still made a net profit of $3,670,091.

He attempts to compare the rates in Indianapolis, Ind., which is served by a private company, with the rates in Jacksonville, Fla., which is served by a public plant; but he fails to tell you that the Jacksonville plant last year paid $38,201 taxes, and still made a net profit of $1,784,418.34.

These are typical comparisons that might be made between the other cities set out in Dr. Persons' report, and which he uses to try to convince the public that rates charged by private power companies would be lower than the rates charged by public plants, if the public plants paid the same taxes as are paid by the private companies.

There are numerous evidences of bias pervading this Persons' report. They stand out with unmistakable clearness. The method adopted by Dr. Persons is to compare median average rates for typical domestic consumptions as charged in cities served by public and private plants. The cities chosen are allegedly similar as to size of population served. The main body of the report deals, first, with 2 selected groups of 24 large cities, and, second, with 2 other groups of 290 cities paired as to size and geographical distribution. These comments will be restricted to the former groups of cities and the treatment of the data derived. I may have something to say about his treatment of the other group at a later date.

In his report, Dr. Persons states that—

A shrewd and limited selection of cities is all that is required to marshal plausible support for or against the contention that the domestic rates of municipal electric plants are lower than those of private plants.

The question suggests itself as to whether he made his selections in the light of his own words.

Bias is clearly evidenced in his selection of the 48 large cities, 24 supplied by private companies and 24 by municipal systems.

In the first place, the two groups include cities of entirely dissimilar population sizes, although it is universally accepted that the density of the population has a real effect on rates charged. While the investigator uses most of the large municipal plants, 6 are in cities of 30,000 to 40,000, 10 in the 40,000 to 100,000 group, only 8 being in cities over 100,000. On the other hand, all of the 24 private plants serve cities of 270,000 and over. That these are noncomparable Dr. Persons was well aware, for he refers in his report to the tendency for bills to decrease as the population of cities served increases.

This selection cannot even be excused on the ground that he chose the 24 largest private and municipal plants. He apparently hand-picked the list to include only 19 of the 24 largest private plants, omitting Boston, New Orleans, Rochester, Jersey City, and Newark, all of which have bills considerably higher than the average. For these he substituted Portland, Oreg., Columbus, Denver, Oakland, and St. Paul, all of which have bills lower than the average. The list of municipal plants he also seems to have hand-picked, excluding Glendale, Calif., a large municipal plant which charges among the lowest rates in the entire country.

Net monthly bills for 5 cities of the 24 largest private companies excluded by Dr. Persons and net monthly bills for the 5 smaller cities included are as follows:

	Kilowatt-hours
	15	25	40	100	150	250
Cities excluded:
Boston.....	$1.05	$1.65	$2.40	$5.20	$6.70	$9.70
Jersey City.....	1.35	2.15	3.20	5.30	6.80	9.80
Newark.....	1.35	2.15	3.20	5.30	6.80	9.80
New Orleans.....	1.38	2.13	3.25	6.00	7.25	10.75
Rochester.....	1.15	1.65	2.40	5.00	7.00	10.00
Cities included:
Columbus.....	.75	1.75	1.95	4.50	6.00	8.50
Denver.....	.90	1.50	2.40	4.80	6.30	9.30
Oakland.....	1.08	1.53	2.10	4.20	5.95	7.85
Portland, Oreg.....	1.00	1.38	1.95	3.39	4.29	6.09
St. Paul.....	1.25	1.75	2.30	4.00	5.15	7.15

These bills are taken from the preliminary report of the electric-rate survey of the Federal Power Commission.

As a matter of interest rather than a reason for censure, it should be noted that Dr. Persons includes in his 24 private plants 6 which are operating under competitive, and therefore abnormal, conditions. The low rates in Cleveland, Columbus, Los Angeles, and Seattle are all directly traceable to the competition of municipal plants, while in St. Louis and Portland, Oreg., there are two competing private companies. Kansas City, Mo., with a private plant, also competes indirectly with Kansas City, Kans., which is supplied by one of the most efficient public plants in the country. In these cities we have to do not with a regulated monopoly, the typical situation, but with a kind of dog-eat-dog competition. It is highly questionable whether such cities should be included in a typical sample, limited to 24 cities.

The cumulative effects of such "shrewd and limited selection" could not fail to result in averages which for private plants are lower and for municipal plants higher than a statistically accurate method would lead to.

I will read you the figures to show that the sum of the six median typical bills for all privately served cities over 50,000 is 14.8 percent greater than the averages derived for the 24 privately served cities selected by Dr. Persons, while the sum of typical bills for all municipal plants over 50,000 is 8.4 percent lower than the average derived from Dr. Persons' 24 municipal plants.

Could anything more conclusively prove Dr. Persons' desire to score his point at any cost?

Here are the figures:

	Median bills for following kilowatt-hours						Total of 6 bills	Per-cent
	15	25	40	100	150	250
24 selected private companies.....	$0.92	$1.41	$2.04	$3.90	$5.21	$7.80	$21.28	100.0
All cities over 50,000, 185 private companies.....	1.08	1.70	2.50	4.60	6.05	8.50	24.43	114.8
24 selected municipals.....	.80	1.25	1.95	3.75	5.00	7.45	20.20	100.0
All cities over 50,000, 16 municipal plants.....	.73	1.23	1.80	3.42	4.50	6.84	18.52	91.6

These figures are taken from the report of the electric-rate survey, recently made by the Federal Power Commission. This is the cumulative amount of the preceding six bills and is used simply as a mathematical basis for determining percentages.

BIAS EVIDENCED IN HANDLING TAXES

In attempting to make adjustments for tax payments by private companies, the author not only subtracts 13 percent from average bills, on the ground that 13 percent of gross revenues of such companies is chargeable to taxes, but he goes a step farther and computes reductions on account of taxes at 35 percent. The reasoning here is worthy of the publicity and propaganda department of a utility organization in the irresponsible decade of 1920-29, but hardly of the economic department in this sober and somber period.

The 35-percent reduction is based on the arbitrary and groundless assumption that all taxes are to be paid from domestic rates. An equally logical assumption would be that all profits should be contributed by domestic consumers, and that commercial and industrial customers are being carried at cost. This is surely something new in the theory of rate determination and as indefensible as it is naive and misleading.

A second evidence of bias under this heading is Dr. Persons' complete disregard of the contributions to the public as consistently made by municipal plants. Such contributions must be considered as an offset to the taxes paid by private companies. This is a feature that has been universally neglected in making rate comparisons between public and private enterprises.

In order to indicate how significant these contributions are, reports from the 24 municipal plants selected as typical by Dr. Persons have been examined. They yield the following data on the items of taxes, free electrical service and outright cash payments to the cities' general and other funds:

Contributions of 24 municipal plants to municipalities served
Taxes, exclusive of 3-percent Federal tax.....	$422,397
Cash to general and other funds.....	4,636,886
Free electrical service.....	4,078,292

9,137,575

(The credit for free service was estimated on the following basis: 4 cents per kilowatt-hour for street lighting, 3 cents per kilowatt-hour for lighting of buildings, and 1 cent per kilowatt-hour for water pumping.)

Electrical operating revenues.....	$40,500,309
Percentage of contributions.....percent..	22.5
Receipts from domestic and residential service.....	$15,919,579
Percentage of contributions.....percent..	57.3

If Dr. Persons is interested in promoting scientific research, he would do well to subtract 22.5 percent from his average municipal bills when he subtracts 13 percent from the average private bill and 57.3 percent from the municipal averages, when he sees fit to subtract 35 percent from the private company averages. On the whole, he might be well advised to forget the tax item when he again attempts to prove the case for the private utilities.

To illustrate this matter of public contributions more specifically, let us take the two largest Texas cities compared by Dr. Persons: Austin, served by a municipal plant, and Waco, served by the Texas Power & Light Co., an Electric Bond & Share subsidiary. Both cities have about the same population of around 60,000 with economic conditions similar enough for a fair comparison and the rates charged for typical quantities of current are approximately the same.

Here are their respective taxes or contributions to governments:

Cities	Municipal taxes and contributions	All other taxes	Total	Percent
Waco.....	$31,950.48	$34,498.28	$66,448.76	100
Austin.....	267,393.09	267,393.09	402

Taxes estimated at 10 percent of total taxes paid by Texas Power & Light Co. to all governments. Gross income of this company in Waco from electric sales is about 10 percent of total income.

In addition to $267,393.09 contributed to the city the increased equity of the city in the electric plant was about $200,000 in 1933. About 50 percent of gross earnings of this electric department is net profit after allowing for depreciation and assumed interest.

Another factor that is of no little importance is the standard policy of the publicly owned plants to clear their properties of debt. Practically all are engaged in amortizing the investment. Some are in fact debt free, with no bonds outstanding, as is the case of the Jacksonville (Fla.) plant. Private companies, on the contrary, definitely plan to pay interest on the bulk of their investments as a permanent policy. They refund while the municipals amortize. Furthermore, the typical municipal plant finances extensions as a matter of course out of earnings without having recourse to the banks and investment houses. In making rate comparisons financial policies along these lines cannot well be left out of account.

The following tabulation points up the above generalization. It is submitted by the Public Service Commission of Wisconsin and covers all the publicly and privately owned companies in the State apart from telephones and railroads.

	Percentages to total capitalization Dec. 31, 1933
	Municipal utilities	Private electric, gas, electric railway, water, and bus companies
Liabilities and accruals:
Long-term debt.....	6.8	39.8
Advances from affiliates.....	.1	4.7
Notes payable.....	.2	1.4
Other liabilities.....	2.5	4.0
Total.....	9.6	49.9
Reserves:
Advances and donations for construction.....	10.0	.4
Reserves for retirements and depreciation.....	14.5	11.1
Total.....	24.5	11.5
Capital-stock equity:
Preferred stock.....	17.3
Common-stock and city equity.....	20.0	17.3
Surplus and surplus reserves.....	45.9	4.0
Total.....	65.9	38.6
Total capitalization.....	100.0	100.0

	Income and interest charges
	Municipal electricity and water	Private electricity, gas, water, heating, and joint
Gross corporate income.....	$3,369,501	$21,097,816
Deductions: Interest on long-term debt and miscellaneous interest expense.....	$337,424	$12,108,046
Ratio of interest charges to income.....percent..	10	57

The foregoing figures tell a story that reflects only credit on the public plants in Wisconsin. Construction is paid out of revenues, depreciation reserves are on a sound basis, and surplus and reserves equal nearly half of total capitalization. But the chief advantage is in the matter of interest charges. The amortization of the investment has reached the point where only 10 percent of the income is absorbed under this item, while the private companies devote well over half of their income to such charges—and will continue to do so as a matter of regular policy. Debt policies cannot well be left out of account in comparing private and public plants. Large debts necessarily mean high rates.

In conclusion, it is difficult to restrain one's self in condemning Dr. Persons' elaborate attempt to discredit municipal ownership. If the municipal plants have made such a poor job of it, as is so frequently claimed, why is it necessary to use hand-picked samples, to distort facts, and to ignore essential factors?

Dr. Persons' report, taken for all in all, is simply typical of the misleading power propaganda with which the country is now being flooded. [Applause.]

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GILCHRIST].

Mr. GILCHRIST. Mr. Chairman, I am of the opinion that the House is ready to vote on this bill now. I know of no one who is opposing it, and I have heard of no one who is opposing the amendment which the committee is about to offer. In this connection I recall my first attempt in court out in Iowa to convince a trial judge that I was correct. It is an old story at the bar, but it is true in my case.

Court adjourned for the noon lunch—we call it dinner out in the sticks. I do not know what lunch is. I went to the law books to try to defend my position a little better than I had been able to do during the morning argument and came back into the court room promptly at 1 o'clock. There was the attorney on the other side arguing. He was a big celebrated attorney from a big city. Indeed, he was from the city of Chicago, while I lived then, and still do, in a village of only 1,200 people. He was arguing to the court. Finally he got through, and I said to the court, "Your Honor, I had supposed that you would not open court until 1 o'clock." The judge replied, "Mr. Gilchrist, I want to catch the Illinois Central train at 4 o'clock; consequently, I gave the attorney on the other side a chance to come back here at 12:30 o'clock. Now, if you will be very brief, I do not think the court will change its opinion." That was an experience that a young attorney at the bar trying his first equity suit will always remember.

Mr. Chairman, it is not necessary to take time in arguing this bill. I grant all that the chairman has said about the Farm Credit Administration. It has accomplished great good. But, Mr. Chairman, it has not been adequate to accomplish the full measure of good for which we have hoped.

This bill is rather technical and involved in many respects, and I will not take the time of this Committee to try to explain it. Indeed, I would have to leave that to better hands. The facts are that the farmers of my State are still in submergence. Of course, farm prices have risen and commodity prices have risen, but they have not risen to the extent which other prices under the N. R. A. have risen; so that we are still in submergence, and every farmer in attempting to pay his debts will find that he has from 15 to 20 percent of a differential against him when he comes to market his product.

The committee is about to offer an amendment, and I understand that I may say a few words at that time about the amendment, so I will not speak on it now, except to say that we on the Agricultural Committee want to join hands with everybody else in the United States in seeking recovery for all who are in distress. If the cotton farmers of the South need help, we want to help them. If the tobacco growers need help, we want to help them. If those in the textile industry need help—and I understand they do—we ought to be able to see to it that every one of those workers up there get a full wage so that he can support his family in a modern twentieth-century, religious, God-fearing civilization. This is what I want to do, as a farmer, representing the corn fields of Iowa.

Now here is an opportunity to join hands with the manufacturers, with the farmers of other sections, and bring back a measure of prosperity to the whole country. Foreclosures in Iowa are increasing instead of decreasing, Mr. Chairman. It is shown that in 1934 in my State foreclosures were again rising. Of course there was a decadence of foreclosures for a while, but that was because of the moratorium which our legislature had passed and which the Supreme Court of the United States in the Minnesota case held to be within the limits of constitutional action.

Mr. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILCHRIST. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. ANDRESEN. Has the gentleman received any criticisms from applicants for loans on farms with respect to the attitude of the Federal land bank in not approving large enough commitments in order to refinance a mortgage?

Mr. GILCHRIST. I may say to my friend from Minnesota that that is a common experience, I think, with all Congressmen. Many of our constituents find fault and offer some criticism of the land banks, saying that the land banks have not been able to give them a sufficient loan and also saying that they have not been able to scale down their loans so as to bring them within the boundaries of the loans which the land bank has prescribed. Yes; we have found that criticism; but let me say to the gentleman that we must look at the other side of it. The Federal land bank must see to it in all cases that its loan is a safe one.

Mr. ANDRESEN. But is it not a matter of fact that Congress, in order to meet this criticism, extended Commissioner's loans up to a maximum amount of $7,500 so that the Federal land bank and the Commissioner could be more liberal in order to save the farmers of the country?

Mr. GILCHRIST. The gentleman is quite right; and that is one of the purposes of this bill, namely, to devote more money to the Commissioner, so that he can continue these loans. As I understand it he has no further funds, and his right to make these loans has now expired, or will expire on next Sunday, and for that reason we have been trying to hasten the passage of this bill. You will recall that the bill was introduced in this Congress and reported with the committee's approval on February 7, which is more than 3 months ago, and some of us have been trying during all this time to bring the bill to a vote.

Mr. ANDRESEN. I am bringing this out for the purpose of showing that the Committee on Agriculture wants the Federal land bank to be as liberal as possible, with safety, in taking care of the distressed farmers who need loans at this time.

Mr. GILCHRIST. The gentleman is absolutely correct; yes, that is true.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILCHRIST. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. McFARLANE. I am interested in that story of the gentleman. Can the gentleman tell us how that lawsuit was finally determined?

Mr. GILCHRIST. It was the first case I ever tried in equity, and you may be assured that I was very careful to see to it that the judge caught his train at 4 o'clock that afternoon, and this will give you a clue as to how he decided it. That Chicago lawyer did not carry any bacon back with him to Porkopolis.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILCHRIST. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. If the bill that is now before the House is enacted into law, will it benefit the farmers?

Mr. GILCHRIST. Yes; I think it will be of great benefit to the farmers of the entire country and especially the amendment which is about to be offered by the committee. There is no doubt about it.

Mr. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. GILCHRIST. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ANDRESEN. The gentleman from California a few moments ago propounded an inquiry of the Chairman in regard to loans on small farms. After that question was propounded I went to the telephone and called up the Farm Administration officials and found that the Federal land bank and the Commissioner will make loans on poultry farms and small farms, even though they contain only 2 or 3 acres.

Mr. MITCHELL of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILCHRIST. I yield.

Mr. MITCHELL of Tennessee. I want to make this observation to my colleague, for whom I have a very high regard; serving with him on this committee, I know he is interested in the farmer and in the farmer's welfare, and I would like to ask him if in his State it is not a fact that practically all farm commodities have gone up in price in the last few months.

Mr. GILCHRIST. I agree that they have, yes; but I think the latest figures will show that notwithstanding the increase in the price of farm commodities, the farmer is still at a disadvantage when going into the market to buy goods.

Mr. MITCHELL of Tennessee. He was involved, of course, when this situation came on and, as a matter of fact, the increase in the price of his commodities, corn and livestock, has had a tendency to improve the value of his real estate.

Mr. GILCHRIST. That is very true; and I think that is one reason why there has been an increase of foreclosures lately. In my particular district we had a good crop of corn, and on account of the fact that no one else had a crop of corn, the price of corn has gone high, so that in northern Iowa the farmers have had a fairly good income during the last year.

Mr. THURSTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILCHRIST. I yield to my friend from Iowa.

Mr. THURSTON. What rate of interest do you propose to offer here in the amendment that is being discussed?

Mr. GILCHRIST. The committee amendment fixes the rate at 3½ percent for the first year following July 1, and then it fixes the rate at 4 percent for each of the next 2 years. The amendment is limited to 3 years, because under the present set-up or law the 4½-percent rate only extends to July 1, 1938. So we cannot handle it beyond July 1, 1938.

Mr. THURSTON. They have been making loans to the Shipping Board and the merchant marine at 1½- and 2-percent interest.

Mr. GILCHRIST. I thank the gentleman for his observation, and in some cases they are granting subsidies.

Mr. JONES. I understand this is as low a rate of interest as is granted.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Yes; outside of some subsidies. There are some drainage districts that do not pay any interest at all, and subsidies have been granted to other interests.

Mr. PIERCE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILCHRIST. I yield to my friend, the Governor of Oregon.

Mr. PIERCE. In answer to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDRESEN], I have been informed that the Department has set up a bureau or a committee or somebody at the head of it to adjust between the small-farm loans and the home-owner loans. When the home loans are in operation, there will be an adjuster, who will decide whether the applicant has a home and can come in under the Home Loan Act or whether he can come in under the Farm Loan Act. They will make a loan on a chicken ranch or a small potato farm, and they will not be turned down as they have been heretofore.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Thank you, Governor. We want to see cheap loans made to all farmers and home owners. I am in sympathy with the boys from the cities, Chicago and New York, and I appreciate the way they have helped agriculture. If there is one class on earth that needs help, it is the farmers of this country and the home owners in the towns and cities. I want to go along with them and join hands with them in putting the homes of this country on a basis of safety and security.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. DOXEY].

Mr. DOXEY. Mr. Chairman, I deem it a happy privilege to follow my friend, my distinguished colleague from Iowa. It is not my purpose to take very much time on this matter. This bill we are considering is complex and technical, but in this, as in most important legislation, our committee is entirely in agreement. We try to obtain results by working in committee and there adjusting any differences we might have.

I join with my distinguished friend in the appreciation of what you men who do not represent agriculture have done and the manner in which you have cooperated with us in bringing about benefits to the agriculturists of the country at large. Our committee could never have put over this program without your help.

I, as a member of the Committee on Agriculture, take this opportunity to express my appreciation to all and to say that everyone on the committee has cooperated and worked together, and I thank you for your cooperation and feel grateful, as I am sure we all do, for the leadership of our distinguished chairman.

I want to say this: That this agricultural financial structure that we have given to this Congress to aid distressed agriculture has not only borne fruit, but, as the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDRESEN] says, we want it to become a broader and more effective instrumentality in giving agriculture the lowest rate of interest possible, and in all respects to compare favorably with other interests that are receiving benefits throughout the country under the broad program of this administration.

We are going to pass this bill, Mr. Chairman. There is no great amount of opposition to it, because it is something that is right and proper.

I am going to ask that I have the privilege of setting out the amendment which my committee is going to propose, and I am sure there will be no serious opposition to it. We worked hard on this amendment and our committee has agreed upon it, and I feel sure you will agree with us who have given it serious thought and study.

The amendment that will be proposed when this bill is read under the 5-minute rule is the best that our Committee on Agriculture could agree on, and it represents a compromise of our different views as to interest rates.

The amendment is as follows:

Amend section 3 of bill H. R. 5440 by striking out all after the section number and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(a) Effective July 1, 1935, the first sentence of paragraph 'Twelfth' of section 12 of the Federal Farm Loan Act, as amended, is amended by striking out the following: 'within 2 years after such date shall not exceed 4½ percent per annum for all interest payable on installment dates occurring within a period of 5 years commencing 60 days after the date this paragraph takes effect; and no payment of the principal portion of any installment of any such loan shall be required during such 5-year period if the borrower shall not be in default with respect to any other condition or covenant of his mortgage', and inserting in lieu thereof the following: 'after such date shall not exceed 3½ percent per annum for all interest payable on installment dates occurring within a period of 1 year commencing July 1, 1935, and shall not exceed 4 percent per annum for all interest payable on installment dates occurring within a period of 2 years commencing July 1, 1936; and no payment of the principal portion of any installment of any such loan outstanding on the date of the enactment of the Farm Credit Act of 1935 shall be required prior to July 11, 1938, if the borrower shall not be in default with respect to any other condition or covenant of his mortgage.'

"(b) Effective July 1, 1935, the second sentence of such paragraph 'Twelfth' is amended by striking out the following: 'the rate of interest on such loans for such 5-year period shall be 5 percent in lieu of 4½ percent', and inserting in lieu thereof: 'the rates of interest paid for the respective periods above specified shall be one-half of 1 percent per annum in excess of the rates of interest paid during the corresponding periods by borrowers on mortgage loans made through national farm-loan associations.'"

This particular bill that we are now considering (H. R. 5440) together with the amendment I have just referred to, which was worked out and agreed to by my committee, is, in my judgment, about all the legislation pertaining to the refinancing of agricultural indebtedness that we will be able to enact at this session of Congress, and this amendment will, in my judgment, be of great benefit to the farmer who is in need of financial aid.

Mr. WEARIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOXEY. Yes.

Mr. WEARIN. I ask the gentleman why this rate of 3½ percent interest cannot be left at that particular amount, without setting a definite time at which it must terminate.

Mr. DOXEY. This we might concede for the sake of the present legislation, because we have to get it through today, on account of the time limit expiring tomorrow in the general set-up. One might say that this is just a temporary matter, and we are hoping at some time, at a later date, to take up the matter and provide some permanent financial structure that may dovetail and take care of that situation.

Mr. WEARIN. The reason I asked the question is because I presume the gentleman is familiar with the fact that the United States Shipping Board is following a continuing policy of loaning at 3½ percent, and a proposal now before the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee is to establish construction loans at 3½ percent. I would like to know why the farm mortgages at 3½ percent should terminate at a certain time, especially when we do not know but that money rates will be cheaper next year or 2 years from now than at the present time.

Mr. DOXEY. I appreciate what the gentleman, Mr. WEARIN, from Iowa, says.

No committee has worked harder to get the lowest possible rate of interest for the farmer than has our committee. There are a number of bills pending before our committee carrying out this general thought. I introduced a bill providing for a lower rate of interest on Government loans to farmers, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture, but we have not as yet had time to consider it. I hope some day to see it or the principles therein set forth become a law. My bill is as follows:

[H. R. 7523, 74th Cong., 1st sess.]

A bill to reduce interest rates on mortgage loans made by Federal land banks and by the Land Bank Commissioner, and on loans made by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to drainage and similar districts

Be it enacted, etc., That paragraph twelfth of section 12 of the Federal Farm Loan Act, as amended (U. S. C., Supp. VII, title 12, sec. 771), is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "Notwithstanding the foregoing provisions of this paragraph, the rate of interest on loans on mortgage to which this paragraph applies made through national farm-loan associations or through agents or purchased from joint-stock land banks shall not exceed 3 percent in lieu of 4½ percent, and, if made through branches, the rate of interest shall not exceed 3½ percent in lieu of 5 percent, for all installments to which this paragraph applies, the dates of which occur after 60 days after this amendatory sentence takes effect."

Sec. 2. Section 32 of the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act of 1933, as amended (U. S. C., Supp. VII, title 12, sec. 1016), is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "Notwithstanding the foregoing provisions of this section, the rate of interest on first and second mortgage loans made by the Land Bank Commissioner shall be 3 percent in lieu of 5 percent for all installment dates which occur after 60 days after this amendatory sentence takes effect."

SEC. 3. Section 36 of the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act of 1933, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "The rates of interest on all loans made under this section to or for the benefit of drainage districts, levee districts, levee and drainage districts, irrigation districts, and similar districts, mutual nonprofit companies, and incorporated water users' associations duly organized under the laws of any State, and to or for the benefit of political subdivisions of States, which prior to May 12, 1933, had completed projects devoted chiefly to the improvement of lands for agricultural purposes shall not exceed 3 percent, in lieu of the interest rates provided in such loans, for all installment dates which occur after 60 days after this amendatory sentence takes effect."

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOXEY. Yes.

Mr. McFARLANE. I am interested in the policy being pursued in my district in Texas by the Farm Board in making loans. It might be said that they have just about quit. I do not know how it is in other districts, or in other sections of the country. I am wondering if there is not some way that we could get the farm land bank down there and their organization to go back to functioning, so that the farmer can get the relief we thought we were getting him here.

Mr. DOXEY. That is a matter of administration; but if they look to the intent of Congress, I am sure that they will function, and function immediately, as well as properly.

Mr. McFARLANE. They have not done that.

Mr. DOXEY. Perhaps this legislation will help; but if it does not, and the gentleman from Texas can suggest any legislation that will, we will go along with him.

Mr. LUCKEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOXEY. I yield, gladly.

Mr. LUCKEY. Mr. Chairman, I am interested in the gentleman's statement that the farmers are getting money at a lower rate than any other organization. As I understand it, the shipping interests receive money at 1 percent or less than 1 percent on a 20-year basis—one-eighth of 1 percent.

Mr. DOXEY. That is under a law passed several years ago—a subsidy. I was speaking about the situation under this emergency program. The shipping subsidy was passed under another administration. It was not so much in the nature of a loan but, you might say, an outright subsidy.

My colleagues, under the circumstances, I feel I have consumed enough time, as I know we are all anxious to read the bill under the rule and vote on it as speedily as possible. I thank you. [Applause.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TRUAX] such time as he may desire.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Chairman, when the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GILCHRIST] was reminiscing, he recalled some memories of my own. I assure the committee that this bill, which we will vote for today, together with other farm legislation, is the beginning of the culmination of practically 10 years' fight for a better agriculture. Back in 1926, I think it was, I had lunch—in Des Moines they called it lunch, and we call it dinner in Ohio—with the Governor of Iowa, Hon. John Hammill, and Frank Warner, secretary of the Iowa Bankers' Association. These gentlemen told me on that day that 200 banks had been closed in the great State of Iowa, and they said on that day if the deflation policy for agriculture that was being carried out, dictated by the Federal Reserve Board, continued for another year, 200 more banks would fail in the State of Iowa in the coming year. That prediction came true. That deflation policy was carried on and more than 400 banks failed in the great farming State of Iowa in that short period. That was the beginning of the creeping farm paralysis that later engulfed and enmeshed in its tentacles every agricultural State in this Union. I am proud and happy to state today that I can vote for this bill, which is a virtual fulfillment of the Wheeler amendment. I hope to have the pleasure of voting for the bill of our distinguished chairman, a bill that provides for $2,000,000 more additional funds for farmers that can be loaned at 2 percent, and I hope to have the pleasure of voting for the bill of our friend from North Dakota [Mr. LEMKE], the Frazier-Lemke refinancing bill, that will provide for $3,000,000,000 additional funds at 1½-percent interest. Then, when we enact into law both the bills that have been reported by the Committee on Agriculture, we shall begin to finish the job. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I refer again to the hundreds of bank closings in the State of Iowa in 1926, 1927, and 1928. These bank failures, as I mentioned before, were superinduced by the drastic deflation of selling prices of agricultural commodities and by the vicious deflation or liquidation of farm loans ordered by the Federal Reserve Board.

In 1928 I was nominated by the Democratic Party in Ohio for United States Senator. Shortly before the primary campaign opened, a friend of mine sent me a copy of an Iowa newspaper, the Des Moines Register, which contained some 30 pages of foreclosures and forced sales of farm real estate. You will recall the campaign was in 1928. In practically every speech that I made I held this newspaper before the audience, pointed out that this was what had happened in Iowa, and this would be exactly what would happen in Ohio unless heroic and immediate measures were adopted to effectively stop this ruinous deflation of agricultural commodity prices and farm loans. At this time little attention was paid to my utterances, my predictions, and prophecies. It was not long, however, until it became unnecessary for me to use the Des Moines Register. Soon foreclosures and forced sales of farm property in Ohio became so numerous that they were common on every hand, in every community, in every locality. Shortly thereafter the banks in Ohio began to fail and topple, finally resulting in the worst saturation of bank closings our State had ever known.

I quoted then, as I quote again today, those prophetic, even though trite, words of the old Chinese philosopher, Confucius, who 5,000 years ago said this:

The well-being of a people is like a tree. Agriculture is its root; manufacturing, commerce, and labor its branches and its life. When the root is injured, the leaves begin to fall and the tree dies.

To me it is most gratifying, indeed, to observe the unanimity of opinion, the harmony of purpose, apparent to all in the House of Representatives today in a concerted effort and drive to secure lower interest rates for the men and women who feed and clothe us all.

Mr. Chairman, there is no good reason why a single farm should be foreclosed today. While it is true that the amount of funds already made available is not sufficient to refinance all farmers in distress, nor will the enactment of the two bills I have just mentioned provide enough funds to refinance all farms that are now mortgaged, it is likewise true that there is a remedy which is effective and just. That remedy lies in the hands of this Congress itself. That remedy if enacted into law would immediately cause a complete cessation of all foreclosures. That remedy is the bill that I introduced in the Seventy-fourth Congress on January 10, providing for a full and complete moratorium against foreclosures on all real estate. At this point I am inserting that bill, H. R. 3650, for your attention and consideration:

A bill to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto, approved March 3, 1933; to restore confidence and prevent confiscation of homes and farms by money lenders by providing for a suspension of real-estate foreclosures for a period of 5 years

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of July 1, 1898, entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", as amended by the acts of February 5, 1903, June 15, 1906, June 25, 1910, March 2, 1917, January 7, 1922, May 27, 1926, February 11, 1932, and March 3, 1933, be, and it is hereby, amended by adding thereto an amendment to chapter VIII, section 75, by adding thereto subsection S, to read as follows:

"BANKRUPTCY—STAY OF PROCEEDINGS

"SECTION 1. If on or within 5 years after the day this act takes effect any farmer or home owner or owner of real property occupied by such owner is unable to pay, and is in default in the payment of, either principal or interest of any debt secured by a mortgage on such farm or real property, or of taxes the nonpayment of which constitutes a default under such mortgage, such default shall constitute an act of bankruptcy, and such farmer or owner of real property being therefore unable to pay his or her debts as they fall due shall be deemed insolvent and a bankrupt for the purpose of this title.

"SEC. 2. No proceeding to foreclose or otherwise to enforce any claim against or out of the farm, home, or real property of such bankrupt and no sale on foreclosure, execution, or otherwise shall be instituted, further prosecuted, held, or made on or within 5 years after the day this act takes effect except upon petition in bankruptcy duly filed in a court of the United States pursuant to the act of July 1, 1898, entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States', as heretofore amended."

No other remedy to stop foreclosure can be used. No other remedy to break once and for all the strangling cord of the money lenders, ever tightening about the throats of distressed farmers and home owners, will ever be found. This measure is practical, it is just and humane, it is workable, because Congress itself has plenary powers over the National Bankruptcy Act. Under the provisions of my bill many farmers, landowners, or home owners who are unable to pay their taxes, who are delinquent in the interest on their mortgages, who cannot pay a portion of the principal, which under the terms of the contract constitutes a default thereon, is given a 5-year moratorium and is protected against further proceedings that would ultimately result in the loss of the farm or home.

True it is that we now have the Frazier-Lemke Bankruptcy Act, which was enacted into law on the last day of the Seventy-third Congress. To be exact, this bill was enacted into law on June 15, 1934. It was enacted into law on that day because of a point of order I made of no quorum, which disclosed the fact that there was not a quorum in the Capital City of Washington. For some unnamed and unknown, yet sinister, reasons the Frazier-Lemke Bankruptcy Act had been held up in conference. We were told that the bill had been lost by the conferees and that it could not be considered before Congress adjourned. It was at that historic point that I made my point of no quorum, and only withdrew that point of order that a quorum was not present upon the assurances and promises of the then Speaker of the House and the majority floor leader. Upon receipt of these assurances and pledges I withdrew my point of no quorum. The House resumed its session, and within less than an hour the Frazier-Lemke bankruptcy bill was enacted into law by the House of Representatives and the Senate of the United States.

There followed a period of tense waiting by the farmers of America, lasting practically 1 week, during which President Roosevelt was besieged and bombarded by certain insurance companies, bankers, and other money lenders to veto the bill. Partly through my efforts and the efforts of other known friends of the farmer in the House of Representatives and certain distinguished farm leaders, the President turned a deaf ear to these parasitical and blood-sucking money lenders and signed the bill, thus conferring untold blessings on stricken farmers. It is most regrettable indeed, to relate, however, that many judges, many attorneys at law, have been wholly unsympathetic to the provisions of this magna charta for agriculture, have used every effort at their command to nullify the provisions of this bill and to continue to steal farms in thousands of cases. At the present moment certain clarifying amendments are being favorably considered by the Committee on the Judiciary, and I sincerely hope and trust that these amendments will have been enacted into law before this Congress adjourns so that distressed farmers will have all the protection that was implied in that bill.

As most farmers know, the Frazier-Lemke bankruptcy bill proposed to refinance mortgaged farms to the extent of $3,000,000,000. It further proposes to scale down the mortgage debt to its actual value today. It proposes to eliminate by that method that portion of the debt which should have been wiped off the books long ago, that portion of the debt which was due to the mortgage value placed upon the farm during the period of the greatest credit inflation the country has ever known. That period of agricultural history in our country when it took $2 to buy a bushel of wheat—that deplorable period in American agriculture when the farmers were asked and expected to liquidate that debt with wheat that was worth only 50 and 75 cents a bushel—that period in which the toiling farmers were expected to pay in full for these dead horses of intolerable mortgages forced upon them in this super credit inflation era.

Not only will the farmers be benefited through this provision of the Frazier-Lemke refinance bill, but they will be immensely benefited by having to pay a rate of interest amounting to only 1½ percent annually. Compare this interest rate of 1½ percent with an exorbitant rate of 6, 7, 8 percent, and in the cases of the chattel-loan sharks a murderous rate of 36 percent, and you have a fair idea of the beneficent provisions of this bill. Add to that the provision that permits the farmer to pay 1½ percent each year upon the amortization of his loan so that eventually he will have the farm entirely paid for, then you will have a further glimpse into the certain prosperity and happiness guaranteed to the tillers of the soil by this bill.

It would be most ungracious and unfair for me to conclude these remarks without a further reference to the bill introduced by our able Chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, Hon. MARVIN JONES. The bill I refer to is H. R. 7593. Under the provisions of this bill the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to issue non-interest-bearing bank notes to the extent of $2,000,000,000, which will be available to refinance farm mortgages at 2-percent interest. The bill provides that the first $5,000 of any farm loan held by the Government will be refinanced under its provisions at 2-percent interest. So that there can be no cry from the bankers and money lenders that this will be fiat money, that it will be printing-press money, that it will be greenback money, the bill further provides that $800,000,000 of the gold now held in the vaults of the Federal Treasury will be set aside as collateral or backing for this issue of currency.

Farmers will readily understand that the $3,000,000,000 additional funds through the enactment of the Frazier-Lemke bill and with the $2,000,000,000 more funds through the enactment of the Jones bill there would be a total of $5,000,000,000 additional funds, which in itself would probably be ample and sufficient to refinance every farm in the United States today, not only those who are in actual distress but those who are entitled to lower rates of interest.

While I have not lost faith in the ultimate passage of the Frazier-Lemke refinance bill, while I am doing everything in my power to bring about the enactment of this bill, including the securing of additional signatures necessary to raise the required 218 signers so that the Rules Committee will be discharged from further consideration of the rule necessary before this bill can be considered and voted on by the House, yet I for one am willing to get whatever else we can in the meantime that promises better finance and lower rates of interest for the farmers affected.

I urge every farmer, every friend of the farmer, every business man, every working man, every soldier, who in the final analysis are just as much interested in the farmer's welfare as any one of us, that he use every effort at his command to urge first the enactment of my moratorium bill, then the enactment of the Frazier-Lemke bill, then the Jones bill, then, and then only, can these real knights of nature's nobility, those who produce the food we eat and the raw materials for the clothing we wear be guaranteed that never again in this generation or the next will they be threatened, harassed, and crucified by the damnable money lenders and shylocks. [Applause.]

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, I want to take occasion at this time to join in what the chairman of the committee has said with regard to the excellent administration we have had of the Farm Credit Act. I think it is due to Governor Myers and those who have been associated with him in the Farm Credit Administration to say that they have performed a splendid piece of work.

I know of no opposition to this bill, and I realize that Members are anxious to vote; however, while I am on my feet I want to take occasion to call attention to the fact that the Farm Credit Administration is not only an agency for making farm loans, but that it consists of a complete credit set-up for agriculture. Through production credit corporations and the local production credit associations it has set up Nation-wide agencies for making loans upon livestock and chattels at lower rates of interest than farmers have ever been able to enjoy before.

The cooperative bank system is functioning effectively and making loans at very reasonable rates of interest to cooperatives.

Many of the features of this bill are technical and relate purely to administrative details, but there are two or three matters to which I desire to call attention briefly, one of them being the fact that this measure makes available additional funds for Commissioner loans. We have heretofore set aside $600,000,000 out of the total authorization of $2,200,000,000 for Commissioner loans. This sum has been exhausted, the limit of $600,000,000 has now been removed, and whatever funds remain in the $2,200,000,000 which were authorized are now made available for the purpose of making these loans. These are the real distress loans, because they can be made up to 75 percent of the appraised value of the property.

The measure also liberalizes the provisions of those loans and permits them to be made for every purpose for which Federal land-bank loans may be made.

It further extends the time within which such loans may be made to February 1, 1940. In addition it permits these loans to be made for a longer period of time in some cases than has been possible heretofore.

In addition to these more liberal features in the case of real-estate loans, I want to call attention to the fact that the authority of the Farm Credit Administration and the cooperative banks to make loans to cooperatives is extended so that they may now make facility loans to cooperatives which sell to farmers as well as to cooperatives which sell farm products. Furthermore, they may make loans to cooperative associations furnishing farm business services, such as farmers' mutual insurance companies.

Mr. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOPE. I yield.

Mr. ANDRESEN. How far can the Farm Credit Administration go in making loans to cooperatives which deal with their associates? Could they make loans for the purpose of starting stores so that the stores could engage in general-merchandise business and sell their products to members of the local cooperative associations?

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 2 additional minutes.

Under the present law loans for working capital can be made to associations which deal in farm supplies such as farm machinery, fertilizer, and other commodities which are used strictly for farming purposes. They cannot be made to enable associations to engage in the general-merchandise business. This legislation does not enlarge any upon the previous law in that regard, except that it authorizes loans for physical facilities as well as for working capital.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOPE. I yield.

Mr. DONDERO. I understand this bill reduces the interest rate on mortgages to farmers. Is that a fact?

Mr. HOPE. The bill which we now have under consideration does not reduce the interest rate, but a committee amendment will be offered which will provide that in the case of all Federal land-bank loans the interest rate, beginning next July 1 and for the year following, shall be 3½ percent, and that for the next 2 years it shall be 4 percent. This is a reduction from the 4½-percent rate which is in effect now.

Mr. DONDERO. I am in sympathy with that; but will it apply to loans heretofore made? In other words, will those who have borrowed before the passage of this act be able to take advantage of the reduced interest rate on July 1?

Mr. HOPE. It will apply to all Federal land-bank loans in force at this time.

Mr. DONDERO. And to new loans to be made hereafter?

Mr. HOPE. Yes. May I say also that new loans which are now being made bear an interest rate of 4¼ percent for the life of the loan, the lowest ever made by the Federal land banks.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOPE. I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. When the bill to which the gentleman from Ohio referred, introduced by the chairman, becomes law, and when the Frazier-Lemke bill becomes law, what effect will those bills have upon this statute?

Mr. HOPE. I have wondered about that myself, but would rather have the question answered by some of the gentlemen who are more familiar with those measures than I.

Mr. MICHENER. Whom would the gentleman suggest?

Mr. HOPE. The gentleman himself is an authority on the Frazier-Lemke bill and I would be very glad to have him answer his own question.

Mr. MICHENER. I am looking for light.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 1 additional minute.

Mr. SCHNEIDER. Just how can the farmer get the benefit?

Mr. HOPE. It is automatic. He does not have to do anything.

Mr. SCHNEIDER. It is automatic?

Mr. HOPE. Yes. If this measure becomes a law, the new rate will go in effect on all outstanding mortgages on July 1 next.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOPE. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. The difference in the interest rate which the present contracts carry and the rate established by this bill is payable out of the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. HOPE. Yes. Whatever deficit there is will be payable out of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Although payable out of the United States Treasury it is payable out of the profit which is earned by reason of the fact that the banks are now lending the money at a higher rate of interest than paid on the bonds?

Mr. HOPE. In the long run it is hoped the lower rates of interest now prevailing will enable the Farm Credit Administration to refund its bonds at a rate which will reduce the drain on the Treasury to a minimum or eliminate it altogether.

Mr. Chairman, there are many other features of this bill which are of interest to all of us representing agricultural districts. All of them, however, are explained in the committee report and I shall not take further time to discuss them here.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I understand that the Treasury has refinanced all the 4½-, 4-, and 5-percent bonds, or practically all of them, on a 3-percent basis, and that the Chairman of the Agricultural Committee is going to offer an amendment which will reduce the rate of interest on the mortgages now outstanding to 3½ percent for the year beginning July 1, 1935, and not to exceed 4 percent for 2 following years.

Frankly I think this margin of a half of 1 percent for the first year and 1 percent thereafter is sufficient to cover the expense of the overhead, and I believe it is only fair to the farmers who are borrowing money at this time that this be done. I wish to compliment the committee upon the attitude they have taken in this respect. [Applause.]

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAWFORD].

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, I shall not take up much of the committee's time, because most of the points I have in mind have been answered, but I would like to ask the able Chairman of the Agricultural Committee two or three questions which will give some information which I desire very much. Does this bill provide in any way for private corporations operating farms to receive loans?

Mr. JONES. No. There is a limiting provision of that kind in the Senate bill. There is nothing of that character in this bill.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Does the law as it now stands cover that matter?

Mr. JONES. No; it does not permit the lending to corporate organizations.

Mr. CRAWFORD. To any extent?

Mr. JONES. No; I may state that, in fairness to the Senate amendment, it is so restricted that practically all of the stockholders would have to be active farmers.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I should also like to ask if the production-credit corporation or any other of the lending agencies mentioned in any part of this legislation will be in position to lend money to farm cooperatives for the purpose of building plants in which to process farm goods, such as creameries, cheese factories, kraut factories, and facilities of that kind?

Mr. JONES. They may, as a matter of fact, obtain loans at the present time for physical facilities. This broadens that feature so that a loan for any operating purposes may be obtained. The gentleman understands they do not have the privilege of borrowing Government funds. They simply have the privilege, which all other financial organizations have, of rediscounting their paper with the intermediate credit banks which sell their debentures in the open market. They may also borrow through the cooperative banks. Government funds are not involved. We made a special provision last year or the year before for the Government guaranty of principal and interest on land-bank bonds, or rather Farm Mortgage Corporation bonds, but this was for the land-bank and Commissioner's loans. These amendments enable the cooperatives to obtain their funds on a rediscount basis in the regular commercial market.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Then, to be a little more specific, and in order to clear this point up, on page 5 of the report wherein section 9 is discussed, it is stated.

Will broaden the present authority to include the making of loans for physical facilities for all cooperative business purposes.

Mr. JONES. Yes. In other words, they are simply limited to physical facilities for all cooperative purposes. They may make these loans through the intermediate-credit banks. That is, if they have paper that can justify a sound loan and such as will meet the requirements of the intermediate banks. Then they have the privilege of making loans through the cooperative banks.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Is that limited to 60 percent of the appraised value, as set forth on page 8 of the bill, lines 14 to 16, or would that have anything to do with the subject matter we are discussing?

Mr. JONES. Insofar as the physical facilities are concerned it is so limited.

Mr. CRAWFORD. That gives me the information which I desired, and I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to express my personal thanks to the members of the committee who have worked so diligently with these correcting and perfecting amendments to the acts affected. It is of course very difficult to include within amendments of this nature all of the benefits which some feel should be included. I regret that some provision has not been made to the end that corporate farming might be assisted in one way or another. I appreciate the arguments that are advanced against lending financial assistance to this type of farming, and know that some feel it would operate against the man who owns and operates a farm as an individual. However, there are some types of farming, especially in the livestock industry and in fruit farming, which is now and has for many years been operated along corporate lines, and it is not fair to say to this branch of American farming that it shall not be eligible for financial assistance under the acts here dealt with. It should be remembered that in many cases the stockholders of these corporations operating farms live on the land and make it their primary activity. Can it be said these citizens should be deprived of this benefit simply because they operate under a corporate form while those who, in thousands of cases live in the city, have other lines of activity, yet own a farm which is operated by a share-cropper or tenant and still can obtain full consideration under the acts we are now considering?

Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to be misunderstood. I am not here pleading for the enactment of an amendment which will bring about the formation of land-holding corporations which will acquire the land from individual farmers, thus depriving them of their personal ownership and individual proprietorship. We have been guilty of a policy of that kind in Puerto Rico since the American flag was carried to that island. It is a disgraceful page in our insular-possession policy and relationship. Such a program takes the individual farmers from their land, places them on a seasonal pay roll (for only part of the year), leaving them to get along as best they can during the balance of the year. Such a program reduces the farm worker to sheer peonage or to the state of a serf. Such a program is un-American whether it be in Puerto Rico or on the mainland of continental United States.

However, by a restricted amendment we could easily care for those who have been operating their farms and ranches on a corporate basis, and preclude those who might desire to enter into such an undertaking subsequent to the passage of this act. It is one thing to give our citizens equal protection, to keep away from rank class legislation in the extension of credit in this manner, and it is another thing to pass a law which would encourage the development of a program or policy that would be highly destructive to our farming people and communities. I am in favor of legislation which does not discriminate and which will help bring all of our farming population on a par with organized industry, and I wish to say that I am opposed to legislation which sets into operation forces which affect adversely those of our people who are engaged in agriculture.

Mr. Chairman, just one other thought with reference to these amendments. I now refer to the interest rate which the governmental agencies dealing with farm credits now charge on these farm loans. It has been stated that throughout this land there are small and large banks bulging with deposits and credits standing in the name of our people. The balance sheets of the banking institutions speak for themselves. There is a supply of credit available which staggers the mind that attempts to comprehend its powers. Billions of dollars are seeking investment on a profitable basis. At the same time the interest burden of the American farmer is too great for him to carry at this time. The rate of interest he is having to pay with this great supply of money looking for investment is entirely out of line and cannot be justified. If our Government is to operate under a banking system which forces in a way our banks to take the deposits made therein by our people and finance governmental activities on a basis which enables the Government to borrow this money at from 1½ to 2½ percent per annum, then I, for one, contend these interest rates on farm loans should be reduced to a much lower rate than we are here considering.

If any preference is to be made, let it go to the agricultural workers and owners, to the end they will be able to meet their obligations, get rid of the interest and principal, and thus place themselves on a higher purchasing level, to the further end they may purchase the goods of our industrial workers. It is my opinion that we have passed through the high interest period of our national life. I do not believe that we shall soon see money able to command the high wages for its use it has heretofore commanded. I believe that many millions of our people will, from now on for several years to come, be perfectly willing to invest their savings in securities that are sound on a basis that will yield from 1½ percent up to 3 percent per annum. There are no reasons in sight why farmers should have to pay from 4 percent up to 8 percent per annum for the use of money, whether it be borrowed through Federal agencies or in some other manner. It is not good that we should charge farmers such a high rate when call loans for speculation and other purposes can be obtained at rates from one-half percent up to 2 percent. The farmers of our country are not so organized that they can work out these problems. The solution must be solved very largely by the Congress taking the lead and through the full cooperation of the Congress and other agencies of the Government. We have the power to do this, and with that power the responsibility comes to us.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sec. 2. (a) Section 32 of the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act of 1933, as amended (U. S. C., Supp. VII, title 12, sec. 1016), is further amended by striking out of the third sentence the following: "and made for the purpose of reducing and refinancing an existing mortgage."

(b) Such section 32, as amended, is further amended by striking out the fifth sentence and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "Loans may be made under this section for any of the purposes for which Federal land banks are authorized by law to make loans, and for the following additional purpose, and none other: Refinancing, either in connection with proceedings under chapter VIII of the Bankruptcy Act of July 1, 1898, as amended, or otherwise, any indebtedness, secured or unsecured, of the farmer, or which is secured by a lien on all or any part of the farm property accepted as security for the loan."

(c) Such section 32, as amended, is further amended by striking out the seventh sentence and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "As used in this section, the term 'farmer' means any individual who is at the time, or shortly to become, bona fide engaged in farming operations, either personally or through an agent or tenant, or the principal part of whose income is derived from farming operations, and includes a personal representative of a deceased farmer."

(d) Such section 32, as amended, is further amended by striking out the eighth and ninth sentences and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "Until February 1, 1940, the Land Bank Commissioner shall, in his name, make loans under this section on behalf of the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation, and may make such loans in cash or in bonds of the Corporation, or if acceptable to the borrower, in consolidated farm-loan bonds; but no such loans shall be made by him after February 1, 1940, except for the purpose of refinancing loans previously made by him under this section. As much as may be necessary of the assets of the Corporation, including the bonds (and proceeds thereof) issued under section 4 of the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation Act, may be used for the purposes of this section."

(e) Such section 32, as amended, is further amended by inserting at the end thereof the following: "Any Federal land bank, when duly authorized by the Land Bank Commissioner and the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation, shall have the power to execute any instrument relating to any mortgage taken to secure a loan made or to be made under this section, or relating to any property included in any such mortgage, or relating to any property acquired by the Land Bank Commissioner and/or the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation. Any such instrument heretofore or hereafter executed on behalf of the Land Bank Commissioner and/or the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation by a Federal land bank, through its duly authorized officers, shall be conclusively presumed to have been duly authorized by the Land Bank Commissioner and the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation."

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, my good friend, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GILCHRIST], gave evidence of the fine cheer that exists on both sides of the aisle here, and then was followed by our friend, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN].

I thought, however, when the Member from Iowa started to tell his story about standing before the bar, realizing what he had previously said about the large corn crops in Iowa, that he was going to recite that wonderful poem about Madelin's face on the floor. Then came along my friend, RANKIN, with quotations from Shakespeare. He might aptly have applied another line to himself, for I do admire his courage, and that would be this:

He who free from malice would pass his days,
Must live obscure and never merit praise.

I did not get up here to make a stump speech but to apprise you of the fact once more that I represent a very large agricultural district and I am interested in this bill. I was interested in the bill that was passed at the last session of the Seventy-third Congress and I have tried to enlighten myself somewhat upon the operation of the bill. I am pleased to say to you that I have had some practical experience in that I have analyzed several instances where large loans were made, and I was really surprised at the leniency with which these loans are handled and the fairness with which the farmers are treated.

With these additional concessions I am hopeful of something even better than a loan. I am looking for something that will not necessitate a rehashing of this legislation at every session. I am looking for that eminent thing which is a better break for the farmer by providing better prices for him and a better market so that he can take up these loans and not have to have any more. [Applause.]

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of these amendments and I am going to vote for them, but I do not think any of us should get it into our heads that these amendments or the Frazier-Lemke bill, or the Jones bill—H. R. 6151—are going to solve the farmers' problems.

The farm loans have been made by the Farm Credit Administration on an appraisal basis of fair prices, based on the average of commodity-farm prices of 1926, which today cannot be realized; especially will this be true if we get anything like a good crop this year. The foreclosures of farm mortgages that are sure to follow these loans will astonish the men who fill these seats in the years to come unless there is a real revival of farm commodity prices.

Corn and cattle now are high, but we all know that it will not take long for these prices to come down if we have good crops.

The American farmer has paid wagonloads of interest, more than any other group of producing people at any time in human history. They have paid it because there was a foreign market for their surplus products at a good price. This foreign market seems to be gone. If permanently gone, how can he expect prosperity? How are prices going to be maintained if we have in the future only our home markets?

The allotment plan is a bold attempt to cut down farm production to the point where it can be consumed in this country. Better prices must be paid the farmer so that expenses and interest charges can be met. The triple A is meeting with so many obstacles and there are so many opponents of the plan today that I just wonder what the future holds for the farmers of America.

Mr. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PIERCE. Yes.

Mr. ANDRESEN. The gentleman is a big wheat farmer.

Mr. PIERCE. I have raised many bushels of wheat.

Mr. ANDRESEN. The gentleman has mentioned losing our foreign market. The gentleman has been interested in exporting wheat out in his section, and does the gentleman know that since last July more than 20,000,000 bushels of wheat have come into the United States, although we have reduced our acreage and production in this country?

Mr. PIERCE. It comes over the low tariff wall. We could do much for the wheat farmer by an amendment to the tariff law abolishing the low wall of 10 percent ad valorem for wheat, feed wheat, not fit for human consumption.

Mr. ANDRESEN. Then the gentleman is in favor of a high tariff on farm products?

Mr. PIERCE. There is no other solution. We must prohibit importation of agricultural products.

Mr. ANDRESEN. So that we may have the market in this country for our farmers here in the United States?

Mr. PIERCE. Absolutely. It is either that or bankruptcy for thousands of farmers.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit a suggestion, I found on investigation that tremendous quantities of wheat had come over the Canadian border under the 10-percent proposition that really had no business coming in that way.

Mr. PIERCE. There is no question that there has been a tremendous importation of wheat for years over the low wall. You understand, there are two tariff walls on wheat, 42 cents on milling wheat and 10 percent ad valorem on wheat that is not fit for human consumption, and under that excuse this wheat comes in over the low wall. In the Pacific Northwest we have a large surplus of wheat at the present time. Still shipload after shipload of Argentine corn and wheat has arrived this year. I do not think that this should be allowed. As a Democrat I have ever believed in low tariffs and foreign trade; however, the farmers are up against a real condition, and I am wondering whether we can carry out our theories or not. [Applause.]

Mr. ANDRESEN. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. PIERCE. I will.

Mr. ANDRESEN. Probably the gentleman will go to the President and the Secretary of State and encourage them to bring about a high tariff on farm products.

Mr. PIERCE. I shall do my level best.

Mr. EKWALL. I want to say to the gentleman from Oregon that we will welcome him over on this side.

Mr. PIERCE. I feel that I would not be at home there. I have been too long on the other side. [Laughter.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in sympathy with the purpose of the measure we are now considering and with every other effort to force a reduction of interest rates. I regret that the administration and those who speak for it on this floor have not seen fit to offer a program broad enough to lighten the burden not of farm mortgages alone but of all the debts of the American people. I say this because I am firmly convinced that the fundamental cause of this depression, as of every other, is a debt burden that has gotten out of balance with prices, property values, and incomes.

The only practicable way to accomplish a uniform reduction of debts is to reduce interest rates. Scaling down the principal, if done along a sufficiently broad front to affect the general economic situation, would have dangerous and even disastrous repercussions; it would close banks and bankrupt life-insurance companies and thereby wipe out the provision prudent men have made for themselves and their families. Such a cure would be even worse than the ailment from which we are now suffering. But it is not necessary to wipe out deposits and destroy life insurance reserves. Debts can be reduced as effectively, although more gradually, by leaving the principal intact and cutting interest rates. One percent saved on interest, if used to amortize the principal, will wipe out any debt in a little more than 30 years. Two percent thus saved and applied will accomplish the liquidation of a debt in considerably less than half that time. A substantial reduction in interest rates, therefore, would make it possible within a few years to reduce to manageable proportions the debt burden which today constitutes the greatest single barrier to recovery.

The reason why it is so necessary, if prosperity shall return, to make an attack upon the debt structure is that the huge sum collected from the people as interest and hoarded by a relatively small creditor group reduces the buying power of the people. In 1929, the last year of the pre-depression period, the American people had an income that has been estimated at $85,000,000,000. By that time the war and post-war inflation and the reckless speculation attendant upon it had built up a debt structure that has been estimated at from one hundred and fifty to two hundred and forty billion dollars. For the purpose of this argument the exact amount is not material, nor is the average interest rate it bore. Let us place the amount at $200,000,000,000 and the average interest rate at 5 percent, and assume an interest burden of $10,000,000,000 a year. After the American people had paid out of their $85,000,000,000 of income ten billions in interest, they still had $75,000,000,000 to spend for other purposes. That sum was sufficient to buy the products of American farms and factories, to keep almost every man employed, and to give us the measure of prosperity we then enjoyed.

But by 1933 values had dropped, prices had declined, and the national income had shrunk to $39,000,000,000. However, there were certain fixed charges, such as taxes, transportation costs, and interest that had not come down. We still had $200,000,000,000 of debt, necessitating the payment of $10,000,000,000 in interest; and when $10,000,000,000 had been paid out of $39,000,000,000, there was only $29,000,000,000 left for other purposes. It was the shrinkage of almost two-thirds in the net buying power of the people, in 4 years, that stopped the wheels of industry, banked the factory fires, and turned ten or twelve million men into the streets.

I believe the American people might be just as prosperous on a low-price level as on a high-price level if all prices and all fixed charges could be reduced in the same proportion as commodity prices and incomes have dropped. I believe that we could set for ourselves no sounder objective than to bring interest rates—not only on farm mortgages held by the Federal land banks but on all farm mortgages, and not only on farm mortgages but on all long-time indebtedness—down to such an extent that the interest burden would bear the same relationship to the reduced national income as it did at the time when the greater part of the present debt structure was created. I would consider this a much more effectual attack upon the depression than efforts to restore price averages to their former levels—efforts which not only place us at a disadvantage in a highly competitive world market but result in widening those price disparities which have hindered an equitable exchange of products between the various industrial and occupational groups at home. Let me warn against the false philosophy that there is magical virtue in raising the price index. It is not the average of all prices that determines prosperity or the lack of it; prosperity results when there is such an adjustment of all the prices which make up that average that a day's labor in one economic sector will buy the product of a day's labor in another. If we were to bring the wages of capital—interest—into line with the wages of the working man and the entrepreneur, we should go far toward solving our present economic problem.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. I yield.

Mr. PIERCE. Should the interest rate have to be any higher than the increase of wealth, when measured through a long series of years?

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. I do not believe that interest rates on borrowed money should rise any faster than the income derived from the use of other property. I believe interest rates should be reduced in the same proportion and to the same degree as general incomes drop, when price levels fall. If we could accomplish that result we would make the creditor group bear its proportionate share of the cost of every depression.

Mr. PIERCE. Does the gentleman's study and reading lead him to believe it is around 2 percent?

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. I would say that the interest rate that the American people can carry on the basis of present incomes is not to exceed two or two and a half percent. Bank rates are down. Those who can borrow money from banks can get it on short-time paper at unprecedentedly low rates of interest, but there has not been any comparable reduction in interest on the great volume of indebtedness, which is in the form of bonds and mortgages and which has not been written down.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. I yield.

Mr. McFARLANE. In another body it was admitted in debate recently that our total national tax burden is around $15,000,000,000.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. And if you add $10,000,000,000 interest to that, assuming that our figures are correct, you will reach the conclusion that there are $25,000,000,000 which must come out of a national income, which at the present time does not exceed $45,000,000,000, before there is a dollar available to those who pay interest and taxes for buying the products of farms and factories.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Is it not also true that there is a cost of approximately $17,000,000,000 which is incurred for the purpose of maintaining organized government—municipal, State, and National?

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. That, of course, is covered by the $15,000,000,000 to which the gentleman from Texas referred. It should also be noted that the $10,000,000,000 and the $15,000,000,000 overlap, for a considerable part of the tax money is used to pay interest on public debt.

In conclusion, let me say there is one government that has come nearer solving the problem of the depression than any other, and that is the Government of the Commonwealth of Australia. Australia followed a policy that was in some of its aspects deflationary. It effected a reduction in interest rates on existing contracts of from 22½ percent up. It cut governmental expenditures 20 percent. Despite a drop of 20 percent in nominal wages, there was an increase of more than 10 percent in real wages; for as a result of the adoption of a policy which considered facts rather than appearances, and aimed at the public welfare rather than political advantage, the cost of living dropped faster than wages.

The United States has much to learn from Australia, a commonwealth whose statesmen turned their backs on grandiose plans and spectacular procedures and set themselves honestly to the prosaic task of putting the national house in order. So successful were they that Australia has climbed four-fifths of the way out of the depression, having made in that respect a better record than any other country in the world. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Sec. 3. The third sentence of paragraph "Twelfth" of section 12 of the Federal Farm Loan Act, as amended (U. S. C., Supp. VII, title 12, sec. 771), is amended by striking out that portion of the sentence following the semicolon and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "but in any case in which the Land Bank Commissioner finds that the amount of interest payable by such bank during any quarter subsequent to December 31, 1934, has been reduced by reason of the refinancing of bonds subsequent to June 30, 1934, the amount of the reduction so found shall be deducted from the amount payable to such bank for such quarter under this paragraph."

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JONES: Page 4, lines 1 to 12, inclusive, strike out all of section 3 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(a) Effective July 1, 1935, the first sentence of paragraph 'Twelfth' of section 12 of the Federal Farm Loan Act, as amended, is amended by striking out the following: 'within 2 years after such date shall not exceed 4½ percent per annum for all interest payable on installment dates occurring within a period of 5 years commencing 60 days after the date this paragraph takes effect; and no payment of the principal portion of any installment of any such loan shall be required during such 5-year period if the borrower shall not be in default with respect to any other condition or covenant of his mortgage', and inserting in lieu thereof the following: 'after such date, shall not exceed 3½ percent per annum for all interest payable on installment dates occurring within a period of 1 year commencing July 1, 1935, and shall not exceed 4 percent per annum for all interest payable on installment dates occurring within a period of 2 years commencing July 1, 1936; and no payment of the principal portion of any installment of any such loan outstanding on the date of the enactment of the Farm Credit Act of 1935 shall be required prior to July 11, 1938, if the borrower shall not be in default with respect to any other condition or covenant of his mortgage."

"(b) Effective July 1, 1935, the second sentence of such paragraph 'Twelfth' is amended by striking out the following: 'the rate of interest on such loans for such 5-year period shall be 5 percent in lieu of 4½ percent', and inserting in lieu thereof: 'the rates of interest paid for the respective periods above specified shall be one-half of 1 percent per annum in excess of the rates of interest paid during the corresponding periods by borrowers on mortgage loans made through national farm loan associations'."

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I intended in connection with this amendment to ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GILCHRIST], who, together with a number of other members of the committee and Members of the House, has helped in working it out, to explain it, but I believe it has been pretty well explained in the running fire of debate so far. Mr. GILCHRIST was especially helpful in this matter. In fact, all of the members of the committee, as well as many Members of the House, have been of great assistance. Unless the House wishes further explanation, I do not see there is any need for any. I might say this: Admiral Byrd's party is supposed to come in during the afternoon. A number of Members of the House want to meet him. I hope the Members of the House will restrain themselves in most of the discussion of the rest of the bill in order that we may get through and get away in time to attend that affair.

Mr. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. ANDRESEN. While the amendment just read explains itself, the understanding is that the rate of interest will be 3½ percent for the next year, beginning July 1, and 4 percent for the year following.

Mr. JONES. Yes; that is correct. In fact, 4 percent for 2 years following.

Mr. ANDRESEN. That will be on all loans that have been made by the Federal land bank?

Mr. JONES. That is my understanding. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] asked for time in general debate. I asked him to defer it to the 5-minute rule, and I ask that he be recognized at this time for 5 minutes, and ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto close at the end of 7 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I wish to give notice at this time that when we go back into the House I shall ask that all Members may have the privilege of revising and extending their remarks on this bill.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GILCHRIST].

Mr. GILCHRIST. Mr. Chairman, in the 2 minutes allotted to me I wish to call attention to the fact that in April, less than a month ago, the Farm Credit Administration sold its bonds for 3¼ percent; that the bonds which were not taken by those who had preference—that is, those who held the old 5-percent bonds—were oversubscribed 20 times. Farm credit bonds bearing only 2¾ percent were offered last Saturday on the market in New York City and were sold at a little above par.

I am glad that the House is now about to extend more favorable rates to the farmers of the country. Some of us who have been interested in this matter have tried to bring it before Congress and get a vote upon it for a period of more than 3 months. The gentleman from Missouri who has just addressed us [Mr. CANNON], and the gentleman from Iowa who is chairman of the Prairie Club bloc [Mr. GILLETTE], and other members of that bloc have been very active in this. Now let us have a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sec. 17. (a) The first sentence of subsection (a) of section 31 of the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act of 1933 is amended by striking out the words "for 2 years from the date of the enactment of this act" and inserting in lieu thereof a comma and the following: "until May 13, 1937."

(b) Subsection (b) of such section 31 is amended by striking out the words "such 2-year period" and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "the period of postponement."

Mr. BACON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BACON: Page 13, line 25, insert a new subsection (c), as follows:

"(c) The first sentence of the act entitled 'An act to authorize production-credit associations to make loans to oyster planters', approved June 18, 1934, United States Code, title XII, section 1131-j, is amended by striking out the following: 'Who are carrying on their operations under leases of oyster beds granted by any State or political subdivision thereof.'"

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, the subcommittee and the committee understand this amendment; there is no objection to it.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Chairman, this amendment was suggested to the committee by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BACHARACH] and by myself.

The present law—act of June 18, 1934—authorizes production-credit associations organized under the Farm Credit Act of 1933 to make loans to oyster planters who are carrying on their operations under leases of oyster beds granted by any State or political subdivision thereof.

It has been held that the limitation in the present law, limiting loans to oyster planters who are carrying on their operations under leases, prevents similar loans to oyster men who are owners of oyster bottoms in fee simple or who own franchises on such bottoms. The effect, therefore, was to deny owners and holders of franchises the benefits of the act providing for production-loan credits to oyster men.

There are many oyster planters, particularly in New York, New Jersey, Connecticut, and Massachusetts, who either own their own oyster beds or who operate them under franchises dating from very early times. It is felt that it was entirely an oversight to exclude straight-out owners and holders of franchises from the provisions of the act of June 18, 1934, and it is to correct this discrimination that this amendment is recommended.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. IGOU, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5440) to amend the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act of 1933, to amend the Federal Farm Loan Act, to amend the Agricultural Marketing Act, and to amend the Farm Credit Act of 1933, and for other purposes, directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendations that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments thereto to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take up Senate bill 1384 and strike out all after the enacting clause of the Senate bill and substitute the House bill for the Senate bill and pass the Senate bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The amendment to the Senate bill was agreed to.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the proceedings by which the House bill was passed be vacated.

Mr. BLANTON. Of course, that will embrace the amendments. That would carry the amendments to the House bill as an amendment to the Senate bill. In other words, the House bill, as amended by the committee, would be offered as an amendment to the Senate bill.

Mr. JONES. We have done that in the passage of the House bill and we are now vacating the proceedings by which we passed the House bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

A similar House bill (H. R. 5440) was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to extend their own remarks on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

CRIME CONDITIONS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. WERNER. Mr. Speaker, on Saturday last I was granted permission to file minority views on a report by a subcommittee of the District of Columbia Committee on crime conditions under a resolution passed by the House. I have just been informed that the printed hearings will not be available until Monday or Tuesday of next week. I therefore ask unanimous consent that I may have until Monday, May 20, to file minority views.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Dakota?

There was no objection.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE APPROPRIATION BILL, 1936

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 6718) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture and for the Farm Credit Administration for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and for other purposes, and ask unanimous consent that the statement may be read in lieu of the report.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask what the conference committee did in reference to the matter of appropriations for bindweed extermination?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I think the report will be entirely satisfactory to the gentleman. The appropriation was increased from $25,000 to $40,000. In addition to that $20,000 is made available for an investigation by the Bureau of Chemistry of chemicals best adapted for the control of such weeds.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Is the $40,000 to be used exclusively for bindweed extermination?

Mr. BUCHANAN. The conference committee provided $40,000 for the use of the Bureau of Plant Industry for research for a method for the eradication of the bindweed and other noxious weeds. The conference committee, after a thorough investigation, added $20,000 for the use of the Bureau of Chemistry to investigate and find a cheap chemical to be used in the manufacture of a preparation to kill these weeds. Sodium chlorate has proved successful throughout all sections where it has been applied. It is only a question of its cost to the farmer. We believe the Bureau of Chemistry, in cooperation with the Tennessee Valley Authority, can reduce its cost to an economical basis.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. The $20,000 appropriation for a study of chlorates applied to the bindweed exclusively?

Mr. BUCHANAN. The bindweed and other noxious weeds. Of course, it will kill any noxious weed.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. As I understand, the sum of $40,000 has been appropriated for a study by the agricultural colleges of methods of examination of bindweed and other noxious weeds, and $20,000 has been provided in order to study the chemicals to be used.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes.

Mr. THURSTON. I think there is an error about the $40,000. That is left in the discretion of the department. It is to be under the Bureau of Plant Industry.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. The $40,000 is appropriated for use by the Bureau of Plant Industry in the extermination of these weeds?

Mr. BUCHANAN. They may cooperate with agricultural colleges if they want to.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. May I ask the gentleman about the conference report with respect to the Senate amendment providing an appropriation of $25,000 for the prevention of swamp fever, a very deadly disease among mules?

Mr. BUCHANAN. The conference report allows $15,000 for the study of swamp fever that is killing a good many mules in the Mississippi Delta and elsewhere.

The $25,000 that was put in by the Senate contemplated the establishment of a laboratory in the Delta. After conference by myself with the Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry, it was demonstrated that they could do the same character of work and accomplish the same results with $15,000 if they were allowed to conduct the experiments in the laboratory here, and we allowed the $15,000 which they stated was sufficient for the purpose.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Speaker, personally I preferred the establishment of a laboratory in the field, but I do trust that the provision made by the conferees will result in the elimination of this very deadly disease among mules.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri that the statement may be read in lieu of the report?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6718) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture and for the Farm Credit Administration for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 16, 17, 34, 44, 47, 55, 56, 57, and 59.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6718) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture and for the Farm Credit Administration for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and for other purposes, submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon and recommended in the accompanying conference report, as to each of such amendments, namely:

The following amendments relate to the corrections of totals, allocations, textual errors, perfections of phraseology, etc.:

On amendments nos. 1, 4, 5, 6, 7, 9, 10, 11, 13, 18, 19, 22, 23, 26, 27, 28, 30, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 41, 42, 43, 45, 48, 51, 52, 54, 55, and 56.

On amendment no. 2: Eliminates the House provision relating to the issuing of bulletins or reports advocating reduced consumption of any wholesome agricultural food commodity.

On amendment no. 3, agricultural exhibits at fairs: Appropriates $85,000 as proposed by the House, instead of $97,030 as proposed by the Senate.

On amendment no. 12, swamp fever: Appropriates $15,000, instead of $25,000 as proposed by the Senate, for studies of swamp fever affecting mules and other animals.

On amendment no. 14, bindweed investigations: Appropriates $40,000, instead of $100,000 as proposed by the Senate for investigations concerning control and eradication of bindweed and other noxious weeds, and eliminates the Senate provision requiring the money to be expended in connection with State agricultural colleges.

On amendment no. 15, Sea Island cotton: Provides an allocation of $15,000 "for experimenting in Sea Island cotton, including its hybridization with other varieties", instead of $20,000 "for experimenting in Sea Island cotton", as proposed by the Senate.

On amendment no. 16, Mississippi-Alabama experiment station, West Point, Miss.: Strikes out the Senate provision allocating $7,500 of the appropriation for "forage crops and diseases" for the continuation of the station and leaves to the discretion of the Department the amount of the appropriation which shall be so allocated.

On amendment no. 17, fermented fruit-juice work at Beltsville, Md.: Strikes out the appropriation of $27,500 provided by the Senate.

On amendment no. 20, forest range investigations in Montana: Appropriates $20,000, instead of $40,000 as proposed by the Senate.

On amendment no. 21, forest survey: Appropriates $250,000 as proposed by the Senate, instead of $129,703 as proposed by the House.

On amendment no. 24, agricultural chemical investigations: Appropriates $15,000 for studies of the utilization of fruit and vegetable wastes and surpluses and $20,000 for studies and development of chemical means for combating the bindweed and other noxious weeds, instead of $35,000 for studies of the utilization of fruit and vegetable wastes and surpluses as proposed by the Senate.

On amendment no. 25, naval stores investigations: Appropriates $76,741, instead of $61,741 as provided by the House and $81,741 as provided by the Senate.

On amendment no. 29, cereal and forage insects: Appropriates $347,229 and makes $15,000 of the amount available for investigation of the means of control of the Mormon cricket, instead of $354,729 as proposed by the Senate, and instead of $339,729, of which $15,000 was to be available for Mormon cricket control, as proposed by the House.

On amendment no. 31, superseding of the queen bee studies: Appropriates $15,000 as proposed by the Senate.

On amendment no. 38, control of predatory animals and injurious rodents: Appropriates $600,000, instead of $453,692 as proposed by the House and $1,000,000 as proposed by the Senate.

On amendment no. 39, protection of migratory birds: Appropriates $222,978, instead of $167,978 as proposed by the House and $277,978 as proposed by the Senate.

On amendment no. 40, enforcement of Alaska game law: Appropriates $96,596, instead of $71,596 as proposed by the House, and $164,486 as proposed by the Senate.

On amendment no. 44, use of airplanes in Alaska: Strikes out the Senate provision authorizing the Bureau of Biological Survey to expend $15,000 for the purchase and operation of airplanes in Alaska.

On amendment no. 46, public-lands highways: Retains the Senate provision appropriating $2,500,000 for public highways through unappropriated or unreserved public lands, nontaxable Indian lands, or other Federal reservations other than forest reservations.

On amendment no. 47, emergency construction of public highways: Restores the house language, stricken out by the Senate, allocating $100,000,000 of the appropriation contained in section 1 of the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1935 for the emergency construction of public highways as authorized by the Cartwright-Hayden Act, approved June 18, 1934 (48 Stat. 993), being the remaining unappropriated amount of the $200,000,000 authorized to be appropriated by the said act.

On amendments nos. 49 and 50, snow surveys: Appropriates $15,000, instead of $36,000 as provided by the Senate, for snow surveys and forecasts of irrigation water supplies.

On amendment no. 53, enforcement of the Food and Drugs Act: Appropriates $1,540,879, instead of $1,515,879 as proposed by the House, and $1,765,879 as proposed by the Senate.

On amendment no. 57, soil-erosion investigations: Appropriates $281,362 as provided by the House, instead of $531,362 as proposed by the Senate.

On amendment no. 59: Strikes out section 2, inserted by the Senate, which provides that "No part of any appropriation contained in this act shall be used for the payment of personal services or for the maintenance of any activity not specifically authorized by law."

SENATE

MONDAY, MAY 13, 1935

The Chaplain, Rev. Z. Barney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, who art the fountain of life and happiness, who through the past night hast given us sleep to refresh our weakness and to alleviate the labors of our fragile flesh: Grant that the Angel of Peace, the guardian of our souls and bodies, may encamp about us this day and lead us in the way of holy living, into paths of noble endeavor for the safety, honor, and welfare of our country.

Let Thy fatherly pity and protection rest upon the poor, the sick, and the sorrowful, that all men everywhere, being moved by Thy love, may show kindness and mercy toward those whom Thy dear Son hath vouchsafed to call His brethren. We ask it in His name and for His sake. Amen.

Plainview, Tex.

To the Vice President and to the Members of the Senate, Seventy-fourth Congress of the United States:

On behalf of several thousand farmers from 25 or more States, assembling in Washington Tuesday, May 14, to express to this Congress and to the Agricultural Adjustment Administration the appreciation of the great majority of American farmers for the present adjustment programs which have saved agriculture from ruin, we extend to every Member of this honorable body a cordial invitation to attend the farmer meeting to be held in Constitution Hall, Tuesday, May 14, from 10 to 12 a. m.

This meeting is not one of protest or demand, but of endorsement of a farm program which is really an effective contribution in the farmers' long struggle for economic justice. Opponents of the program have not only spoken loudly in their own interests but have also professed to speak for farmers. To indicate to the leaders of this Nation the real voice of agriculture, farmers from all over America have journeyed here to emphasize their approval of these programs, to express their confidence in the leadership of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, and to voice their conviction that the best interests of the Nation call for continuation and strengthening of these adjustment programs.

It is in this spirit that the farmers invite you to attend their meetings, that you may personally receive their commendation. Respectfully,

C. H. DAY, Texas,
J. F. TOMPKINS, Arkansas,
D. E. SCOTT, North Carolina,
EARL DEAN, Iowa,

National Committee on Arrangements.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, there was so much confusion in the Chamber I could not hear the time and place of the meeting.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The meeting will be at Constitution Hall from 10 to 12 o'clock tomorrow morning.

TRIBUTE TO SENATOR GLASS

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, may I beseech the Senate to allow me to impose on it for one moment while I speak on a matter which, perhaps, in its nature has something to do with the privileges of the Senate?

The public press informs us that recently there was presented at New York City to one of our colleagues, the distinguished senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], a memorial, or memento, from the well-renowned historical organization, the National Institute of Social Sciences, certifying to the superiority of our brother of the Senate in a specific line of science, finance, and service to mankind. The medal accorded, as described, is of gold, upon which his name is indented, with reference particularly to the specific virtues of this American to which the medal is intended to certify.

Senators, I know you will indulge me to say that there generally prevails the impression that those engaged in such work as are we, the affairs of government and matters of state, are crudely confined wholly to that which is designated as politics or the exigency of statecraft. Rarely is it ever vouchsafed to us in the esteem of the world that there are attached to us any other attributes than those which characterize efforts in the field of what the world calls partisanship. When it is discovered and borne in upon us in this pleasant manner that one of our colleagues, notwithstanding the specialty to which we know he has devoted his life, politically, touching finance, is also talented specifically in matters of science, art, and literature, to the perfection that has brought to him recognition of so high a character as that which has been accorded the able Senator from Virginia, we marvel, because we know our country at large seldom ascribes to those situated as we are anything other than the mere pursuit of the single subject of what the world pleases to dismiss as statecraft. Yet we recall with joy of inner consolation that in many of our colleagues there is the possession of the knowledge of the natural sciences, the grace of refining literature, sublime achievements in human relief by deep research and Christian science.

Mr. President, my colleagues about me may recall from the classics that we have it from Terence, the slave poet of the Romans, as given us by Menander, the self-applied encomium—

Homo sum; humani nihil a me alienum puto—

Which, liberally translated to our daily tongue, asserts, "I am a man, and there is nothing that concerns humanity that is foreign to me."

We are pleased to note that there are those in this honorable body who, while pursuing their course of public duty, well illustrate that there is nothing of human nature that is foreign to them. Such men, as the Senator from Virginia, courageous in action, deliberate in speech, independent in character, represent the model of the perfect Senator. We of the Senate behold in this tribute to the Senator from Virginia the photostat of the composite Membership of the Senate. This action brings to bear a reflection that this, our distinguished colleague, has demonstrated to the country pursuits varying of character that bless this tribunal with honor as they hallow the acknowledged talent of its Members. We delight to send our praise and expression of our gratification to the distinguished Senator from Virginia. We express our gratification in the credit the State of his home—renowned Virginia—may take in the distinction flowing to itself.

Senator CARTER GLASS is by this recorded tribute of his country embalmed in joyous acclaim for his scholarly qualities, the versatility of his genius; and for all this tribute accords, I assure our Nation that this honorable body joins with me in expressing our approval and pleasure. We, the United States Senate, adopt this honor accorded to Senator GLASS, a certificate to the versatile qualifications of this honorable body, the United States Senate.

I thank the Senate for allowing me to intrude upon them this welcomed reflection.

I beg to attach to these expressions an article from the news records of the press of New York and an editorial detailing the pleasurable exercises on the event I relate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the article and editorial presented by the Senator from Illinois will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the New York Times]

GLASS GETS MEDAL FOR BANK REFORMS—SENATOR ONE OF FOUR HONORED BY SOCIAL SCIENCE INSTITUTE FOR "SERVICE TO HUMANITY"—WILLIS SCORES CONGRESS—HE ALSO PRAISES COURAGE OF THE PRESS—BLISS, DR. CUSHING AND VINCENT GET AWARDS

In recognition of "distinguished services rendered to humanity," the National Institute of Social Sciences conferred its gold medal on four well-known Americans at its annual dinner last night at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel. Those honored were Senator Carter Glass, Cornelius N. Bliss, Dr. Harvey Cushing, and Dr. George E. Vincent.

The presentation speech to Senator Glass was made by Dr. H. Parker Willis, professor of Columbia University. Mr. August Belmont made the presentation speech to Mr. Bliss; Dr. Willard C. Rappleye, dean of the College of Physicians and Surgeons, made the presentation remarks to Dr. Cushing, Roger Sherman Baldwin made the presentation speech to Dr. Vincent.

Herbert L. Satterlee presided at the dinner. The president of the institute is Henry Fletcher.

The citation of Senator GLASS declared the award was made to him "in recognition of distinguished services rendered to humanity as one of the leaders in the planning and creation of the Federal Reserve Banking System; as Secretary of the Treasury; as United States Senator; and as one, who has through life, consistently and unsparingly devoted his abilities and energies to public service."

SENATOR GLASS PRAISED

Senator GLASS was hailed by Dr. Willis as "one of those very few Americans who have been able to perceive the real character of the change which, in recent years, have been proposed in our Government who has recognized the constitutional bearings of our banking problem, and who has devoted himself wholly to a thorough examination and exposition of the nature of constitutional and financial relationships."

PORTRAIT OF A SENATOR

To a country that has just seen the Senate pass the Patman bonus bill and hears the insolent clamor that threatens the opponents of that measure, the speech of Senator GLASS accepting the medal of the National Institute of Social Sciences is as salutary as it is timely. Senator GLASS will not even accept the common phrase "public servant" in its contemporary meaning:

"To me it was never intended to mean abject subservience to the popular will, however uninformed or misdirected. I prefer to think of a United States Senator as the representative of the sovereignty of his State and subject every moment to the promptings of his own conscience and the preservation of his own intellectual integrity."

The Senator learned long ago—

"Indeed, I did not have to learn; it is a self-evident proposition—that the public man who permits himself to pause long enough to inquire whether a thing is popular or unpopular, instead of seeking to know whether it is right or wrong, is not only useless but dangerous to his country. He is a coward to begin with and a menace always."

Senator GLASS' whole public career has been framed on this model. His public life is the realization of his words.

His name is written in momentous legislation; it is his greatest achievement that he has been faithful to his high conception of the duty of a Senator. He goes his way, unmoved by threats, careless of popularity. He is a free man and Senator, subservient neither to the administration nor to the manufactured "public opinion" of herds of self-seekers. His qualities are recognized and respected. It may be doubted if any public man of today stands higher in general estimation. His unbending firmness of purpose is appreciated even in the Senate, where he is one of the few specimens of what a Senator should be.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its recording clerks, announced that the House has passed the bill (S. 1384) to amend the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act of 1933, to amend the Federal Farm Loan Act, to amend the Agricultural Marketing Act, and to amend the Farm Credit Act of 1933, and for other purposes, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED

The message also announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the enrolled joint resolution (H. J. Res. 254) providing for an investigation by the United States Public Health Service of the plumbing and sanitary systems in Federal Government buildings, and it was signed by the Vice President.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Texas, memorializing Congress to promptly enact such legislation as may be necessary to abolish the Federal gasoline sales tax and to surrender to the States exclusively the power to tax such sales in the future, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

(See concurrent resolution printed in full when presented today by Mr. SHEPPARD, p. 7349.)

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a resolution of the House of Representatives of the State of Nebraska, memorializing Congress to make a complete investigation of the sugar-beet industry, with particular reference to the causes of the annual controversy arising concerning contract terms and alleged discriminations, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

(See resolution printed in full when presented today by Mr. NORRIS, p. 7347.)

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Nebraska, favoring the enactment of legislation authorizing the erection of an addition to the existing Veterans' Administration hospital in the city of Lincoln, Nebr., to care for neuropsychiatric patients, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

(See concurrent resolution printed in full when presented today by Mr. NORRIS, p. 7347.)

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, memorializing Congress and the President to adequately increase the protective duty on butter, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

(See joint resolution printed in full when presented today by Mr. LA FOLLETTE, p. 7348.)

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Louisiana, which was ordered to lie on the table:

Senate Concurrent Resolution 1

Whereas agriculture is the basic industry of this country, and there can be no recovery until agriculture is put on a sound basis: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of your memorialists, the members of the Legislative Assembly of the State of Louisiana, the Senate and House concurring, that the Congress of the United States should enact the Frazier-Lemke bill without further delay; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this memorial, duly authenticated, be sent by the secretary of the State to the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to each Senator and Representative in Congress from this State, to the President of the United States, and to United States Senator LYNN J. FRAZIER and Congressman WILLIAM LEMKE.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following resolutions of the General Court of Massachusetts, which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

Resolutions commending the President of the United States for his courage in urging Congress to take the profits out of war, and requesting that the President and Congress take the profits out of the manufacture of munitions by way of preparedness for war

Whereas the President of the United States has courageously recommended legislation looking to the taking of private profits out of war; and

Whereas private profits in war munitions may be an incentive to warfare and prevent the continuance of peace on earth and good will to men: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the General Court of Massachusetts hereby commends the President of the United States for his courage and leadership above mentioned, and earnestly and respectfully requests the President and Congress to further the cause of removing private profits from war and from the manufacture of munitions by way of preparedness for war; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be transmitted forthwith by the secretary of the Commonwealth to the President of the United States, to the presiding officers of both branches of Congress, and to the Representatives in Congress from this Commonwealth.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Business Mens' Association of the city of National Falls, Minn., favoring the making of an appropriation for the construction of a series of power and storage dams in the chain of lakes on the international boundary (Minnesota) with the purpose of conserving the flow of water from the Rainy River watershed and increasing the hydroelectric power in the lakes and streams, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also laid before the Senate several petitions of citizens of Illinois and Mississippi, praying for the enactment of old-age pension legislation, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also laid before the Senate the petition of members of the Capital City Townsend Club, of Lansing, Mich., praying for inclusion in pending social-security legislation of the so-called "Townsend old-age pension plan", which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also laid before the Senate papers in the nature of memorials of several citizens of Brooklyn and vicinity, in the State of New York, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation imposing a special tax of one-half cent per gallon on heating oil, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also laid before the Senate a memorial of several citizens of Peoria and vicinity, in the State of Illinois, remonstrating against alleged religious persecutions in the Republic of Mexico and the attitude of the American Ambassador to that country, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by the Green River (Wyo.) Booster League, being employees of the Union Pacific System, favoring the prompt enactment of legislation repealing the fourth section of the Interstate Commerce Act, which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Fourth Cycle, Inc., Group 1A, of Compton, Calif., favoring a senatorial public investigation of charges made by Senator SCHALL relative to the operations of Federal corporations, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also laid before the Senate petitions of sundry citizens of the United States, praying for an investigation of charges filed by the Women's Committee of Louisiana relative to the qualifications of the Senators from Louisiana [Mr. LONG and Mr. OVERTON], which were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

He also laid before the Senate petitions and letters, papers, and telegrams in the nature of petitions, from sundry citizens and veterans' organizations in the United States, praying for the prompt enactment of the so-called "Patman bonus bill", which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also laid before the Senate a letter in the nature of a memorial from Mrs. Harry Hamfel, of Detroit, Mich., remonstrating against the enactment of such bonus legislation as is advocated by the Reverend Charles E. Coughlin, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WALSH presented a resolution adopted by Lowell Aerie, No. 223, Fraternal Order of Eagles, of Lowell, Mass., favoring the passage of old-age pension legislation, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of Local Union, No. 2178, United Textile Workers of America, of Millbury, Mass., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for a graduated tax on cigarettes, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented petitions of Victory Lodge, No. 2097, Brotherhood of Railway and Steamship Clerks, Freight Handlers, Express and Station Employees, of Fall River; Pioneer Lodge, No. 1235, of Springfield, and the Italian Mutual Aid Society, Inc., of West Springfield, all in the State of Massachusetts, praying for the enactment of legislation extending the effective date of the National Emergency Transportation Act of 1933, which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a petition of several citizens of the State of Massachusetts, praying for the passage of the so-called "Patman bill", providing for the immediate payment of World War veterans' adjusted-compensation certificates, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SMITH presented the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of South Carolina, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys:

A concurrent resolution commending Senator E. D. SMITH in his efforts for the passage of a bill to establish a national monument and cemetery in Greenwood County, to be known as the "Star Fort National Monument and Cemetery"

Be it resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring):

Whereas United States Senator the Honorable E. D. SMITH has introduced in the United States Senate bill No. 2716, providing for the establishment of a national monument and cemetery in Greenwood County, to be known as the "Star Fort National Monument and Cemetery", which is a companion bill to the one introduced by Congressman J. C. TAYLOR in House bill No. 7542; and

Whereas it is both meet and proper during these days of turmoil to revert to the early establishment of the Government of the United States and to commend and perpetuate the heroism enacted by the Revolutionary soldiers who gave their lives and their all for the benefit of establishing a "Government by the people, for the people" on this continent; and

Whereas the deeds and heroism as exemplified in the lives of those who sought to perpetuate and establish the United States of America should be preserved and enshrined in the hearts of the present and future generations and to keep the home fires burning throughout all times and to preserve the blessings to our people; and

Whereas the graves of the American soldiers buried at Star Fort have never had suitable monument or markers erected to perpetuate their deeds and lie in graves unmarked at the fort where they fell fighting for American liberty: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That we commend the efforts of Senator SMITH in getting this Star Fort Monument and Cemetery bill passed to commemorate in part the deeds enacted at this fort; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the Vice President of the United States, to United States Senators SMITH and BYRNES, and to the entire South Carolina delegation in the House, and urge them to do all that is consistent to the favorable enactment of this law.

Mr. BARBOUR presented the following resolution of the House of Assembly of the State of New Jersey, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

Whereas Nicholas Casale, of the city of Newark, a World War veteran, served with the One Hundredth and Forty-eighth Regiment, United States Infantry, Thirty-seventh Division, with distinction and honor; and

Whereas his outstanding service was rendered to the United States and the State of New Jersey, because of the fact that he was only 4 feet 10 inches in height, and weighed less than 100 pounds, and was cited for bravery in action when his organization was under fire: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the house of assembly do memorialize Congress to pass suitable legislation authorizing the Secretary of War to bestow upon Nicholas Casale a gold Medal of Honor of such design as the Secretary of War may approve; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution, duly authenticated by the speaker and the clerk, be forwarded to each Member of the Senate and House of Representatives from the State of New Jersey.

Mr. BARBOUR also presented the following resolution of the House of Assembly of the State of New Jersey, which was ordered to lie on the table:

Whereas the State housing authority was created by an act of the Legislature of the State of New Jersey, in the year 1933, for the purpose of taking advantage of the National Public Works Act for the elimination of slum areas; and

Whereas the State housing authority has completed a survey of 40 projects and has prepared a 5-year construction program calling for an expenditure of eighty millions per year; and

Whereas the elimination of the slums is a public necessity, not only for the elimination of the slum areas but also the need of providing work for the building mechanics, who are about 70 percent now unemployed: Therefore be it

Resolved by the House of Assembly of the State of New Jersey, That President Franklin D. Roosevelt be urged to use his good office to expedite the work as already prepared by the New Jersey State Housing Authority; be it further Resolved, That a copy be sent President Franklin D. Roosevelt, Secretary of Interior Harold C. Ickes, the United States Senators and Congressmen representing the State of New Jersey.

Mr. NORRIS presented the following resolution of the House of Representatives of the State of Nebraska, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency:

Resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to make a complete investigation of the sugar-beet industry

Whereas the sugar-beet industry is of major importance in agricultural regions and its prosperity affects producers, processors, and consumers alike, and is a means of livelihood for great numbers of employees of such growers and processors; and

Whereas annually controversies arise between sugar-beet producers and sugar-beet processors concerning contract terms and alleged discriminations; and

Whereas such annual sugar-beet controversy is far-reaching in its detrimental effects to farmers, processors, employees, and consumers and should be eliminated, as it creates a great economic loss, retards the normal flow of business, and prevents the normal progress which would otherwise be made in such industry: Now, therefore be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Nebraska in fiftieth regular session assembled—

1. That this house hereby respectfully petitions and memorializes the Congress of the United States to make a complete investigation of the sugar-beet industry, paying particular attention to the causes of the annual controversy which arises concerning contract terms and alleged discriminations.

2. That the clerk of this house is hereby ordered and directed forthwith to forward a copy of this resolution, properly authenticated and suitably engrossed to the President of the United States; the Vice President of the United States; the Speaker of the House of Representatives; and to the United States Senators representing the State of Nebraska; and to the Congressmen in the House of Representatives of the United States representing the State of Nebraska, to take such steps as are necessary to provide for a complete investigation of the sugar-beet industry and thus determine the causes of the annual controversy arising in such industry and, if possible, a remedy therefor.

Mr. NORRIS also presented the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Nebraska, which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

Resolution—Erection of a neuropsychiatric hospital in city of Lincoln

Whereas there is a definite and urgent need for a veterans' neuropsychiatric hospital in the State of Nebraska, as at the present time there are 152 insane veterans being cared for in State institutions for the insane on account of the remote location of veterans' neuropsychiatric facilities assigned to the veterans of Nebraska; and

Whereas the inaccessibility of the locations of these veterans' neuropsychiatric hospitals prevents the families of such veterans from visiting their insane relatives should the latter be hospitalized therein; and

Whereas the Government is making extensive additions and improvements to veterans' neuropsychiatric facilities throughout the country; and

Whereas the present physical plant of the United States Veterans' Administration facility at Lincoln, Nebr., occupies approximately only one-eighth of the acreage owned by the Federal Government, thus making available ample space for the construction of additional units for the care of veteran neuropsychiatric patients; and

Whereas present utilitarian facilities can take care of such additions with very slight increase in such facilities; and

Whereas House roll 7835 has been introduced in the Congress of the United States, authorizing the erection of such an addition to the existing Veterans' Administration facility at Lincoln, Nebr.: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the house (the senate concurring), That the Congress of the United States be and is hereby respectfully memorialized to enact, with all convenient speed, House roll 7835 of the Seventy-fourth Federal Congress; and be it further

Resolved, That the clerk of the house cause copies of this resolution, duly certified, to be transmitted to the President of the United States, the Vice President of the United States, the Director of the United States Veterans' Administration, the Chairman of the Federal Hospitalization Commission, and to all Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Nebraska, and that these latter be urged to use their best offices to procure the passage of House roll 7835 to the accomplishment of the purpose as set forth in the aforementioned bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

Joint resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States and the President to adequately increase the protective tariff on butter

Whereas butter is one of the most important products made from milk, representing the outlet for more than 35 percent of the annual milk production of the United States; and

Whereas Minnesota, Iowa, and Wisconsin, ranking in the order named, normally produce approximately 40 percent of all the creamery butter manufactured in the United States; and

Whereas the butter-manufacturing industry is vitally important to the dairy farmers of Wisconsin, Minnesota, and Iowa, and to consumers of butter throughout the United States; and

Whereas the imposition of an adequate protective tariff is an imperative necessity to the continued prosperity and welfare of the butter industry, as has repeatedly been proved by the record of past experience; and

Whereas exigencies which arose within the butter industry, due to the competition of imported butter, were remedied by tariff increases from 8 cents to 12 cents per pound in 1926 and to 14 cents in 1930; and

Whereas during the months of December, January, February, and March, when domestic production is low and the price of butter is correspondingly high, the differential of domestic over foreign butter prices is sufficient to assure import butter a profit over and above the present 14 cents per pound tariff barrier; and

Whereas New Zealand butter has become the principal competitor of domestic butter for the following reasons: (1) Costs of production in New Zealand are considerably less than production costs in Wisconsin, due principally to the mild climate which reduces winter feeding and shelter costs in New Zealand; (2) the peak of New Zealand production coincides with the point of our lowest and most expensive production during the 4 winter months; (3) in spite of the long shipping distance, transportation costs from New Zealand by water to the New York market are approximately the same as rail-haul charges from Minnesota, Iowa, and Wisconsin to New York; and

Whereas the differential of domestic over foreign butter prices invites New Zealand competition despite the present 14-cent tariff, tending to depress winter butter prices on the domestic market; and

Whereas the amount of butter imported into the United States in 1933 was 1,021,806 pounds and in 1934 was 1,107,020 pounds, increasing from 29,329 pounds in March 1934 to 6,239,352 pounds in March 1935; and

Whereas 11,710,330 pounds of butter were imported into the United States during the first 3 months and 10 days of 1935; and

Whereas excessive recent imports of New Zealand butter are operating to nullify, at least in part, the benefits accruing to dairy farmers from the production-control efforts of the United States Department of Agriculture and to assist, instead, the New Zealand dairy industry at the expense of domestic producers; and

Whereas an emergency need exists for butter tariff revision to provide adequate protection for the domestic butter industry upon which the entire dairy industry of the United States bases its prices: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the senate (the assembly concurring), That the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin respectfully memorializes the President and the Congress of the United States to place a 21-cents-per-pound tariff on imported butter to protect Wisconsin, Minnesota, and Iowa dairy farmers, and the dairy industry generally, from the inroads of foreign competition, and to preserve the home market for the American farmer, to whom it rightfully belongs; and be it further

Resolved, That properly attested copies of this resolution be sent to the Governor and to both houses of the Legislatures of Minnesota and Iowa, respectively, requesting that they concur in this resolution, and also memorialize the Congress of the United States and the President, to the end that a united front be presented in urging the enactment of an adequate protective tariff on butter; and be it further

Resolved, That properly attested copies of this resolution be sent to the President, and to both Houses of the Congress of the United States, and to the Wisconsin Members thereof.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE also presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, which was referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining:

Joint resolution petitioning the National Emergency Council and the Works Allotment Board to create a mining-works project in the dormant southwestern Wisconsin mineral area

Whereas $4,880,000,000 have been appropriated by the Congress of the United States to defray the cost of various types of practical wealth-producing, self-liquidating works projects by virtue of which unemployed men and women may be furnished self-respecting jobs in lieu of the demoralizing dole and the United States Government may be relieved of the direct relief business; and

Whereas extensive mineral fields in southwestern Wisconsin, rich in lead, zinc, and sulphur deposits now lie practically dormant due to present abnormally low market prices for such minerals; and

Whereas this area has a stranded mining population of approximately 1,000 families, most of whom are now unemployed and many actually on relief rolls; and

Whereas operation of these mines would furnish employment to all these unemployed miners and several thousand other unemployed persons; and

Whereas by pegging the per-ton price on raised ores to a level commensurate with adequate living wages for miners and on the basis of index prices in any normal pre-war period, and by purchasing the same at such prices for indefinite storage against time of war or other demand therefor, the National Emergency Council and the Works Allotment Board could devise for this stranded area and its unemployed population a practical wealth-producing and self-liquidating work project and thereby put these mines in operation and the unemployed miners to work: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the senate (the assembly concurring), That this legislature earnestly petitions the National Emergency Council and the Works Allotment Board to give serious consideration to creating an appropriate and practical lead, zinc, and sulphur mining works project in the southwestern mineral area of this State for the paramount purpose of creating wealth and employment; be it further

Resolved, That properly attested copies of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, the National Emergency Council, and the Works Allotment Board, and to each Wisconsin Member of the Congress.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE also presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, which was ordered to lie on the table:

Joint resolution memorializing the President and Congress of the United States and the Administrator of the Federal Emergency Relief Administration to provide for the continuance of aid in lime and marl production

Whereas on May 1, 1935, the Federal Government will discontinue its aid in the production of crushed limestone; and

Whereas it is of great importance to this State that crushed lime and marl production continue at this time for the following reasons:

1. Approximately 85 percent of the production soil of this State is in great need of acid neutralizing elements and fertilizers which are essential to the successful production of crops, especially alfalfa.

2. There is now a serious shortage in cattle feed which seriously affects the cattle industry in this State and which shortage can be largely overcome by creating a great productive activity in the soil.

3. Such acid neutralizing elements and fertilizers are abundant in crushed lime and marl.

4. A large number of otherwise unemployed could be engaged in a profitable undertaking.

5. Production of crushed lime and marl is more profitable to the producer during the warmer months and a greater production is possible, the reasons being obvious.

6. Lime crushed during the warmer months can be applied to the soil in the fall of the year and thereby be permitted to disintegrate and become thoroughly mixed with the soil during the winter months and be an effective productive agent the following spring: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the assembly (the senate concurring), That the Wisconsin Legislature respectfully requests the Congress of the United States to provide for the immediate and further production of crushed lime and marl for farm application; be it further

Resolved, That properly attested copies of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, to Harry L. Hopkins, Administrator of the Federal Emergency Relief Administration, to each Wisconsin Member of Congress, and to Bruce Uthus, director of the work division of the Wisconsin Emergency Relief Administration.

Mr. DUFFY presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, memorializing Congress and the President to adequately increase the protective tariff duty on butter, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

(See joint resolution printed in full when presented today by Mr. LA FOLLETTE, p. 7348.)

Mr. SHEPPARD presented the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Texas, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce:

House Concurrent Resolution 98

Whereas Sulphur River which drains the watershed of about 12 counties of northeast Texas on account of the serpentine trend of the river and the sluggishness of the flow of same, caused by the fact that there is only a few-hundred-feet drop from its source to its mouth; and

Whereas the meandering course of such stream is so pronounced and that the present channel is over 450 miles in length, from its source to the Louisiana line, while in fact this distance by air-line is only about 200 miles; and

Whereas the watercourse of this stream is blocked in many places by drifts that have accumulated and also by dense growth of vegetation and underbrush; and

Whereas it is estimated that these conditions cause almost one-fifth of the area of this watershed to experience often disastrous overflow; and

Whereas these overflows, drifts, and undergrowth cause an accumulation of stagnant water producing unhealthy conditions; and

Whereas if the channel of this river were straightened, drifts and vegetation, brush and undergrowth removed that these conditions would be much improved; and

Whereas a great percentage of the people of this district are unemployed and the policy has been adopted by the Federal Government to spend a large amount of money to procure work for the people: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That the Chairman of the Civilian Conservation Corps is hereby urgently requested to place upon and along Sulphur River C. C. C. camps for the purpose of straightening the channel and clearing same of trees, drifts, and underbrush; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to our Representatives in the National Congress, and that a copy be furnished Hon. E. O. Sleske, professor of soil erosion of A. & M. College, Bryan, Tex.

Mr. SHEPPARD also presented the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Texas, which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

Senate Concurrent Resolution 51

Whereas the Congress of the United States of America has imposed a tax upon all sales of gasoline; and

Whereas the State of Texas and every other State of the United States has already imposed taxes upon such sales; and

Whereas the Federal tax on such sales is untimely and prohibitive and, coupled with the respective State taxes on such sales, places a burden upon the users of gasoline beyond that which they should carry and beyond that which the traffic can legitimately bear; and

Whereas the legislatures of 19 States now or recently in session have memorialized Congress to repeal the Federal gasoline tax law; and

Whereas the taxation of sales of gasoline should properly be left to the exclusive use of the States as a means of providing funds for road construction and maintenance: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Texas (the house of representatives concurring therein), That the Congress of the United States be, and it is hereby, respectfully memorialized to enact with all convenient speed such legislation as may be necessary to abolish the Federal gasoline sales tax and to surrender to the States exclusively the power to tax such sales in the future; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the President of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the President of the Senate, and to each Member of Congress elected from the State of Texas, and that the latter be urged to use his best offices to procure the enactment of such legislation as will accomplish the purposes of this resolution.

Mr. SHEPPARD also presented the following resolution of the House of Representatives of the State of Texas, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce:

Whereas there has been introduced by the Hon. SAM RAYBURN in the House of Representatives at Washington a bill providing for the control of public-utility holding companies; and

Whereas this legislation has the endorsement and whole-hearted support of our President in the carrying out of his program for the regulation of utilities and the elimination of wasteful investment in utility properties: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Texas, That it endorses the provisions of the said general utility bill, and urges upon Congress the speedy passage of this legislation into law, and that a copy of this resolution be properly attested and forwarded to the Speaker of the House of Representatives at Washington.

Mr. SHEPPARD also presented the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Texas, which was referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation:

House Concurrent Resolution 94

Whereas in addition to a most devastating depression during the last 2 years parts of the northern, western, and southern districts of Texas have encountered a most severe and destructive drought, thereby causing a loss of multiplied millions of dollars to the farmers and ranchmen of the said districts and likewise causing great losses to the State and Federal Governments; and

Whereas history and statistics reveal that such portions of the great State of Texas almost invariably suffer for the want of sufficient rainfall during the dry summer months just at a time when precipitation is badly needed; and

Whereas there is an urgent need at this time for both the State and Federal Governments to direct their early attention toward impounding and conserving water in such territory, taking necessary steps to develop irrigation projects, studying, promoting, and developing methods of dry farming, studying the type of farm products and livestock, which can be profitably produced and more particularly adapted for such regions and likewise putting on an additional program among the people concerning these problems: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the house of representatives (and senate concurring), That the Honorable Henry A. Wallace, Secretary of Agriculture, Washington, D. C., be respectfully requested to give more detailed consideration than has been heretofore given in the past to the above vital and perplexing problems, and at an early date employ a sufficient number of agricultural agents to make a detailed study of such prevailing conditions; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be mailed to Senator MORRIS SHEPPARD and Senator TOM CONNALLY, now in Washington, D. C.; to each of the Texas Congressmen, to the Honorable Henry A. Wallace, Secretary of Agriculture, Washington, D. C.; to Hon. Harold Ickes, Secretary of the Interior, Washington, D. C., and likewise a copy of this resolution be mailed to Hon. J. E. McDonald, commissioner of agriculture for the State of Texas.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. BURKE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 157) to amend section 5296 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 6114) to amend section 128 of the Judicial Code, as amended, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 609) thereon.

Mr. WAGNER, from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, to which was referred the bill (S. 738) to aid in providing the people of the United States with adequate facilities for park, parkway, and recreational area purposes, and to provide for the transfer of certain lands chiefly valuable for such purposes to States and political subdivisions thereof, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 610) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 1148) to authorize the transfer of the Green Lake Fish Cultural Station in Hancock County, Maine, as an addition to the Acadia National Park, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 611) thereon.

Mr. HATCH, from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, to which was referred the bill (S. 2247) directing the conveyance of certain lands to the regents of the University of New Mexico, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 616) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 1066) to extend the provisions of section 2 of the act of February 28, 1925, authorizing reservations of timber, minerals, or easements to exchanges of lands in the State of New Mexico, under the act of February 14, 1923, and the act of February 7, 1929, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 617) thereon.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

S. 2462. A bill to provide funds for cooperation with the school board at Worley, Idaho, in the construction of a public-school building to be available to Indian children in the town of Worley and county of Kootenai, Idaho (Rept. No. 612);

S. 2638. A bill to amend the law governing the leasing of unallotted Indian lands for mining purposes (Rept. No. 614); and

S. 2656. A bill to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to grant concessions on reservoir sites and other lands in connection with Indian irrigation projects and to lease the lands in such reserves for agricultural, grazing, or other purposes (Rept. No. 615).

Mr. CONNALLY, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 6654) to increase the White House Police force, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 613) thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION PRESENTED

Mrs. CARAWAY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that on the 10th instant that committee presented to the President of the United States the following enrolled bills and joint resolution:

S. 282. An act for the relief of William Kemper;

S. 563. An act for the relief of the Jay Street Terminal, New York;

S. 1616. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory and supplementary thereto; and

S. J. Res. 43. Joint resolution for the establishment of a commission for the construction of a Washington-Lincoln Memorial Gettysburg Boulevard connecting the present Lincoln Memorial in the city of Washington with the battlefield of Gettysburg in the State of Pennsylvania.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

As in executive session,

Mr. DIETERICH, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported favorably the nomination of Robert W. Rabb, of Pennsylvania, to be United States marshal, middle district of Pennsylvania, vice Percy Brewington.

Mr. McCARRAN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported favorably the nomination of Joseph J. McGuigan, of the Canal Zone, to be district attorney, Canal Zone.

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of sundry postmasters.

He also, from the same committee, reported adversely the nomination of Fred Wheeler to be postmaster at Hudson, N. Y., in place of C. E. Hardy.

Mr. PITTMAN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported favorably Executive G, Seventy-fourth Congress, first session, being the International Sanitary Convention for Aerial Navigation, which was opened for signature at The Hague on April 12, 1933, and signed on behalf of the United States on April 6, 1934, and submitted a report (Ex. Rept. No. 6) thereon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The reports will be placed on the Executive Calendar.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS INTRODUCED

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 127) to provide funds for the protection of land resources against soil erosion; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

By Mr. CLARK:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 128) for the designation of a street or avenue in the Mall to be known as "Missouri Avenue"; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

P. W. A. PROGRAM FOR FLOOD CONTROL, ETC.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I introduce a bill, the design of which is to remedy whatever injury may have been done by the recent decision of the Supreme Court in the case of the United States against the State of Arizona. The bill represents the considered conclusions of the Department of Justice and the Department of the Interior.

I should like to have the bill printed in the RECORD and annexed immediately thereafter a memorandum which has been prepared showing the projects in the Nation which are affected by the decision, and giving information regarding them. I ask that the bill be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The bill (S. 2811) to authorize and adopt certain public-works projects for controlling floods, improving navigation, regulating the flow of certain streams of the United States, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2811

A bill to authorize and adopt certain public-works projects for controlling floods, improving navigation, regulating the flow of certain streams of the United States, and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc., That for the purpose of controlling floods, improving navigation, regulating the flow of the streams of the United States, providing for storage and for the delivery of the stored waters thereof, for the reclamation of public lands and Indian reservations, and other beneficial uses, and for the generation of electric energy as a means of financially aiding and assisting such undertakings, the projects known as "Parker Dam" on the Colorado River and "Grand Coulee Dam" on the Columbia River are hereby authorized and adopted, and all contracts and agreements which have been executed in connection therewith are hereby validated and ratified, and the President, acting through such agents as he may designate, is hereby authorized to construct, operate, and maintain dams, structures, canals, and incidental works necessary to such projects, and in connection therewith to make and enter into any and all necessary contracts, including contracts amendatory of or supplemental to those hereby validated and ratified.

Sec. 2. All projects planned or undertaken to accomplish the purposes specified in section 1 for which allotments have been made pursuant to the provisions of title II of the act approved June 16, 1933, entitled "the National Industrial Recovery Act", are hereby authorized and adopted, and all contracts and agreements which have heretofore been executed in connection therewith are hereby validated and ratified, and the President, acting through such agents as he may designate, is hereby authorized to construct, operate, and maintain dams, structures, canals, and incidental works necessary to such projects, and in connection therewith to make and enter into any and all necessary contracts, including contracts amendatory of or supplemental to those hereby validated and ratified.

The memorandum presented by Mr. JOHNSON was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MEMORANDUM RE EFFECT OF DECISION IN "UNITED STATES AGAINST STATE OF ARIZONA" ON THE P. W. A. PROGRAM

The projects in addition to the Parker Dam project, the status of which is doubtful in the light of the decision in the United States v. State of Arizona (decided Apr. 29, 1935), have been listed under five classes.

The projects included in list A are reclamation projects the authorization of which is doubtful, since the streams on which such projects are located may be held to be navigable by the Court. If the stream on which any of such projects are located is held to be navigable, the authorization of the project may be held bad, since it was not based upon a recommendation to the Congress by the Chief of Engineers.

The projects included in list B are projects of the International Boundary Commission, the status of which is the same as that of projects in list A.

The projects included in list C are projects under the jurisdiction of the Bureau of Indian Affairs. The status of these cases is the same as that of the cases in lists A and B.

The projects included in list D are flood-control projects of the War Department. Their status is the same as the status of projects in lists A, B, and C.

The projects included in list E are river-and-harbor improvements under the jurisdiction of the War Department. Their status is doubtful, since the Chief of Engineers did not make a recommendation to the Congress in connection with them.

An examination of the projects included in the comprehensive program of public works in exhaustive a manner as the time has permitted indicates the projects in the above-mentioned lists are probably the only projects affected by the Arizona decision.

List A

State	Project	Allotment	Construction features
Oregon.....	Vale.....	$1,000,000	Agency Valley Dam and Reservoir (earth embankment, 480,000 cubic yards), Willow Creek Canal, 20 miles.

List E

1. Morehead City Harbor, N. C.: A preliminary examination and survey of Morehead City Harbor, N. C., was authorized by the River and Harbor Act approved March 3, 1925. The report of the Chief of Engineers, transmitted to Congress on December 27, 1930, recommended the provision of the channel 12 feet in depth and 700 feet in width from deep water in Morehead City Harbor to Sixth Street, Morehead City. The same river and harbor act also authorized a report on the preliminary examination of Beaufort Harbor and Beaufort Inlet, N. C. The report on that preliminary examination was submitted to the Secretary of War for transmission to Congress on December 17, 1930. The report did not recommend further improvement of the channel to Morehead City. However, a further investigation was undertaken at the request of the Administration of Public Works. The report on this investigation submitted to the Secretary of War on May 12, 1934, for transmission to the Administrator of Public Works, recommended that a 30-foot channel be provided from deep water at Beaufort Inlet to the proposed location of the marine terminals at Morehead City. This report was based on material changes in conditions due particularly to the proposed construction of adequate marine terminals at Morehead City under a loan to be provided for the purpose by the Administration of Public Works. The harbor project has not been undertaken at the present time because local interests have not yet complied with the requirements of the Administration of Public Works requisite to obtaining a loan and grant for the construction of the terminal facilities. The construction of terminal facilities is a requisite condition to the undertaking of the harbor improvement.

2. River Styx, Fla.: The River Styx, in Florida, is a minor tributary of the Apalachicola River in western Florida. An investigation of the Apalachicola River and its tributaries was authorized by Congress in the River and Harbor Act of March 3, 1925, under the provisions of House Document No. 308, Sixty-ninth Congress, first session, submitted in accordance with the River and Harbor Act of January 21, 1927. The report of the investigation is now pending before the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors as required by law prior to its transmission to Congress. The report did not give consideration to the improvement of the River Styx in the interests of navigation. However, in view of the unemployment situation and the particular merit afforded by minor dredging at the mouth of this river to provide access to an extensive pulpwood region, an allotment of $3,500 was recommended for removing shoals in this river near its entrance to the Apalachicola River. The work has been completed.

3. Lorain Harbor (Black River), Ohio: The improvement of the harbor at Lorain, Ohio, has been investigated under congressional authority, and Congress has authorized the construction of converging east and west breakwaters, dredging in the outer harbor and the river channel 250 feet in width and 20 feet in depth between the piers and upstream from the American Shipbuilding Co.'s Dry Dock No. 2, the city of Lorain to dredge and maintain a channel 200 feet in width and 20 feet in depth in the Black River for a distance of about 2 miles above the Federal project. The maintenance of the channel above the Federal project is not a part of the authorized Federal project, but the usefulness of the Federal project is largely contingent upon the proper maintenance of this channel. The city of Lorain was financially unable to provide for necessary maintenance work this year, and in view of the emergency conditions after an investigation made at the request of the Administration of Public Works, this office recommended the undertaking of this work by the Federal Government as an emergency measure. This project has been completed.

4. Newport Bay Harbor, Calif.: Congress authorized a preliminary examination and survey of Newport Bay, Calif., in the River and Harbor Act of September 22, 1932. The report of this Department, transmitted to Congress on November 13, 1933, found that the improvement of Newport Harbor and Bay, Calif., as a project for the benefit of navigation was not deemed advisable, but pointed out that the local interests had agreed to contribute one-half of the cost of the improvement in addition to furnishing the necessary rights-of-way and areas for the disposal of dredged material, and the general benefits in the creation of a sheltered harbor for pleasure craft, and in relieving the congestion in Los Angeles Harbor, warranted the undertaking by the United States of the work on a 50-percent basis as a part of the relief program. A similar report was furnished the Administration of Public Works on September 25, 1933, recommending the inclusion of the project on this basis in the public-works program.

5. Lake Worth Inlet, Fla.: Congress, in the River and Harbor Act approved July 3, 1930, authorized a preliminary examination and survey of Lake Worth Inlet, Fla. The report of this Department, transmitted to Congress on December 7, 1933, found that the improvement of Lake Worth Inlet was advisable to provide for completing and maintaining a channel 16 feet in depth and 300 feet in width from deep water in the ocean to the western end of the inlet, thence 150 feet wide across Lake Worth, to include the turning basin on the western shore of Lake Worth. This work was undertaken by funds provided by the Administration of Public Works. During the period it was under way, in view of a large increase in commerce in this part between the calendar years 1932 and 1933, a recommendation was made to the Administration of Public Works for an increase in this depth to 20 feet. The project has been completed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE

On motion of Mr. SHEPPARD, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 2748) for the relief of Arthur Edgar Scroggin, and it was referred to the Committee on Claims.

AMENDMENT TO RIVER AND HARBOR BILL

Mr. COPELAND submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 6732) authorizing the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

DISPOSITION OF CERTAIN LIGHTHOUSE RESERVATIONS—AMENDMENT

Mr. COPELAND submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 7131) to authorize the Secretary of Commerce to dispose of certain lighthouse reservations, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

HEARINGS BEFORE COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN THE EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS

Mr. LEWIS submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 135), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, or any subcommittee thereof, is authorized, during the Seventy-fourth Congress, to send for persons, books, and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer at a cost not exceeding 25 cents per hundred words to report such hearings as may be had on any subject before said committee, the expense thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate; and that the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit during the sessions or recesses of the Senate.

SETTLEMENT WITH EASTERN AND WESTERN CHEROKEES

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 136), which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs:

Resolved, That in the settlement heretofore provided for and authorized with the Eastern and Western Cherokees, respectively, by the act approved April 25, 1932 (Public, No. 105, 72d Cong.), authorizing gratuities to be charged against them, it was the purpose of the act to charge only gratuities in money or property paid to those whose names are upon the rolls of such Indians.

PUBLICITY ACTIVITIES OF GOVERNMENTAL AGENCIES

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 131) submitted by Mr. DICKINSON on the 7th instant, as follows:

Whereas there is a specific restriction in the law prohibiting printing of any material in any form without direct authorization of law; and

Whereas various departments of the Government and various emergency bureaus are publishing miscellaneous and promiscuous reports; and

Whereas some emergency bureaus are publishing pamphlets and newspapers, both in multigraph and printed form; and

Whereas the expense, both for personnel employed and the cost of printing, is a large item; and

Whereas various bureaus of the Government, at the expense of the taxpayer, are having prepared and presenting to the public motion pictures and displays; and

Whereas various bureaus of the Government are setting up information booths inviting the public to go into debt in remodeling their homes; and

Whereas, either directly or indirectly, radio information is given to the public setting forth the benefits of remodeling homes and suggesting that the Government will loan the money therefor: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed to make an investigation with a view to determining (1) the authority under which such information is being printed and disseminated; (2) the cost incident to such printing and dissemination, including personnel, motion-picture production, multigraphing, and distribution costs; and (3) all expenditures made since March 4, 1933, by any executive department, independent commission, board, bureau, office, agency, or other establishment of the Government incident to such printing and dissemination. The committee shall report to the Senate as soon as practicable the result of its investigation, together with its recommendations.

For the purposes of this resolution the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions and recesses of the Senate in the Seventy-fourth and succeeding Congresses, to employ such clerical and other assistants, to require by subpoena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, and to make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $25,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I suggest that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the resolution will be so referred.

ROOSEVELT, THE BUILDER—ARTICLE BY SECRETARY ICKES

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, important permanent benefits this country should obtain from public-works appropriations authorized under the leadership of President Roosevelt are comprehensively reviewed in an article in the New York Times of May 12, 1935, by Hon. Harold L. Ickes, the present able Secretary of the Interior.

The necessity and justification for the appropriations and the magnitude and permanence of various projects to be constructed promise to assure our public-spirited President the historic title, "Roosevelt, the Builder."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times of May 12, 1935]

PUBLIC WORKS FOR SOCIAL GAIN—SECRETARY ICKES HOLDS THAT WE HAVE A VAST FIELD FOR MAKING A PROFITABLE INVESTMENT

By Harold L. Ickes, Secretary of the Interior

The United States has entered upon the largest works program, carried in a single appropriation, ever undertaken by this or any other country in time of peace. If we consider this program as the continuation of the activities of the P. W. A., the C. W. A., the T. V. A., the C. C. C., and almost innumerable established Federal, State, municipal, and local agencies, it reaches proportions which make such enterprises as the building of the Pyramids and the construction of the Great Wall of China seem almost petty. The Panama Canal, America's greatest pre-war engineering undertaking, was built at a cost of about one-ninth of the latest public-works appropriation.

Many of the jobs which have been and will be carried out with these funds will be in whole or part self-liquidating. Others will bring returns which cannot be measured in money values. Most of them were, or will be, undertaken with the primary object of giving work, directly and indirectly, to the unemployed. But they involve more than this. If the restoration of purchasing power were all that was aimed at, that object could be attained more speedily by loading our public-works funds into coal cars and shoveling out a million dollars every mile or so in the course of a swing around the country.

Wisely directed public works, of whatever nature, are more than a mere distribution of money. They represent an attempt, entered upon at a time when conditions for just that sort of attempt are favorable, to make our country more productive, more convenient, and more beautiful.

Public works, in time of depression, are not an enforced extravagance, arising out of dire necessity. They are—always provided that they are well conceived and well carried out—an economy. They use labor and tools that would otherwise be idle. They save wealth that would otherwise go to waste. If the 3,500,000 idle men who, it is hoped, will be put to work under the new program, were capable of earning only the low average wage of $3 a day, the daily loss from their unemployment would be $10,500,000, the annual loss in the neighborhood of $3,000,000,000.

Through public works we can turn this loss into a positive gain. The countless tasks that can be performed—the building of roads and parkways, the controlling of rivers, the creation of power, the prevention of erosion, reforestation, rural electrification, the building of new homes for our people—will constitute a secure addition to the national wealth.

They are an investment, also, in the intangible values of the dignity and self-respect of the worker. The nature of the present emergency has made the dole a necessity in hundreds of thousands of cases in this country. But the dole is an un-American thing. Americans instinctively detest it and want to get rid of it. The old idea that there was work in America for every individual who wanted work is too precious a heritage to abandon. It was a priceless ingredient of the individual optimism that made us a confident, vigorous Nation.

I am old-fashioned enough not to want to see it pass from our national life; I am modern enough to be willing to use the power of the Government to create conditions which will insure that it will not pass. Until the average man has attained a standard of life and security far beyond that which he now enjoys, there must be work enough for everyone. When our application of the principles of business freedom cannot provide private work for every willing worker, there is no decent escape for this Nation from the President's determination to promote that work through a public-works program.

What has already been achieved is a measure of what can be achieved. I do not wish to emphasize unduly the accomplishments of the Public Works Administration, but from what the P. W. A. has done and failed to do we can draw some conclusions as to the possibilities of the future.

Starting from scratch, with no previously existing organization, with little experience to guide us, and hampered by various legal and technical conditions inherited from the past, the P. W. A. can point to more than 115,000 projects completed and in use, nearly 5,500 projects under construction, about 2,000 more contracted for and ready to start, more than 2,000,000 persons given work directly, perhaps as many more benefited indirectly.

To get the full record of public works in the United States since the beginning of the depression it would be necessary to include the achievements of other Federal agencies and the activities of States and local communities. But a growth should be noted in the whole theory of public works. We are getting away from the idea of a job as being merely a form of charity, differing from the dole only in being less humiliating to the recipient. We are trying to get rid of the attitude expressed in the phrase "work relief." We want men to feel that what they are doing is worth doing; that they are making a valuable contribution to the general welfare when they do it.

The list of completed P. W. A. projects illustrates what I mean. Our loans and grants have ranged all the way from $400,000,000 for roads and highways, through $80,000,000 for the electrification of the Pennsylvania Railroad, to $350 for a boys' locker room in Emporia, Kans. We have built sewers and water mains; we have spent $18,000,000 in 26 national parks for roads, parkways, trails, and other improvements designed to make them more accessible and to protect their natural beauty; more than $325,000,000 of P. W. A. funds has gone into the magnificent work of the C. C. C., now being recruited to twice its former size under the new appropriation; we have made grants to make tourist travel safer and more pleasant all the way from Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands to Alaska.

Some of these projects have been purely utilitarian—no one looks for esthetic qualities in a sewer. Some have been frankly intended to meet a real but intangible need—we cannot issue bonds against the serenity and loveliness of the Great Smoky Mountains, now made more accessible by trails and roads constructed with Federal funds.

The housing program, including projects completed, under way, and projected, is part of a crusade for better living conditions. I believe it will yield dividends in human values as well as dividends of utility. I believe that every American family is entitled to decent living conditions, to light, to air, to clean streets, to healthful surroundings, to an absence of preventable fire hazards, to parks and playgrounds in order to give the children now playing among noxious garbage cans in filthy alleys a chance to grow into normal and healthy American citizens.

At least a little progress has been made in this direction. The whole of the $150,000,000 fund originally allocated by the P. W. A. for housing has been obligated, and when the projects actually under way, those approved, and those ready to be approved are completed, they will provide 42,161 individual dwellings. The finished projects will replace characteristic run-down, overcrowded tenements and shacks in slum areas, with model apartments that are sanitary, comfortable, and pleasing to the eye. In the same field the Subsistence Homestead Division has been working on model low-cost detached houses.

The recent allocation of $450,000,000 for housing will enable this kind of work to be continued. No one concerned is under the illusion that the houses already built out of public funds will solve the American housing problems. I do believe, however, that a long step forward has been taken in demonstrating the practicability of low-cost housing and that further experimentation will make the point even clearer.

In a sense, the whole United States is but a larger dwelling place, which it is our duty to preserve and to improve for the benefit of our children and our children's children. The land and the water are our heritage and theirs. The moneys spent by the Federal Government on river, harbor, and flood-control projects may be thought of as helping to renovate and modernize our national estate. Boulder Dam, the Columbia River dams at Bonneville and Grand Coulee, the T. V. A.'s expenditure of $50,000,000 to modernize a section of the Tennessee Valley about three-quarters the size of New England, the multitude of public buildings, schools, hospitals, libraries, modern waterworks, sewage-disposal plants built as local projects with Federal subventions make possible an improved national housekeeping on a grand scale.

What remains to be done? No one who has studied the physical needs of the United States, as reflected in countless applications for funds, or as broadly outlined in the reports of the Mississippi Valley Committee and the National Resources Board, can be at a loss for an answer. We have scarcely begun to take full advantage of the infinite possibilities of our country. We have scarcely begun the work of protecting it from the physical dangers, some caused by our own folly, some created by our failure to control the forces of nature that threaten it.

Even if there were no pressing problems of unemployment, the need of large public works to conserve and develop our natural resources, to prevent soil erosion and recurring periods of droughts and floods, would demand our serious consideration. The pressure of unemployment and the terrible warning of the drought and the dust storms demand action to put into effect a policy that has long stood as the matured counsel of wisdom and necessity. Many of the works undertaken under our program of the last 2 years are vitally essential to safeguard America's national capital resources and assure our future prosperity. They are works which we cannot afford not to do.

In broad terms, then, what remains to be done is to give continued employment and more employment on socially, financially, and economically justifiable public works, with particular emphasis on those that conserve national resources. Where are those works to be located? No answer can be given in specific terms until in each case detailed studies have been made.

But we have only to review the notorious facts of water erosion in the Mississippi Valley, of wind erosion in the western plains, of submarginal urban and rural communities, of forests threatened with fire and disease, of water power going to waste, of inadequate recreational facilities, of wild life being exterminated for lack of natural refuges, of vast stretches of country where cheap electricity will lift the whole standard of living, of areas whose prosperity has been retarded by lack of good roads—and this list could be extended if I had space—in order to realize that we have a vast field for the profitable investment of public funds.

I wish to emphasize the last phrase. Public works are as profitable an investment as can be made, whether or not they are in the literal sense of the word self-liquidating. They should not be thought of as merely an enlargement of the public debt, reluctantly assented to in the hope of tiding over a depression. They are, in effect, a transfer of some of the social surplus, which private enterprise cannot at the moment profitably use, to a perfectly sound public investment. They are not inimical to private enterprise, for they do things that private enterprise cannot do. They avoid a tremendous waste which would otherwise take place, and they leave a clear field for individual initiative. The theory of public works does not ask that the Government do anything that private enterprise can and will do as well or better.

The task of public works is a continuing one. It will not end with the present depression. Some of its programs look ahead for 20 years or more. We cannot put our house in order and assume that it will stay in order forever. There will never come a time when constant vigilance will not be needed to conserve and fully to utilize our natural resources. We have passed the stage when we can safely leave them to nature and to the give and take of economic forces. We must interfere with nature in order to give her a chance to serve us. We must limit reckless exploitation in order to preserve the fundamentals of American individualism.

A sound public-works program cannot be brought into being by the pressing of a button. The experience of the P. W. A. would have taught us that, if we had not suspected it already. The P. W. A. had to create, as it went along, the machinery for its work. It could not act as speedily as it wished.

Few who did not have a hand in its program can realize how preparatory in nature its work up to now has had to be, how much heart-breaking effort has had to be put into spade work of which we are only now beginning to enjoy the benefits. There were no plans. There were no surveys. There was not even a coordinated organization which could immediately be put to work upon them. Phases of the work on important Mississippi River developments cannot go forward even today, because fundamental surveys have not been completed. The unsavory tradition of the "pork barrel" has to be transformed into a tradition of Federal works executed as efficiently, as honestly, and as intelligently in the public interest as private builders would build for their own account.

The experience of the past 2 years has been of enormous value. It has brought the removal of many of the impediments, often embedded in obsolete laws, to full cooperation between the Federal Government on the one hand and State and local governments on the other. It has taught us that public works programs are feasible, but that to justify themselves fully they must be well planned, well in advance of the actual need, and so constituted that they give assets of permanent value to the country.

There can be little gain in ill-considered, hastily prepared projects. We must make borings for our dams in order to find out how deep we must go for a firm foundation. We must do the same thing with our general planning. We must adapt our planning and our work to the genius of the American people, which is independent, self-reliant, and opposed to undue centralization. The thinking cannot all be done at the top. It must begin, almost literally, at the grass roots.

So long as Washington is lending or granting the money for public works Washington must be the court of final decision. But Washington must have the aid and cooperation of the State and local public-works agencies, with which its legal, financial, and engineering specialists should work in absolute harmony. The elements of cost, time required, employment to be offered, security of funds, and social desirability must all be passed upon.

There is no magic in dollars as such. We cannot make them perform miracles unless we plan in advance of the need. Planning cannot keep step with a national emergency. It must anticipate such emergencies.

"Human resources and human values", said the foreword to the report of the National Resources Board, "are more significant than the land, water, and minerals on which men are dependent. The application of engineering and technological knowledge to the reorganization of the natural resources of the Nation is not an end in itself, but is to be conceived as a means of progressively decreasing the burdens imposed upon labor, raising the standard of living, and enhancing the well-being of the masses of the people. It follows that the social directives back of such technical programs should be developed by persons competent by training and point of view to appraise the human values involved."

We need to have blueprints ready for the next crisis, which points the need for an enlarged program of public works. But behind the blueprints should be a developing conception of the larger things that need to be done, of the human needs that make them necessary, of the human values that they will serve.

An improvised public-works program that merely "makes work" must always be inadequate. I believe that we must go far beyond any such limited conception. We should turn men's hands to tasks that cry out to be done. When there are such tasks—and those who have tried to look at the physical needs of this vast country as a whole know how many they are—we have no right to deny anyone the chance to work.

We need public works to preserve the human as well as the natural resources of the Nation. We have learned in the field of business and in the field of labor that a measure of equality in bargaining power is necessary in a free market. To maintain a free market in times of stress it may be necessary for government to supply opportunities for livelihood on public works, just as in a past era it provided them on free public lands open for settlement.

Control by government to that degree is essential to insure that the free markets of a modern nation are accessible not to a chosen few but to all who have the capacity and the will to work in any of the various activities which serve man's economic wants and improve the quality of his life.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

POSTMASTER GENERAL FARLEY

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is concluded. Under the unanimous-consent agreement previously entered into, the Chair lays before the Senate the resolution (S. Res. 74), which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 74), which had been reported adversely by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, as follows:

Whereas it has been reported that James A. Farley, acting as Postmaster General and in various other capacities for the United States Government, has conducted a private business for the selling of materials to persons engaged in doing public construction work for the United States Government, and that in some instances concerns buying materials from the said concern in which the said James A. Farley is interested have received contracts through as many as three low bidders being disqualified; and

Whereas it is further alleged that the said concerns favoring the firm of the said James A. Farley with business have been able to secure changes in specifications netting them large sums in profits after the award of contracts, and it being alleged that such changes are deliberately made for the purpose of allowing large profits and avoiding competition; and

Whereas it is further publicly known that the said James A. Farley has used the Printing Office and facilities of the United States Government for the purpose of gratifying personal whims and caprices of personal and political friends, even to the printing of stamps never to be used; and

Whereas it has been further charged that the said James A. Farley is implicated in a wire service leading into the gambling houses in the United States from the race tracks, and is using the functions which he supervises for the Government to pursue said businesses for profit to himself and to his friends; and

Whereas it is further alleged that without pay or compensation for the same, the said James A. Farley has commandeered for his personal use, facilities of public service corporations borrowing money from the United States Government; and

Whereas it has been charged that the said James A. Farley, on the eve of a loan being granted to a railroad in West Virginia, telephoned the leading factor of that concern that it was to his interest to take a certain political position affecting the election of a United States Senator; and

Whereas there are general and specific charges of misconduct, irregularity, dishonesty, and other activity on the part of the said James A. Farley, it is due to the people of the United States, the Government of the United States, and the said James A. Farley that a reasonable and fair disclosure be made of said matters: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Senate of the United States does hereby order an investigation into the public and official conduct of the said James A. Farley and all matters conducted by him affecting the business of the United States and the expenditure of funds of the United States, and that the said committee be composed of 3 Members of the United States Senate, not more than 2 of whom shall be members of the same political party, to be selected by the Vice President of the United States and to be approved by the said Senate; and that said committee shall have all authority necessary and proper to procure evidence, summon witnesses, to hear testimony and compel the production of books, records, accounts, statistics, employ experts, and do any and all such other things as may be necessary to carry out the purpose of said investigation; and be it further

Resolved, That any reports of investigations and data secured by the Department of the Interior, particularly through Louis Glavis and those associated with him, on the affairs in which said James A. Farley has participated for the Government of the United States, be forthwith furnished to the United States Senate to be, after proper perusal by Members of the said United States Senate, referred to the said committee to be provided for herein.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I do not care to take the initiative in the discussion if the Senator from Tennessee

[Mr. McKELLAR] wishes it otherwise. The question is on a report from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. If the Senator from Tennessee prefers, I have no objection to his having the right to speak first as the sponsor of the report, but if he does not so prefer I shall proceed.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I know the Senator, like myself, is interested in the unfinished business which cannot come up until 2 o'clock. I should not like to interfere with the consideration of the resolution. May we not have an agreement to vote on the resolution at or before 2 o'clock or, if it is desired to have an hour or two for discussion after 2 o'clock, I should be willing to ask unanimous consent to lay aside the unfinished business for that length of time and for that purpose. I do not want to proceed on the theory that we are going to debate the resolution all day.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I should be very happy to agree to a limitation of debate. I have no objection at all to such an agreement. If the Senator would prefer the request it certainly would not be objected to by me.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to have an expression from the Senator from Louisiana on that suggestion.

Mr. LONG. I am very sorry. I have no objection at any time the Senator sees fit to temporarily laying aside this matter to take up the T. V. A. bill. However, I do not want to agree to limitation of debate.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the unfinished business be laid before the Senate at 2 o'clock?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is of the opinion that it will not. It is a peculiar agreement which was entered into by the Senate. There are some precedents on all fours with it. Former Senator Smoot at one time requested that following the disposal of morning business 2 weeks from that day a Senate bill be taken up and voted upon prior to the adjournment of the legislative day, which request was granted. At the specified time the bill was laid before the Senate. Its consideration continued for 5 calendar days, and the unfinished business then pending was not taken up for consideration until after the other bill had been disposed of under the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. NORRIS. When this unanimous consent was granted I was at lunch. I should have objected had I been in the Chamber. Both the Senator from Tennessee and the Senator from Louisiana are supporters of the bill which is now the unfinished business of the Senate. I should not consent, if I can prevent it, to having a filibuster conducted indefinitely on this resolution. While I expect to listen to the debate, my present intention is to vote for the resolution of the Senator from Louisiana. I am not opposing the Senator's resolution, but if discussion of his resolution is going to continue indefinitely it is my intention to make a motion, after I think the debate has proceeded as long as it should, to lay it on the table.

Mr. LONG. I think I shall complete what I have to say in a brief space of time. However, I understand that the administration has arranged to have me discussed for several hours, so I might want to reply. It would not take a great while to discuss Mr. Farley's case, but I understand some Senators will want to discuss me; and that being the case, I might want to have some chance to reply. That is why I do not agree to any limitation of debate on the resolution. However, I am not going to object.

Mr. NORRIS. If I reach the conclusion that the debate is extending beyond a reasonable time I shall not feel that I am trying to defeat the resolution if I submit a motion to lay it on the table, because that will be the only way to prevent an indefinite continuation of the debate.

Mr. LONG. I hope the Senator will not do that, because I am not going to take long to discuss it. It is rather an important matter.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I am in hearty sympathy with the bill which the Senator from Nebraska has before the Senate. I am supporting that bill as strongly as I know how to do. I do not think the pending resolution should take much time. I am perfectly willing to vote on it as it is now. It is the resolution of the Senator from Louisiana, however, and if he wishes to speak on it I think he should have an opportunity to do so.

Mr. LONG. I am willing to agree to a limit on debate. What time do Senators wish to fix as a limit? Let us agree to a limit on debate.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Louisiana has the floor. Does the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Do I understand that there is a proposal to limit debate to 10 minutes?

Mr. LONG. Oh, no! [Laughter in the galleries.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let there be order in the galleries. The Chair wishes to make a statement to our guests in the galleries, so that they may understand the situation.

The occupants of the galleries are not to engage in laughter or disturbance of any kind. If our guests in the galleries respect the rules, they will refrain from it. It makes no difference how the proceedings may impress them; they will please refrain from laughter.

Mr. LONG. I understand that the Senator from Tennessee has a record to read about me, and I have a record to read about the man who is to read the record; so that is going to take a little time.

Mr. McKELLAR. What time would the Senator suggest?

Mr. LONG. So far as I am concerned, I am willing to limit my remarks to an hour and a half.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent that debate on this resolution be limited to 3 hours, one hour and a half to be controlled by the Senator from Louisiana and one hour and a half to be controlled by the chairman of the committee, and at the end of that time that the Senate vote on the resolution.

Mr. LONG. Let me ask if we cannot agree to make that 2 hours to the side, because there may be some Senators here besides myself who will wish to speak on my side.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator from Louisiana and the Senator from Tennessee that there is a question involved in this matter which has not been discussed by either of the Senators, which I think may be discussed before the resolution is disposed of. Therefore, while I do not wish to postpone the ultimate disposition of the resolution, I do not desire to have the entire time consumed by the two Senators.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that debate on the resolution be limited to 2 hours on a side, and that at the end of that time the Senate vote on the resolution without further debate.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is exactly the same request I have already preferred.

Mr. McNARY, Mr. BORAH, and Mr. ROBINSON addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Louisiana has the floor.

Mr. LONG. I yield to the Senator from Oregon, and the Senator from Idaho, too, if I can.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I do not know the exact difference between the two proposals which have been made, but it seems to me there are at least three sides to this controversy. The Senator from Louisiana occupies one position, the Senator from Tennessee another, and still there are two minority reports from the Republican members of the committee. In some respects that makes four sides instead of two.

Under the circumstances, all things considered, I suggest that we proceed with the consideration of the resolution, and later in the day we can probably get together. I shall object now to any agreement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Louisiana has the floor.

IF ARITHMETIC IS TO COUNT, WE WILL INVESTIGATE FARLEY

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I will ask my friends in the Senate to give me their attention without interrupting me, if possible, for a little while, until I have had an opportunity to cover this matter.

I have presented to the Senate a resolution asking for an investigation of Mr. Farley. I coupled with that resolution a request that the Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Ickes, send to the Senate whatever data he had that were included in an investigation that related to Mr. Farley. That matter was broken into two parts. The resolution addressed to Mr. Ickes, as modified, was agreed to, and the other part of the resolution went to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

The Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads has a very limited jurisdiction in this matter, if it has any jurisdiction to amount to anything at all. The only reason why ordinarily the matter would have gone to that committee would have been that the committee would pass upon whether or not there could be an investigation, as a mere matter of giving the resolution a right to be sent to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. In other words, the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads was not supposed to try the case. No one was allowed to summon a witness before the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads for the same reason that the investigation ultimately was not ordered. If I may explain, had I undertaken to summon a witness, I should have been met with the very objection which was made against a committee being appointed to investigate Mr. Farley until the expenditure had first been approved. I do not suppose that statement will be disputed. The point I am making is that I could not, nor could the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, hear the witnesses in this case.

What was the report supposed to contain to make out a prima facie case? I gave the names of witnesses, and also disclosed the existence of other witnesses who would be produced before the committee if there should be an investigation. I alleged a number of acts. In the report that the committee makes, I do not know what it means by its statement about there being "no prima facie case." I do not suppose a prima facie case could be made out without evidence; but if one is going to say that evidence is not required, that sufficient charges have not been made out to warrant an investigation of Mr. Farley, then, as a lawyer, I should like to know how anyone ever could come before this body and allege enough facts to justify an investigation.

Mr. President, the undisputed facts of this case are these:

No. 1: That Mr. Farley, according to the allegations of this resolution and the letter of proof given to the committee, first manipulated the award of contracts. I have alleged, and I have submitted proof for it, that James A. Farley, the Postmaster General, is not only in the control of the appointment of the Federal prosecuting officials, but that in certain enumerated cases he has regulated the conduct of Federal prosecuting officials against certain designated parties, and I have listed the witnesses who could give evidence to prove that allegation. I alleged that in Kansas City one Tony Lazzia—a man of Italian extraction, probably—was up for indictment and prosecution; that Mr. Farley was called into the case by Mr. Pendergast, of Kansas City, not through any ill conduct on the part of Mr. Pendergast, but because the circumstances and facts proved that Mr. Farley was the only man to go to in order to get the kind of action that he wanted had; and that when Mr. Pendergast called upon Mr. Farley, Mr. Farley intervened, and that the Federal prosecuting official undertook to withhold and to withdraw and to prevent any indictment, as a result of which the foreman of the grand jury rose in court and asked the judge of the court if he would be permitted, with his fellow members of the grand jury, to return an indictment. He was informed by the court that he could do so; and they returned the indictment, prosecuted Mr. Lazzia, and secured a conviction.

I have produced the letter written to Mr. Farley, and the testimony of Mr. Pendergast, which Mr. Pendergast, of course, admits, and the conclusions of which show beyond any peradventure of question that Mr. Farley was in control of that particular party.

The other day my attention was attracted by an administration newspaper in this city, wherein they cartooned Mr. Farley as sitting behind the judicial seats of this country or of this particular territory, and placing there those of his choice whom he wished to act as the enforcers and regulators of the law.

That is no. 1; but if you have tears, prepare to shed them before I get through. I am not going to leave this matter to the imagination of anybody. I am not going to leave it to anybody's imagination, gentlemen of the Senate. Before I take my seat on this floor I shall compel every man in the Senate who can add 2 and 2, or who can subtract 4 from 10, to admit that Mr. Farley was the manipulating party of a diabolical fraud which no Member of the Senate can refuse to know to be a fact; and every man who votes for his whitewash will have to do so without adding up the figures, because if he should do so his conscience would not allow him to vote for a whitewash.

Before I take my seat I will uncover the element of this Capital City who have been trying to cover up this man on the ground that there was no evidence that they would allow to be produced before a committee.

You have a report here that you are not going to allow the sworn testimony to be taken; but I have something here that already appears of their own records, and which I shall disclose before I take my seat on the floor of the Senate, which means that you will have to say that notwithstanding the fact that the indelible proof is there of the swindle and the robbery and the defalcations that have been committed against this country through this man Farley, nonetheless you are going to hold out and keep sworn testimony from coming before a committee of the Senate.

If you have tears, prepare to shed them, because they will come before I get through.

Now let me proceed. That is no. 1. What was allegation no. 2? Allegation no. 2, I might properly say, was that there was a man here from the State of Texas, who came here for the purpose of assisting Mr. Farley in raising some money, and in securing for himself an appointment as United States district attorney for one of the districts of Texas.

What happened to his case? I have a copy of a telegram by which this man, who was a candidate for appointment as United States attorney, wired down to his own clients. The telegram stated, in substance:

I have the matter in good shape. Everything is going to be all right. Wire me so much money real quick. And I don't mean maybe.

He used those words. Whereupon a wire came, and Mr. James A. Farley acknowledged the receipt of the money direct to the man who had remitted it through his lawyer, as the result of which, and Mr. Farley's acknowledgment, when it got a little bit tangled up, they double-crossed the poor man out of whom they looted the thousand dollars, told him to plead guilty on the ground that there was going to be a very small sentence imposed upon him. As a result, after they had befuddled the poor man into giving up his money while he was under the indictment, Mr. Farley appointed his lawyer as a United States attorney, and, through the appointment of the United States attorney, they seized the poor man under indictment, whose money they had gotten, and sent him off to the penitentiary. I have shown that I have the witnesses to prove that kind of rascality, and I have named the witnesses, and I have produced the telegrams. But it is said that does not make out a prima facie case. Mr. Farley says it is not so; therefore it is not!

That was no. 2. Now I come to no. 3. I said, and I listed the number of witnesses by whom to prove it, though their names were undisclosed, that when there was a campaign on for United States Senator in the State of West Virginia a certain very influential official, an attorney of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, received a telephone call from Mr.

Farley at a time when there was pending with the Reconstruction Finance Corporation an application for a loan of $50,000,000 to the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad. He telephoned to this official telling him to get in line for Mr. Clem Shaver. I allege that this official went to other persons and said they had him where he could not help himself, that he would have to come out for Mr. Clem Shaver; and that as a matter of fact he did come out for Mr. Clem Shaver. A few days later the R. F. C. authorized the loan of $50,000,000 to the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, and they had not authorized it before that.

What is allegation no. 4? It is the Hillside Development case. In that case it was shown without any question whatever that the brick and other materials sold on that job were sold in part by the General Builders Supply Co., sold in derogation of the law, which forbade the Postmaster General to profit directly or indirectly by it. That went on in the face of a statute to which practically no attention has been paid.

Now I come to no. 5. I allege that Mr. Farley, as the handler of the postage stamps, printed up special issues of postage stamps the value of which was hundreds of thousands of dollars, and probably nearly a half million dollars; that he awarded his friends several hundred thousand dollars' worth of postage stamps, the value of which amounted to that much, and that it was known by Farley that it amounted to that much.

He did not merely give out a few postage stamps. What that man gave out was something that sold on the market, at the time he gave them out, or very soon thereafter, for as much as $500,000. He was allowed to, and did, go in and print up those documents, and he gave them out not only to certain friends—he gave them out, I allege and I will prove, to people who were being solicited to buy stuff from the General Builders' Supply Co. He gave them out to people who were being solicited to give business to that company, and he gave one of them stamps of a market value of $40,000, not for politics alone but in order that the Stewart Contracting Co., to whom he was selling materials, could get business with this private concern.

He later demanded those stamps back, after they had been deposited in the bank and something like twenty or thirty thousand dollars had been borrowed on them; and they could not get the stamps out of the bank, because they had already been hypothecated. Talk about a little thing!

What is Mr. Farley's defense for that? He says there were other Postmasters General who violated the same law. No one is going to dispute that it was a flagrant violation of law. It was not a nickel, or a dime, or a souvenir; it was dollars and cents, hundreds of thousands of dollars and cents, with which this man was dealing, and he palmed these things off to get business for Stewart & Co.; he palmed them off to get money for their clients; he palmed them off to get business for the General Builders' Supply Co.; and when he was caught with the wool in his teeth, what did he do? He announced that he was going to flood the market with another issue of those stamps.

What does the committee do? Does the committee say that this was not a violation of law? No; it does not. It cannot. There is not a committee that ever sat in the United States that alleged itself to be following the law that will not have to admit that, according to the statute which I have put into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, any officer or any other person taking stamps of the United States, belonging to the United States, is guilty of violation of a criminal law.

Lo and behold, I remember when post-office inspectors used to go around and pick up a little country postmaster who had let out as much as $10 worth of stamps, and prosecute the poor devil and send him to the penitentiary for the $10 worth of stamps which had been handled irregularly, or contrary to law and postal regulations. But here is a man who has been allowed to use the facilities of the United States to give out to his friends these stamps worth half a million dollars, and he gives as a defense that somebody else did it before he went in there. Somebody stole a horse, and therefore I can steal four horses. That is the defense offered by Farley.

The committee thinks it had the Glavis report, but the majority of the committee did not find anything in the Glavis report which required an investigation. They did not have the Glavis report. They had the papers which had been left in there after they rifled the files. The committee had the papers they had left in the Glavis report. The committee thought they had the papers out of the office of the Secretary of the Interior. If they thought that, they did not know how to read what they had. I shall read some of them in a moment. But that is not half of it. They did not have them all.

They prepared for this investigation. I think I will be able to present a little proof along that line in a moment. When they found that this investigation was to be made, when we brought in this resolution calling on Mr. Ickes to send up those papers, why did it take Ickes 3 weeks to send them? Why did it take Ickes 3 weeks to send those papers to the Senate?

I see my friend the Senator from Tennessee writing a memorandum. He is going to show that it would take 3 weeks, but before he will ever have to use that memorandum, I will read him something that will explain it, so that he will scratch out that note. He will make another one before we get through.

Why did it take 3 weeks? The distinguished Senator from Tennessee, whom I love as I love no other man in this body [laughter]—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLARK in the chair). The Chair must admonish the occupants of the galleries that they are here as guests of the Senate, and demonstrations of approval, or disapproval, or of amusement are strictly forbidden by the rules of the Senate. The Chair hopes it will not be necessary again to admonish the occupants of the galleries on this point.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, here is a document which the Senator from Tennessee had before him when he was chairman of the committee. I want to show the Senator that he did not even read page 1, or his inquiring mind would have compelled him to go further. If he had read page 1 he would have gotten some idea of what was going on. I say that because I know how keen he has been on the scent in the air mail business, and rightfully so, probably, in many respects, at least. If the Senator had read page 1, what would he have found?

He would have found what this man Glavis said, Mr. President, and if I had not found this I might not have accepted certain information which came to me, as I have been afraid to take certain information that came to me from the outside, but I managed to verify this thing right up to where there could not be any question about it.

Here is the Glavis report, one of them, and then I will show the Senate something else, and if the Senator from Tennessee had read it I believe his inquiring mind would have said that we ought to inquire a little further about this thing, at least we ought not to stop the inquiry, because at this point the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads did not have any right to conduct an investigation anyway. The only thing the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads was called upon to say was whether or not they would recommend to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate that there be an appropriation for this investigation. That was the situation under that new statute which was passed here, which the former Senator from Ohio, Mr. Fess, sponsored when the Republicans were trying to keep any more investigation from being had—the Republicans, I guess, did that, although I cannot say because I was not here.

Here is what Mr. Glavis said in a document which he wrote:

The facts are that the conference was opened by Mr. Mellick demanding to know the specific charges and sources thereof, followed by his statement that he considered the investigation directed against the Treasury Department.

Note that now, that he considered that they were investigating the Treasury Department when they were looking into Farley's connection with these jobs. They said they did not look into Farley because Ickes said in his report he never investigated Farley. I am going to show the Senate what he did and then stopped it. Why? I will show the Senate when they stopped. They did not stop when the thing got mysterious. They stopped when they got right up against the proposition where they had to say it was a skin game and a fraud or say nothing, and they recommended to say nothing.

Right 10 pages deep in this report I find this language—I did not read this thing until the other day:

The facts are that the conference was opened by Mr. Mellick demanding to know the specific charges and sources thereof, followed by his statement that he considered the investigation directed against the Treasury Department. Further, practically every question was put by Special Agent Bruce from a prepared list intended to be asked the contractors, but answered by Mr. Mellick after being informed what the questions were.

The alleged irregularities connected with James Stewart & Co. on which it was considered necessary and important to investigate their record were:

1. The change in marble.

I hope the Chair will listen to this, because the Chair was in a group which went to protest, I was told, but the Chair, being like me, did not know what he was running into and either they satisfied the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] or he is as I was—he did not know any better until somebody came and told him and showed him just what he had before him.

1. The change in marble. After the awarding of the contract to them for which they allowed a credit of $140,000, but for which it is alleged the credit should have been much larger—

I skip to 7.

Whether or not the total amount of marble—

Listen to this, Members of the Senate—

originally aggregated 55,000 feet—

It was 60,000 feet. He was guessing at it. This man Glavis had heard about it. I will show the Senate it was 60,000 cubic feet, but he says around 55,000—and has been reduced to 46,000 feet; and if so, has a commensurable credit been received by the Government.

All right. What happened to that? He said that is what they were to investigate. Did they investigate it? Let us see if they did. Here is another letter in which it is said:

As it appears from your letter that it is now found advisable—

Listen to this—to reverse—

This is another one of the gentlemen who was going to let them investigate the Treasury Department, but one of the Treasury men, Mr. Peeples, wrote and says:

As it appears from your letter that it is now found advisable to reverse the arranged method of procedure and make an examination of the books of James Stewart & Co. with respect to the courthouse
* * * ordered at New York—

That is this same project where the marble was to be used. In other words, he said, "I am going to investigate Stewart first." I am going to show the Senate that before they ever got to Stewart they were warned and told by Mr. Farley himself, through Mr. Watts, that Stewart had to burn up every file they had, and that Stewart & Co. instituted a brand new filing system and opened up an entirely new thing and fired the old filing clerk, so there would not be anything there. That will come in in a moment.

But wait a minute. All we want to do is to chase this thing down. What did they do with it? I hope the Senate will hear this. What did they do with this report? When they found he said here in one of these statements—I have not got the time to read it all—that it appeared that more than double the award would have had to be allowed as a deduction for substituting that marble, he said:

In view of the requirements of the Treasury Department—

They substituted lawyers along about that time up there in the Treasury Department. Some of the Senators know why.

I will show the Senate why in a minute. I will show why they did it. They did a whole lot of funny business up there, and I heard some Senators on the floor say they could not understand why they were doing it. I was reading as follows:

In view of the requirement of the Treasury Department that before any of the contractor's files could be examined the names of the complainants and sources of all complaints be furnished, as well as the specific complaints upon which the investigation was being instituted—

Notice that. After they had got the details of what they had done?

As such procedure would make an investigation practically impossible—

Notice that, Members of the Senate—and reveal the sources of information confidentially secured, it is recommended the investigation of the above allegations by this division be considered closed, the project in question not being under P. W. A.

When they ran right up on it and state right here in their own words that there had been a skin game under these allegations, that they had reduced those quantities 11,000 feet—and that is not half of it; wait until I get to it and show the Senate what it was—when they came up to the door of it and there could not be any way of getting around it, after they burned up files of Stewart & Co., they came in and said, "We recommend that we do not go into any further, but that this thing be closed, and that there be no further proceedings."

Perhaps that would be enough. But perhaps it is not, because we are dealing with some mighty recalcitrant minds on this matter; we are dealing with some minds which are prejudiced because perhaps they have been running the other way in some cases. That alone might have been sufficient. I hope Members of the Senate will pay very particular attention to what I am going to read. I am going to wait until I get very complete silence in the Senate, because I want every Member of the Senate to hear what I am going to read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. LONG. I desire my friend from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] to hear me on this, and I am going to wait until they finish, if necessary, because I want both of them to hear me on this matter. I am perhaps more anxious to have them hear me than to have the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] hear me, because there is party responsibility in this matter.

State of New York, county of New York.

Now listen to this, Members of the Senate. Here is an affidavit from an employee who was paid around $300 a month by the firm of Stewart & Co. This employee was a very confidential employee, handling everything from the most confidential matters to the telephone calls which came in, and everything else. She handled the switchboard. She handled various and sundry other things, and she drew a weekly salary of $63 a week from the firm of James Stewart & Co. Here is an affidavit which this lady has made.

State of New York, county of New York.

I have here proof from the Government files to show the Senate that everything which she has said has been verified. I have here everything that I can find from Government records, and I would not have found those if it had not been for this affidavit. I would never read the affidavit to the Senate if I had not found that proof substantiating it in the Government files.

My name is Helen Humphreys, my residence is St. Albans, Long Island, N. Y., and I make this statement to be verified by affidavit, of my own free will and without the promise of any reward or other consideration and for the sole cause of public good, viz:

It is a matter of my own personal knowledge—

And she says she will bring any number of witnesses to substantiate anything that they want—that the firm of James Stewart & Co., Inc., some years ago took into its employ one Harry D. Watts, who at first served as contact manager for the purpose of securing new business, and after about 1 year he was made vice president of the business at about $12,000 salary; the said Watts did not have the money to pay for the stock placed in his name on some kind of credit basis; at about the time of the election in 1932 the said Watts began to make representations to and later demands upon the Messrs. A. M. and James C. Stewart that, on account of contacts he had with James A. Farley, representing that big business was to accrue through Government business thereby, and that for the work that he could and would bring that he should have advancement in pay and position with the firm and a contract for not less than 3 years at a salary of about $25,000 per year—with a share in profits and without his sharing in the losses; that the said Watts, in course of his demands, caused a telegram to be exhibited, either sent through Farley in person or through Farley's brother-in-law, Harry Finnegan, offering him a position to serve as an assistant in the Treasury Department to control letting of public contracts, and stated that if he were not given the promotion and contract demanded, he would control the Government's business in favor of other concerns and use the connection which he had with Farley to the disadvantage, rather than to the profit of, the said Stewart firm, and after considerable delay the demands of said Watts were fully met, and among remarks made to deponent by said Stewart brothers was that there would be little other than Government business for the next 3 or 5 years, and that having begun with said Watts it was imperative that the said firm should use the connection rather than to have the same used against it at that late date.

That is, that the minute that Roosevelt was elected Watts demanded that they double his salary and give him a 3-year contract, and he said:

That the said Stewart brothers called in deponent at about the time of the aforesaid negotiations with said Watts and instructed her, that since they feared the said Watts and the turns and things which he might do, she should carefully listen to all conversation which the said Watts might have, particularly by telephone, and report the same to them regularly.

Then the said Watts was often called, not only by Farley and Farley's secretaries, both in Washington and in New York, and said Watts was called and called upon by the said Farley's brother-in-law, Harry Finnegan, and said Watts was in frequent conversation on calls made by said Watts with said Farley and his said aides; and on one occasion—

Get this, gentlemen of the Senate—

And on one occasion the said Farley called the said Watts from a pay station to avoid any chance of detection; all of which covered a wide range of matters having to do with the manipulating of Government business and grants and contracts, among which were included the following:

Here is what she lists as among the things that she remembers and can produce testimony about:

1. How insurance premiums in which Farley was interested should be given to one J. L. Nolan, and the particulars thereof.

In other words, Nolan was a party interposed to get the insurance premiums on Government business, and Farley called there time and time again as to when and how they paid the insurance premiums on this Government business to J. L. Nolan, so that Farley could get it.

2. The awarding and placing of orders for marble on the Federal Office Building in New York.

I have just read you about that, but I am coming back to it. This party swore at a time when we did not have any proof of it at all that they had conversations there in and out manipulating arrangements through which this trade was pulled off, and I am going to give letters and figures which they cannot contradict to save their lives.

3. The making of arrangements for meeting of Farley and Watts while Farley was in New York and the designation of the time and place of meetings.

It gets hotter as it goes on.

4. For the giving of certain materials—

I found out something that I did not know—

For the giving of certain materials to various concerns in which Farley disclosed interest and concern.

I looked for the General Builders Supply Co. She says that is not where to find it all. What happened was that they went to the contractor when his bid was up to be accepted or not accepted and they told this man, "Your bid is not going to be accepted because you are not a responsible contractor, or you did not file an N. R. A. certificate on time, or you did not sign the President's reemployment agreement, but we have got a way that we can get the contract accepted in your name." In that manner they did most of their business by the General Supply Co., and she names dates, persons, and particulars.

5. For $303,000—

Gentlemen of the Senate, you can find out from investigating these books and records facts that they will not be able to quibble about to save their lives.

5. For $303,000 to be given to the Raisler Heating Co., in which Farley indicated his interest, which said Watts indicated had been done per orders.

She said that Farley rang up and gave the details as to how that money was to be given, and that he rang Farley back and said, "Jim, I have handed over the money; it is all fixed."

6. Conversations relative to valuable stamps being given—

Now listen to this. You have been told to laugh about this business, but when you see this you will not laugh about an attack being made on this stamp matter. It is a whole lot more serious than you think, as you will discover if you will listen to this lady. I had been inclined somewhat to regard that as a matter that did not amount to much, except as a souvenir proposition, but wait until you hear this, and there are bank records to back it up if you think this witness is not telling the truth.

6. Conversations relative to valuable stamps being given by Farley to Watts; later pay-station calls from Farley to Watts that the matter was in serious shape; Watts' information that the stamps had been given as per understanding to one Randolph Cook, with the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. for business to be had from the railroad to the said Stewart Co.; Watts calls to Cook, which failed to materialize; later Watts calls to Eiseman with the same railroad office in Philadelphia, whereby information came that said stamps had been deposited in a bank as security for a loan, with the resultant later printing of stamps to undo the harm.

I am told he got $40,000 for those stamps, and he could not get the $40,000 back; and when Mr. Farley said, "I have got to get these stamps back", he said, "I used those stamps to get business with the Pennsylvania Railroad. This man is the purchasing agent in charge of the letting of contracts and the purchasing of material for the Pennsylvania Railroad, and I have used these stamps to get in with this fellow; he has taken the stamps and sold them, and we are going to have trouble; we have got to do something about this, because he has put them up and got thousands of dollars." Do not investigate. No. It will not do. We have got to protect the party.

No. 7—

This will disclose something. When you investigate that nabob of New York here we will find the Democratic Party doing just what the Republican Party did about Daugherty. They will wash themselves with whitewash instead of washing Farley with whitewash. We will put on whitewash and erect a white wall between us and Farley, and get him as many miles away from us as possible.

7—

This is rather cogent, too—

7. That Farley had managed to grab all the papers—

Here is the telephone conversation between Watts and Farley. It happened, this lady says, about the time that we called for these papers from Mr. Harold Ickes, and the investigation was about to occur, and, therefore, the telephone conversation came in:

7. That Farley had managed to grab all the papers and correspondence between Ickes, Green, and Glavis—

I did not know there was a man by the name of "Green" until I picked up that record and found that Green was a high "muck-a-muck" in it—

7. That Farley had managed to grab all the papers and correspondence between Ickes, Green, and Glavis (which occurred about the time said papers were being called for in Washington for investigation) and that Farley desired that Watts should come over to the New York office of Farley to go over the matters.

Here I was waiting 3 weeks for them to send in those papers, while Farley was sending word to Watts that he had all the papers and to "come over and let us see what we will leave in there that Huey Long is going to be allowed to see."

I had a fine chance with the papers in New York in Farley's office and word being sent to the other man to come and look over the papers and see what they could afford to leave in the files.

And deponent has various detailed proof of such matters and others of the kind to submit and other witnesses whose names she can give to prove the same.

That further, pursuant to such calls, the entire files of the said Stewart Co. were taken out and mostly destroyed and a new filing system installed on advance notice that investigation would likely soon occur.

[N. Y. Co. Clks. No. 23, Reg. No. 7B374. Term expires Mar. 30, 1937.]

Mr. WHEELER. What is the date of the affidavit?

Mr. LONG. The affidavit was signed the 23d day of April 1935. I was lying in bed one night, about 11 o'clock, when the telephone rang. Someone was calling from New York. A lady asked me if I had investigated the court building. I told her I had heard something about it—the post-office building or the court building. She said, "If you care to come to New York, maybe I can give you some information." I said, "Can you not come to Washington?" She said, "No." It was then about 11 o'clock, or perhaps 11:30. Whatever hour it was, by 12 o'clock, I think, I was on my way to New York. I met the lady the next morning and time after time she told me something that I checked back as well as I could on Washington, and found out that that woman could not be telling anything but the truth. Then she handed me pencil memoranda, and I still have those memoranda with me. Some of them are more embarrassing than anything I have said; some of them get closer home.

Gentlemen of the Senate, I leave for you to consider one of the things they did that a blind man can see.

They had a contract, Mr. President and the Senator from Missouri, to use Missouri marble in the courthouse building in New York City—32,000 cubic feet of Ste. Genevieve marble and 24,000 cubic feet of Ozark marble, as I believe they call it. That contract, which was let before the 4th day of March 1933, was for 60,000 cubic feet—56,000 cubic feet of Missouri and 4,000 cubic feet of Vermont. The price f. o. b. New York of the Missouri marble was $12.50 a cubic foot; the price of the Vermont marble f. o. b. New York City was $4 a cubic foot.

Get that, Senators, 56,000 cubic feet of Missouri marble at $12.50 and 4,000 cubic feet of Vermont marble at $4. That was the specification of the marble contract written into the post-office-building contract under the Hoover administration. What did they do? The architect was not heard from, but there came a letter of June 15, 1933, addressed to the supervising architect from James Stewart & Co. saying, "We propose, in lieu of the marble that has been prescribed for this new post-office building in New York City, that we will subject the following quantities and kinds of marble." How did they do it? Very cleverly. So much from New York, so much from Missouri, so much from Vermont, so much from Indiana, so much from this State, and so much from that State. A delegation from Missouri went on to protest that they had taken away two-thirds of the marble that thus come out of Missouri, and the answer to that Missouri delegation was that all the other States were complaining and "we are having to do something to scatter this marble work among the other States, so Missouri will not get it all."

I almost believe there was somebody back in the Hoover administration who cooked up this crooked business in advance to occur at a later time, but I could not say that is true. Having had some experience in contracts, they left the loopholes there so all they had to do was to find the man who would do it and pull off this contract.

Gentlemen of the Senate, in writing these marble contracts they do not state the quantities. They said, "This wall shall be Missouri marble, this floor shall be Missouri marble, this ceiling shall be Missouri marble." They did not put in the contract "60,000 cubic feet of marble." They left that out. But the facts were that that could be done with 46,000 cubic feet of marble instead of 60,000 cubic feet. Stewart wrote the letter. I have a copy of the letter which I got out of the Comptroller's office after my force had been told at the Treasury Department that I could not have it. In that letter he said, "We will use so much marble." Adding up the quantities we get 46,000 cubic feet. What was the price of that marble? I have the details here. Perhaps the Senate would like to have that letter in full. I have it here and can read it all. Here is the letter and I shall send it to the desk to be read or printed in the RECORD.

The whole thing added up in this way: One thousand two hundred feet of Montana marble—they may have said the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] was complaining and wanted some Montana marble used. When someone went up to complain about it they were told that the Senator from Missouri or the Representative from Missouri were interested in this matter and "are liable to jump on us, so we have scattered the marble around." There were 1,200 feet of Montana marble and 6,000 feet of Ozark marble. They reduced that down to about one-third. Then there were 2,000 feet of Ste. Genevieve marble. That had been 34,000 feet, but they reduced that down to 2,000 feet. There were 4,000 more feet of Tennessee marble. They said, "That fellow from Tennessee is likely to come here and complain, so we have to give him 4,000 feet of marble." Then there were 4,000 feet of Georgia marble that was used to pacify, apparently, the delegation from Georgia. It all added up 46,000 cubic feet.

According to the specifications filed and the bids filed, according to their own figures, according to their own specifications, the marble they were to furnish would have cost about $700,000 or $600,000 more money than the marble furnished in substitution. They made an allowance of $140,000. Making every kind of allowance on the top side face of the globe, at the very least there were 387,000 cold dollars clear profit that went into the pocket of James Stewart & Co. out of the contract price. There is no way to explain it.

When they came to the Glavis investigation growing out of the Interior Department, when they got right up against it, what did they do? Lo and behold, there was a hand which crept in there more powerful than the hand of the investigators. They said, "This thing dare not go any farther"; and the thing never went any farther. They said, "We must have this thing dropped"; and that thing was dropped.

I have all the details which I have stated merely in substance. At the conclusion of my remarks I shall offer them for printing in the RECORD so anyone may read all the details which I have prepared. I shall offer them for publication at the conclusion of my remarks so any Senator who has not understood and who wants the details and quantities and everything can get them. I send the statement to the desk and ask that it be printed at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See Exhibit A.)

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, there is just a part of the case. By the way, how long have I been talking? Have I been talking 30 or 40 minutes?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Louisiana that no record of time has been kept because there is no unanimous-consent agreement limiting debate. The Senator claimed the floor in his own right and has been proceeding in that way.

Mr. LONG. I do not care to take any more of the time of the Senate than is necessary. Here is the record. The only thing I have asked is to investigate Mr. Farley. Here is the record showing the banks where the details can be found, showing the post offices where the details can be found, showing the contract firms where the details can be found. The witnesses are listed. I have gone to the trouble of writing the committee a 9- or 10-page letter, detailing the names of the witnesses and what they would testify. We are not allowed to go into the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and summon witnesses and produce the testimony. The only way by which this investigation can be had and entry may be had into these details is through process of the Senate.

Mr. President, I submit these matters to the Senate.

EXHIBIT A

James Stewart & Co., Inc., contractors, took the Federal Government out of more than $350,000—and that is a very conservative estimate—on the New York Federal courthouse job, through the aid and assistance of Postmaster General James Aloysius Farley.

This fraud was perpetrated on the American people by permitting a modification of the specifications for installation of marbles in the interior halls, vestibules, lobbies, and corridors of the new United States courthouse in New York City.

The original specifications called for the installation of approximately 56,000 cubic feet of Missouri marbles, which are the finest in the world, apparently, and which cost far more than any other marble.

The original specifications for the New York Federal courthouse called for the installation—I am reliably informed by an architect friend—of 34,000 cubic feet of Ste. Genevieve golden vein Missouri marble and of 22,000 cubic feet of Ozark stainless marble. Both of these are Missouri marbles.

The lowest bid for the installation of these Missouri marbles in the interior of the new New York Federal courthouse was $1,010,000. The specifications, I am told, were so written that no bid could be made for substitution of any other marbles for these marbles. There was one set of specifications. All bids had to be made on those specifications. Those specifications called for 34,000 cubic feet of Ste. Genevieve golden vein marble and 22,000 cubic feet of Ozark stainless marble. Another 4,000 cubic feet of Vermont marble were included in the specifications for other interior parts of the building. I am not positive whether the bid for these 4,000 cubic feet of Vermont marble was included in the $1,010,000 bid. My informant says it was.

The lowest bid was from James Stewart & Co., which began work under its contract, which called for much other construction besides this particular installation of interior marbles.

Let me divert a moment now to explain the difference between a Missouri marble and a Vermont marble.

A Missouri marble is delivered in block form and finished on the job. At the time of the construction of the New York Federal courthouse I am informed reliably that Missouri marbles were delivered in New York City at $12.50 per cubic foot. Now, in addition to commanding a higher price in the rough, Missouri marble is more costly to install, as the work of fabrication, cutting, polishing, and waxing must be performed by skilled mechanics receiving a minimum wage of $10 per day of 8 hours.

Now, Vermont marbles, good as they are, are very much cheaper in cost. At the time of the construction of the New York courthouse, Vermont marble was being sold in New York City at $3 per cubic foot. These Vermont marbles are fabricated at the quarry and delivered on the job almost ready for use. Work on them is done by unskilled labor, receiving from 35 to 50 cents per hour, or paid at the maximum of $4 per day of 8 hours.

In April of 1933, 1 month after Franklin Delano Roosevelt assumed the office of President, and 1 month after James Aloysius Farley took over the business of running the Government for the benefit of a favored few politicians, the situation was this:

The James Stewart & Co. contractors, of New York City, old-time friends of Mr. Farley, were about to install the interior marbles called for in their contract negotiated under the Hoover Administration. They were to receive $1,010,000 for installing 56,000 cubic feet of the high-priced Missouri marble, and 4,000 cubic feet of the cheaper Vermont marbles. Their contract called for the installation, I am told, of 60,000 cubic feet of all marbles.

Now, a little joker had been written into the specifications for the New York Federal courthouse. It reads as follows:

"422. Marble.—The naming of marbles or other stones on the drawings or in the specification is for the purpose of indicating the type that is required, but it is not intended to exclude any marbles, granite, or other stones which, in the opinion of the Architect, are so nearly like those scheduled on the drawings or named in the specification that they will give practically the same effect."

You will notice that they were permitted, under this joker, to change the marbles to be used, providing the changes met with the approval of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department. The Acting Supervising Architect at the time the original contract was drawn was James A. Wetmore. The Supervising Architect in April 1933, was ———.

Now, in April 1933, with Franklin Delano Roosevelt and James Aloysius Farley in power, the James Stewart & Co. contractors suddenly recalled this joker, and so they proposed to the Supervising Architect to make some little changes in the specifications for installation of marbles in the interior of the New York Federal courthouse. Curiously enough, their specifications called for the installation of 46,200 cubic feet of marble, instead of the 60,000 cubic feet called for under the original contract.

Now, it may be that my friend the architect, who studied these contracts and specifications, may be in error about it, but from what I have seen of them with my own eyes it does appear to me that the modified specifications cut down the original requirement of 60,000 cubic feet to a new requirement of only 46,200 cubic feet. This new proposition made by the James Stewart & Co., contractors, to the Supervising Architect reads as follows: [New York, N. Y., courthouse (NFW). James Stewart & Co., Inc., contractors. Cable address, "Stuconco." Codes: W. U.: 5 Letter, General, Bentley. New York Central Building, 230 Park Avenue. Harry D. Watts, vice president. Proposals. 1243. United States Courthouse, New York, N. Y.]

NEW YORK, June 15, 1933.

The SUPERVISING ARCHITECT,
Treasury Department, Washington, D. C.

SIR: We propose to make changes in the interior marbles in the New York City courthouse for a deduction of $140,000 from our contract price.

The approximate allocation of marbles, by States, is as follows:

Approximately 1,200 cubic feet of Montana Travertine.
Approximately 6,000 cubic feet of Ozark, Missouri.
Approximately 2,000 cubic feet of Ste. Genevieve Golden Vein, Missouri.

Approximately 4,000 cubic feet of Gray Tennessee.
Approximately 4,000 cubic feet of Light Cherokee, Georgia.
Approximately 2,000 cubic feet of Cardiff Green, Maryland.
Approximately 3,000 cubic feet of Alabama Veined Cream.
Approximately 24,000 cubic feet of Vermont marble, including Imperial Danby, Northern Ivory, Neshobe Gray Veined, Pink Lepanto, French Gray, Special White Danby, Westland Cream Dark, Brocadillo, or Cippolin.

Accompanying this proposal is a schedule prepared by the architect, Cass Gilbert, dated May 24, intended to show an allocation in accordance with our agreement with the Department. Should the Department determine after analysis of the architect's schedule that the quantities of marble indicated thereon vary materially from the State allocation previously agreed upon, we will furnish, without additional cost, marbles which may be indicated in any revised schedule more in keeping with the distribution desired.

Respectfully,

JAMES STEWART & Co., INC.,
HARRY D. WATTS, Vice President.

[Letter of notification dated June 26, 1933.]

Received: Office Supervising Architect, Treasury Department, June 16, 1933. A. Noted, —. Answered, June 26, 1933.

You will observe that these new specifications call for the use of only 46,200 cubic feet of marbles.

Instead of the 4,000 cubic feet of Vermont marble called for by the original specifications, the revised specifications call for 24,000 cubic feet of Vermont marble, including—

"Imperial Danby, Northern Ivory, Neshobe Gray Veined, Pink Lepanto, French Gray, Special White Danby, Westland Cream Dark, Brocadillo, or Cippolin."

You will notice that only 6,000 cubic feet of Ozark Stainless marble is called for in the revised specifications, instead of the 22,000 cubic feet of Ozark Stainless marble called for in the original specifications.

You will notice that only 2,000 cubic feet of Ste. Genevieve Golden Vein Missouri marble is called for in the new specification, instead of the 34,000 cubic feet of Ste. Genevieve Golden Vein Missouri marble called for in the original specification.

You will notice that the new specifications call for 14,200 feet of other marbles, including 4,000 cubic feet of Gray Tennessee marble, from the State of my distinguished friend the Senator from Tennessee.

Now, a little bit of simple arithmetic shows us how the Government was defrauded. You will notice that James Stewart & Co. concede that the use of the cheaper marbles will save the Government $140,000. That means that under the original bid of $1,010,000, the Government paid $870,000 for the cheaper marbles. I am not much on figures, but I can multiply 56,000 cubic feet of Missouri marbles by $12.50 per cubic foot, and I get $710,000 as the cost of the marble called for by the original specifications.

I can multiply 4,000 cubic feet of Vermont marble by $3 per cubic foot, and I get $12,000.

I can add $710,000 to $12,000, and I get $722,000.

Now, I take the original bid of $1,010,000 and subtract $722,000 from that. I get $288,000, which, apparently, was the cost of installing this marble—60,000 cubic feet of it.

But let us take the new contract now, the one that James Aloysius Farley gave to his friends, James Stewart & Co., Inc. This new contract calls for only 8,000 cubic feet of Missouri marble. Again, I multiply 8,000 cubic feet by $12.50 per cubic foot, and I get $100,000. Now, I take 24,000 cubic feet of Vermont marble, multiply it by $3 per cubic foot, and get $72,000. Now I take 14,200 cubic feet of other cheap marbles, multiply by $3 per cubic foot, and I get $42,600. Now I add $100,000, $72,000, and $42,600, and I get $214,600 as the approximate cost to the contractor of these substitute marbles.

I add, although he is installing only 46,200 cubic feet instead of the 60,000 cubic feet called for by the original specifications, and concede that it cost him $288,000 to install these cheaper marbles. The result is a gross total of $502,600. That should have been a fair price for these marbles.

Now, they charged the Government $870,000 for this work, when the fair price should have been $502,600, according to their own bids in the original specifications. That means the Government lost $367,400.

I have been informed by a learned architect who inspected these records that the actual saving to James Stewart & Co., Inc., was $523,000 through this modification negotiated for them by James Aloysius Farley. These generous people allowed the Government $140,000—about one-third of their saving. That would mean that James Stewart & Co. netted a cool profit of $383,000 by the modification of their original contract. That is pretty close to my own figures, as I figured it at $367,400.

In any event, this swindle gypped the American Government out of at least $350,000. The proof is available to this committee. It cannot be obtained by asking Mr. Farley whether it is true, but it can be obtained by subpoenaing documents; the original specifications that were sent out with the call for bids; the original bid of James Stewart & Co., Inc.; their original contract, and this modified contract.

There is one other peculiar thing, Mr. President: Nowhere in the record have I been able to find an approval of the modification by the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, although the original contract in that joker section gave him sole power to permit a modification of the original specification.

One thing more, Mr. President: The original contract called for the installation of 60,000 cubic feet of marbles. The original price to the Government was $1,010,000. The price per cubic foot under the original bid was $16.83 per cubic foot. The modified contract called for the installation of 46,200 cubic feet for $870,000. That was an average price of $18.83 per cubic foot—just exactly $2 per cubic foot of marble more than under the original contract, and with cheaper marbles being installed.

The fraud in this contract is apparent on its face.

Mr. BAILEY obtained the floor.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum having been suggested, the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Coolidge	Keyes	Pope
Ashurst	Copeland	La Follette	Radcliffe
Austin	Costigan	Lewis	Robinson
Bachman	Couzens	Logan	Russell
Bailey	Dickinson	Lonergan	Schwellenbach
Bankhead	Dieterich	Long	Sheppard
Barbour	Donahay	McAdoo	Shipstead
Barkley	Duffy	McCarran	Steiwer
Blibo	Fletcher	McGill	Thomas, Okla.
Black	Frazier	McKellar	Thomas, Utah
Bone	George	McNary	Townsend
Borah	Gerry	Maloney	Trammell
Brown	Gibson	Metcalf	Truman
Bulkley	Glass	Minton	Tydings
Bulow	Gore	Murphy	Vandenberg
Burke	Guffey	Murray	Van Nuys
Byrd	Hale	Neely	Wagner
Capper	Harrison	Norris	Walsh
Caraway	Hastings	Nye	Wheeler
Carey	Hatch	O'Mahoney	White
Clark	Hayden	Overton
Connally	Johnson	Pittman

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Eighty-six Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, one fact must be perfectly apparent to every Senator who has heard the remarks of the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. Long]. That fact is that having charged, or brought forward in form of allegations upon hearsay, self-admitted, eight serious charges against the Postmaster General, and having had abundant opportunity before the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads to present his evidence, he comes here this morning and argues only 3 of those 8 allegations; and in order to sustain the charges with respect to those 3 he attacks his own evidence in undertaking to discredit the records sent here and produced by him just now from the Department of the Interior; and manifestly realizing the inadequacy of that procedure, he produces an affidavit dated April 23, when his accusations were made on the 11th of February, when he was given opportunity to be heard in the first week of March, and when the report upon the whole matter had been filed 8 days.

Mr. President, that is the size of the case as presented by the senior Senator from Louisiana against the Postmaster General.

Ordinarily I do not think it would be worth my while to make the effort to comment upon this case, or worth the while of the Senate to hear me. We might proceed at once to vote upon such a presentation as the Senator has made, and with absolute confidence; but we may justify ourselves by way of looking into this matter and seeing what has occurred here, what is going on here, and what is implied in this extraordinary series of performances on the floor of the Senate of the United States.

I have just said that the Senator from Louisiana brought forward his resolution on the 11th day of February. He spoke at length on that day, purporting to speak on the subject of the resolution. On February 12 he spoke again; on February 14 again; on February 20 again, all purporting to be on the subject of the resolution; on February 21 again; on March 4 again; and on March 5 still another speech on the same subject.

I bring forward that fact because it indicates the implications of this extraordinary situation. In the course of these several speeches, seven in number, the Senator from Louisiana preferred charges against the Treasury Department of the United States, the Interior Department, the Navy Department, the Department of Justice, the Post Office Department, the office of the Comptroller of the Currency, and did not hesitate, when pressed, to asperse the character and seek to compromise the integrity of the President of the United States.

There is something more involved here, Mr. President, something more of deliberate purpose than that of discrediting James A. Farley, the Postmaster General. I have wondered at times just what could be going on, and just what was in contemplation; and, searching my recollection for analogies and illustrations, I came upon this autobiography entitled "Every Man a King." This is the first volume of three. The first volume is entitled "Every Man a King." The second volume will be known as "Every Man a King-fish." The third will be known as "Every Man a Sucker."

From this first volume I propose to read a little story by the author of Every Man a King (p. 325):

Time and again have I called the attention of the people of Louisiana to the millions of dollars, funds of the State and funds contributed by the special-privilege interests of Louisiana, to pursue various investigations relative to all affairs connected with my administration, and to the further fact that never has one material iota of proof been submitted by evidence that would be competent in any court.

I pass by the opportunity to remark that in this investigation, as the Senator from Louisiana must well know, not one iota of proof has been submitted by way of evidence that would be competent in any court, or competent in any other reasonable body; but I do not care to dwell upon that so much as upon the capacity of our distinguished senior Senator from Louisiana to testify to his immaculate character and unimpeachable record. Of us all here, he alone is pure and true. Of us all here, he is the only friend of the people. Of us all here, thank God! we may find in this Senator one righteous man.

I think I have a song for him. I understand he is undertaking to write, or has even written, a national hymn for himself. The song dates from the seventeenth century and comes from a peculiar sect rising in that century, in which many sects rose, which arrogated to themselves all of religion and all of honor and all of righteousness and all of virtue. In order to be sure of it, when they would meet on Sundays they would sing these lines, which I propose to dedicate to the only righteous man left in our great land:

We are the sweet selected few;
Let all the rest be damned.
There may be room in hell for you;
We won't have heaven crammed.

Having said that, I will proceed now to read the story from Every Man a King, on page 326, by way of throwing light upon this unusual procedure here since the 11th day of February:

I have said to the people of Louisiana:

"Once on the farm we had to go a long ways from the house we lived in to the field where we worked. We had a little fice dog that always dragged along with us. Just about the time that we got the mule hitched up to the plow, sharpened the hoes, and got well under way, that little dog would begin to bark out in the woods like he had treed something.

"So we would lay down the hoes and tie the mule up to the rail fence and run over in the woods to find the dog.

"When we would get there we would find him with his shaggy nostrils buried in the hole of a tree yelping for dear life. So we would send one of the boys up to the house to get a saw and ax, and when he came back we would cut down the tree and saw off a cut and split it open, then to find that there was not a single thing in the tree.

"So we would go back to work, but about the time we would get started the dog would begin yelping three times as hard as he had before. Then we would figure the dog had evidently missed the game the first time but that it had slipped over to another tree.

"Out in the woods we would go again and cut down some more trees and split them open, but never to find any game.

"We kept up that practice until we had cut down and split open about all of the trees there were in those woods.

"We lost the crop, but we convinced the dog."

Mr. President, I know something about dogs. I can identify that fice. He is known as the "share-our-wealth" fice. He will not tree, he will not hunt with the other dogs, and he cannot trail. He has a great way of running all over the woods and barking at the root of every tree, calling upon all in his hearing to "come and share my 'possum. Come and share my squirrel. Come and share my 'coon", well knowing that there is no 'possum there, and no squirrel there, and no 'coon there. That is the process by which that worthless fice manages to exalt himself in his own esteem. He will bark at the root of every tree, he will attack everybody and everything, but when you follow him up and cut down the tree, you never convince him, and you lose your crop.

What do we have here? Barking at the Treasury Department; barking at the Interior Department; barking at the Post Office Department; barking at the Comptroller's office; barking at the Department of Justice. Barking! Barking! Barking! But we are not going to lose the crop. It is a matter of indifference to me whether or not we convince anybody.

Mr. President, with that by way of introduction, I am going into this matter in a reasonable way, and in view of the facts and circumstances.

I am going to ask first, what was the nature of the resolutions offered by the senior Senator from Louisiana? He himself says they did not contain charges or accusations, and for that I turn to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 12, page 1830, and read from the Senator as follows:

I have made no charges whatever.

We will let that rest right there. He himself was unwilling to stand on the floor of the Senate and say that he had made accusations against the Postmaster General.

Further than that, I will read from the RECORD of February 11. In that RECORD, on page 1796, we find that he stated:

I know nothing.
I am informed.
I am told.
I cannot of my own first-hand information give this proof.
I am only repeating what is contained in information given to me by others.
I am told by a Member of the Senate.
I should say.

And so on and so on and so on.

In plain language, he disavows that he has any knowledge whatsoever concerning the matters on the subject of which he has addressed the Senate eight times, and managed in every speech to cast a suspicion upon the conduct of the Government and of the administration, a suspicion which, if believed over this country, could have no other effect than to destroy the national faith. Yet he knows nothing! Those are his words, not mine.

He said on February 12, as appears on page 1830 of the RECORD:

I make them upon the word of what I consider responsible men.

There is the situation. That is the background of the investigation. It was upon declarations of that character that the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, at the instance of the Senate, went into session, in order that there might be something of substance discovered if there were something of substance; in order that the Senator from Louisiana might produce evidence and might name witnesses.

Let us see what happened. Here is the stenographic record of the meetings of the Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. Let us see what went on before that committee, and what the Senator from Louisiana said and did by way of making good these insinuations; and I use that word carefully. If one does not know, if he depends upon hearsay, if all he can say is that "I am informed", and he blurts that out to the American public, he invites some sort of description of that sort of thing, and I know of no words that will describe such a thing other than the words "insinuation" and "unfounded suspicion."

Here is the colloquy in the hearing before the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads:

Senator BAILEY (addressing Senator LONG). We are willing to hear your statements, of course, but we are not going to act on statements. We are here to act on evidence.

Senator LONG. Yes; you mean that you are going to hold an investigation then, and you want me to produce the witnesses. I am ready.

Senator BAILEY. Then let's proceed.

That was the understanding on the first day.

Senator LONG. I can produce the witnesses.

Were they produced?

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. LONG. Is it not a fact that the committee addressed me a letter asking me to name the witnesses and what they would swear instead of asking me to produce them?

Mr. BAILEY. I think so.

Mr. LONG. I will ask the Senator further: Did that committee have authority to summon witnesses and pay their expenses?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes.

Mr. LONG. Under the law, then, we would not have had to send this matter to any committee, because the only reason for sending it to the committee was that witnesses could not be summoned at all to testify because that involves expense. According to the Senator's statement, they did not have to send it to the committee.

Mr. BAILEY. The committee met to hear the Senator and hear his witnesses and repeatedly asked him to produce them.

Mr. LONG. The Senator says they asked me to produce witnesses?

Mr. BAILEY. They asked the Senator to produce them.

Mr. LONG. Where is that noted?

Mr. BAILEY. I am going to read the record about it.

Mr. LONG. Oh, yes. I gave you a list of them. They are all there.

Mr. BAILEY. I shall come to that, too. The Senator's list was "Mr. A" and "Mr. B."

Mr. LONG. No; it was not.

Mr. BAILEY. I will read it. I have it here. It is all in the record, "Mr. A" and "Mr. B", and you are going to involve the character of a great Government on "Mr. A" and "Mr. B."

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. LONG. Did I not state that I would disclose the names of "Mr. A" and "Mr. B" in those particular cases where I did not want to disclose the names, whenever the time might come to produce them?

Mr. BAILEY. The time was then. That is the point.

Mr. LONG. No; it was not.

Mr. BAILEY. The committee was in session, and the committee waited. Those are the facts.

We can have disputes, Mr. President, about some things, but we cannot have a dispute about the word of a person present in a matter of instant knowledge, and we cannot have a dispute about evidence in the presence of the witnesses; and here is the record.

Here is the record, and the members of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads are here, and they will verify what I state.

Mr. BLACK. And it can be verified from the stenographic record.

Mr. BAILEY. I am reading from the stenographic record.

Senator BYRNES. Then you do know who handled them and can give us the names?

Senator LONG. I say that I could not give the names offhand.

Senator BYRNES. Can you name any man that was engaged in the awarding of the contract?

Senator LONG. I would have to secure those witnesses.

Senator BYRNES. Do you know the names of the men?

Senator LONG. I know the names of the men that were engaged in this contract.

Senator BYRNES. But you do not know the names of the men that were engaged in the awarding of these contracts?

Mr. LONG. I do not pretend to carry them around in my head. I know Flynn.

Now again:

Senator BYRNES. But you cannot give the names?

Senator LONG. I will submit a list of the names.

Where is the list? Was it ever submitted? There are 18 members of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and they will bear witness no list was produced; no names were mentioned other than the one or two contained in the newspaper reports and Mr. A and Mr. B.

On page 10 of the record:

Senator LONG. If you want facts, you will get plenty of them.

Did he come with the facts? Eighteen members of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads will bear witness and the stenographic report here bears witness that he did not come with the facts any more than he came this morning with the facts.

That is not all. I quote from page 14:

Senator BYRNES. You do not know the name of one man?

Senator LONG. Yes! I will call them as witnesses.

Senator BYRNES. You cannot give the names now?

Senator LONG. No; I do not have them now. There is no difficulty about that. You will not be disappointed in the proof.

Senator BYRNES. Right now you cannot give a single name?

Senator LONG. I will give plenty of names. They will all be summoned and examined. I will take the responsibility to see to that.

This was the first day. And we met 3 succeeding days and never a name—

Senator BYRNES. I would like to have the names now. You can give them if you have them.

Senator LONG. You can get some of them; you can get some of them. This information has been garnered by very great risk and men taking the risk, men who are willing to trust me and make the investigation, and they will be willing to appear.

Senator BYRNES. Would you give their names before that time?

Senator LONG. Yes; I can give some of the names.

Senator BYRNES. Will you put them in the record?

Senator LONG. Yes; I will go and get up the names and put them in the record.

Did he do it? What does the record say? And if he did it and the record does not say it, where is his complaint? He did not do it. Eighteen United States Senators, members of that committee, will bear witness to the accuracy of my statement. Now again:

Senator BYRNES. You do not know who they are?

Senator LONG. I can get them up.

Senator BYRNES. Do you know the names now?

Senator LONG. No; I do not. I did well to get up all those I did.

The only thing that he has ever gotten up was a lot of newspaper editorials and news stories.

Senator LONG. My informer was given this information truthfully.

Senator BYRNES. Who is the informer?

Senator LONG. Many people. There was one in Ickes' office.

Senator BYRNES. If you say he testifies truthfully, who is that man?

Senator LONG. I do not have to give that man's name. He is still in the Government.

Senator BYRNES. He told you that the Emergency Department loaned the money to the Hillside Development Co.?

Senator LONG. He did not tell me that. He transmitted this from other sources, and I know from other sources in New York that all of these officials were named by Farley.

Does the Senate get the idea? The man did not tell him. Somebody else told him that the man had said it.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. LONG. He sent a Congressman to me.

Mr. BAILEY. I did not understand the Senator.

Mr. LONG. I said he sent a Congressman to me.

Mr. BAILEY. Very well. He did not even tell us that.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I did not want Mr. Farley to know all the case.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I do not know that the Senator intends at this point to reflect on the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, but if he does, then I stake them against him before the American people.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I mean to say that I informed the committee that the names of certain persons which I gave, whose names appear in the Record, were hounded by Mr. Farley and the Treasury and the Department of Justice agents on the following day and threatened with arrest. I gave the names, all of them here.

Mr. BAILEY. I am prepared to tell the Senator that he sent that information to us. We investigated that. We found there was not a word of truth in it, but there were certain rascals in Oklahoma who were being pursued by the Post Office Department for using the mails to defraud, and they threw what they did into this investigation as a smoke screen for themselves; and we investigated it further and found that the matter had been carried on in due course in the Post Office Department, and Mr. Farley knew nothing of it. That is in the record.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. LONG. It is a further fact that these people were not investigated nor bothered until they came here and gave me these affidavits and telegrams, too, is it not?

Mr. BAILEY. I do not think so. That is not the record, and that is not the evidence before the committee. If the Senator from Louisiana will take the trouble to read the record, he will find there is no ground on earth for his suspicions.

Mr. LONG. Did the Senator examine witnesses?

Mr. BAILEY. Did we examine witnesses?

Mr. LONG. Yes.

Mr. BAILEY. We got every bit of available information. We read every item that the Senator from Louisiana produced, and I have it here and I am going through it.

Mr. LONG. I am talking about witnesses. Did the committee summon them and question them, and did the committee investigate to see if they had been hounded? Did the committee have any witnesses who testified?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes.

Mr. LONG. It did.

Mr. BAILEY. Not in the sense of having them summoned and examined. We investigated and found out about those particular rascals down in Oklahoma, and we satisfied ourselves entirely, the whole committee—not just the Democrats, but the whole committee—that it was nothing more than a smoke screen drawn up by some criminals who wished to use this investigation to create a certain sort of sense of sympathy for themselves.

Now again:

Senator LONG. I would like to have it to introduce my proof.

That refers to the report from the Department of the Interior. That is the report on the Senator's desk. It relates to the Federal building in New York City and the Hillside housing project. I read that report. I read every document in it. The Senator from Louisiana this morning practically said there was nothing in it, and how did he get around the situation? He did it by aspersing the character of the Interior Department and its head, and one can always do that when he runs ashore—he can always attack the evidence by saying that somebody doctored it.

But where is the proof? What will the Senate of the United States think about a Senator and a lawyer who calls for the evidence and when the evidence is produced without one scintilla of proof to justify his statement, deliberately says that it has been doctored, that the documents have been withdrawn from it? Where is the evidence about that? Where is the man to swear to that? How could the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads act upon that?

Now listen. On these very documents, on the very day they came down from the Department of the Interior, and were delivered on that desk at the instance of the Senator from Louisiana, he said to the committee "There is not anything in them." And yet he had addressed the Senate five times on the subject, informing us and the press of America and the people of America that those documents would practically expose Mr. Farley, destroy his character, and show up a state of corruption and fraud in the Public Works Administration. That is what went on here. But when they came in he said, "I knew all the time there was nothing in them. It took them too long to get them down here. There is something dead up the creek."

Mr. President, that would not go in a justice-of-the-peace court. That has been put forward here on the floor of the Senate of the United States. What did he say in the committee when these reports were offered to him as he has them now?

Senator LONG. I don't think there is much to them.

Does the Senate recall what a sensation was created here? Does the Senate recall the overt suggestions here that Glavis had been investigating Farley; that Secretary Ickes had been investigating Farley; and that all we had to do was to get those records and a condition of indescribable fraud and corruption would be revealed? But when they came, knowing there is nothing in them, he seeks to escape by way of disgracing the Department of the Interior of the United States; insinuating to the American people that "there is something dead up the creek."

Again, on the subject of witnesses:

Senator LONG. I said 3 hours a moment ago. I think I could go over to my office and in 30 or 40 minutes get up everything.

Does the Senate appreciate the force of that? Here is a committee of the United States Senate charged with the serious duty of investigating accusations or allegations of the grossest misconduct, involving the character of the administration and the public confidence in it. He is the only accuser, and he spreads his accusations from day to day from his desk here. The committee meets. We ask him to produce his evidence. He says, "I can go over to my office and in 30 or 40 minutes get up everything." I understood he had it, and every member of the committee understood he had it, and that it was a mere matter of going to his office and in less than an hour giving us a full disclosure of everything he had. Did he do it? Not one word of evidence did he produce.

The next day he did not appear. We sent him another letter and reminded him of his promise, and the next day he came with nothing, and the next day with a little affidavit about something and a statement from criminals in Oklahoma that they were being pursued on account of their friendship for him. There is the record, Mr. President.

What did he do with it? There was the opportunity. Will he be heard to say that we did not proceed in good faith? When he told us on the first day that he had the witnesses and would produce them, and when he did not appear on the second day, we wrote him a courteous note. He did not produce the witnesses. When on the third day we waited and on the fourth day we waited, never a name, never a document, never an iota of evidence involving Mr. Farley or anyone else was offered.

Mr. President, it is one thing to stand on the floor of the United States Senate and fill the air, fill the ears of our people, fill their minds in a time of distress with all sorts of suspicions, with all sorts of suggestions that the Government is not their friend, that the Government is rotten; it is one thing to do that, and it is quite another thing when the Senate of the United States acts and gives the Senator an opportunity to come into executive session before a committee of the Senate and tell the truth and give us the names and he does nothing. That is a picture of this situation.

Mr. President, the Senator from Louisiana will say that he did have evidence. At the risk of taking some time, I am going into some of the evidence by way of showing its nature.

Here is the record of February 20. The evidence in that record is exhibit A, being a New York World-Telegram news story, in which to a great extent the matters brought forward by the Senator from Louisiana are explained. I thought when he brought it up it was a damning sort of thing, but, on reading it, I found it goes on to explain the rulings about rejecting a certain award. It says the ruling was based upon the claim that the low bidder had violated the code of the cement industry by giving a lower price than was fixed by it. Is there anything wrong about that? Every Member of the United States Senate knows that the United States Government is dealing with industries that comply with the code, and that was the case in the Stewart contract and the public building in New York. The low bidder on the third bid was turned down because he had not complied with the code requirements. Was that a matter of secrecy? It was referred to the Attorney General of the United States and the Attorney General of the United States made a ruling that that low bidder could not be considered because he had not complied with the N. R. A. code. The bids were offered over again.

Now listen. The evidence produced here by way of newspaper statements, of course, is not evidence, but assuming that it is, I will make the proposition that every Senator who will read these statements, as I have read them, will find in practically every one of them, while suspicion is stated on the one hand, the facts are stated on the other.

The Senate heard a great deal just now about the matter of marble. Read the evidence of the Senator from Louisiana in that case. The contract was changed by Admiral Peoples for the good of the service and for the interest of the building. The contract was changed more than once. One of the changes brought about a saving of $184,000 in the cost of the building.

Of course, I have not time to read all these newspaper statements. I am going to content myself with saying that if any Senator thinks that Mr. Farley was in any way compromised by any of these newspaper exhibits, I will give him my collection—I have them all—and if he will take them home tonight and read them, I am confident he will come back here and say that, while suspicions were uttered on the one hand, the facts of the matter were evident on the other. But even if that were not so, when did we reach the point that the head of a department of the United States Government was to be called into question and the public confidence in our country destroyed merely because here and there, in a land of a thousand newspapers, somebody wrote something about somebody?

The humblest man who walks the earth is entitled to a trial on the evidence and to face his accuser, and if here or anywhere else we are ever going to involve the character of men, however high or however low, merely because some newspaper wrote something, then God save America. But, of course, we are not going to do that.

I could go on here with the other evidence, but I simply must content myself with inviting Senators to read the exhibits.

I come to the final letter of the Senator from Louisiana. He said that at last, on the last day of the meeting of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, he filed in the Senate a communication. In response to our reasonable request for witnesses, in response to his solemn promise to produce witnesses, here is his letter:

Witnesses: Officers of the concerns listed on the building directory, 205 East Forty-second Street—

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I ask the Senator to yield before he reads that letter further. The Senator knows that what I was asked to do was in compliance with a letter sent me by the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKellar], does he not?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly. It says:

In response to a letter received from your chairman, Senator McKellar, asking for information as to names of witnesses and what they will testify relative to James A. Farley and his concerns and transactions handled under and with his authority, I beg leave to submit the following.

That is the initial statement in the Senator's letter. Is the Senator satisfied with that interpretation of the situation? It is his own.

Instead of giving names he asked us to send to offices of all the concerns listed on the building directory at 205 East Forty-second Street as occupying office no. 1701, that being the private headquarters of James A. Farley. Here is what he was going to show:

To show that more than twenty-odd concerns there operating, including six holding companies, have been organized, combined, and affiliated for practically the sole purpose of transacting and dealing in matters with which the United States Government is identified for the purpose of making private profit.

That is asking us to go to New York with not a scintilla of evidence to support it and find a list of all the corporations that may be in a certain building because Mr. Farley or his company had an office there. That procedure would not be worthy of any court and to be sure it could not be worthy of the United States Senate.

It was merely a statement of what he hoped to prove, with not a scintilla of evidence that there was anything of the sort. On the other hand here was a solemn statement from the Postmaster General that there were only two corporations on earth in which he had an interest; that he was not an officer of either; that one was a company which was in liquidation, simply holding a lot of slow paper, and the other, the General Builders Supply Co., in which he owned 14 percent of the preferred stock and, I believe, 14 percent of the common stock.

With that statement, and not the remotest evidence to the contrary, the Senator from Louisiana undertakes to comply with his promise that he had the names, that he had the witnesses, that he could go over to his office and get them in 40 minutes. That is the record. So far from standing upon his own assurance, when put to it, he tells us to go up there and find 20 unknown corporations on suspicion.

I was reading from the letter—

Mr. LONG. Page 3013 of the RECORD.

Mr. BAILEY. I thank the Senator.

Again he refers to the testimony of Commissioner Robert Moses, of New York, and the data which he had assembled and which would be called for the purpose of proving certain sales. Hear me, Senators! The only thing the Senator from Louisiana has ever produced here indicating that Robert Moses knows anything about the matters which are before us is a report of a campaign speech in his campaign for Governor by Mr. Moses, and a letter—

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. LONG. Following the mention of Mr. Robert Moses' name in that letter did I not give further detail about Moses' continuing to hold his job and getting Government money?

Mr. BAILEY. Precisely. It is precisely like the Senator from Louisiana. And it is precisely like Rostand's cock who thought the sun came up whenever he crew. [Laughter.]

Mr. LONG. I asked the Senator a question. Will he answer it?

Mr. BAILEY. That is it. He thinks Mr. Moses kept his job because of something he did here.

Mr. LONG. Will the Senator answer my question?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes; I will answer the Senator's question. Just as an old rooster could walk around in the barnyard at break of day and crow and, seeing the sun come up, tell his hens he had brought it up. If the Senator can get away with that, he has a right to do it.

Mr. LONG. Will the Senator answer my question? Did they not allow Mr. Moses to receive the Government money as the head of that park and playgrounds department, or whatever the department was, after I mentioned his name in that document, and they said they would not let him have it?

Mr. BAILEY. Perhaps they did so, but it was not because of anything the Senator said or did.

Mr. LONG. I suppose the Senator from North Carolina advised them it would be all right. That is the rooster that crowed.

Mr. BAILEY. No; I have not advised them, and I am not claiming anything for myself. I am simply exposing, I hope politely, that state of mind in which a man will argue that everything that happens after he does a certain thing was caused by him. There is a term for that, Mr. President, and that term is "delusion of grandeur."

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. LONG. The Senator has the names of witnesses that I named. He admits that Moses stayed on that job and got Government money, too. Why does not the Senator go on and mention the others and see if they did not do something?

Mr. BAILEY. I am going all the way through. The Senator has totally misstated what I said. I did not say that they had issued a criminal process against somebody who was his friend or who was taking his side. I said certain criminals in Oklahoma, being pursued by the Government, seeing this "ruckus" raised here, undertook to hide behind it, and that is what they did. But, of course, the Senator thinks that whatever happened down there happened because he made a speech here, and I cannot undertake to change his mind.

Mr. Moses made his campaign and got into a controversy with the Department of the Interior. The New York Times and other influential journals in the United States took his side. He was retained in his place and the money was paid him. I do not think anybody in the Senate had anything to do with it, but if anybody wishes to think he was running that matter, it is all right with me.

I was going into the Moses matter. The Senator from Louisiana wanted Moses as a witness because of a newspaper statement of the speech by Moses in his campaign for Governor of New York on the Republican ticket. That was the newspaper report. It was on the subject of the Federal housing project, and the Federal housing project has been thoroughly investigated and the report of the investigation is on the desk of the Senator from Louisiana and he says there is nothing in it. Why should we send for Moses?

It is the same way about the Federal building. Right on that desk [indicating] is every paper relating to it, and I have read them. I took them home with me at night and spent the night going through them to see if there was anything that would involve Mr. Farley. I do not have to say to the Senate that if I had found anything against Mr. Farley in those papers I would have reported it to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

This institution is not a fraudulent affair. I think it is about time the American people were told that chicanery, trickery, dishonesty, fraud, corruption, and indirection are not tolerated in this body. The insinuation that they are is a stab in the heart of the confidence of a great people in a great government in a time of extreme distress.

We did not send for Moses because every feature of the matters mentioned by him has been investigated and the documents were before us.

What is the next paragraph?

Witness A and, if necessary, Witness B—

That is equal to the anonymous letter with which the Senator from Louisiana began this thing, in the RECORD of February 14. We do not know to this day who wrote it, but I read it. The writer of that letter—look it up—says, "This is a tale that was told to me." He did not have anything himself; and yet that anonymous letter is heralded abroad. The writer will never be known. His name was not produced in the executive session. It is not produced here today. That letter is heralded abroad, for what purpose? If that sort of thing can be carried far enough in America, I will give no guarantee for the preservation of any government here.

Witness A, and if necessary Witness B, whom we expect to testify that an important official of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad previously with no connection with James A. Farley, received a telephone call from the said Farley, informing him that he desired him to support one Clem Shaver for the United States Senate from West Virginia. The records of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation will show that about the time there had been pending, and for causes otherwise unexplained, there had been held up a decision relative to a loan to be made to the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad for approximately $50,000,000. Witness A, and if necessary Witness B, to further testify that party called by said Farley hesitated, hoping the loan would come through, but finally disclosed that action on the same was held in abeyance and that he had no way to dodge the responsibility, but would have to declare for Shaver in accordance with Farley's instructions, and immediately upon so doing the Reconstruction Finance Corporation loan of $52,000,000 was announced.

There is not a word of truth in it. They did not loan that amount of money. The loan had been outstanding for 2 years. The proposition pending was a proposition whereby the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad was to sell bonds to the bankers of America for $50,000,000 in order that they might pay part of their debt to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and they sold them; and whereas at the beginning they had been owing the Reconstruction Finance Corporation $25,000,000, when they finished the transaction the Reconstruction Finance Corporation had received $12,000,000, and they owed the Reconstruction Finance Corporation only $13,000,000. Moreover, that happened on July 14, 1934, and every member of the Board of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and the Interstate Commerce Commission approved the loan, and yet here we have all this about that—government by suspicion; destruction by insinuation.

I will read the rest of it:

It is commented on in said Manual for Engineer Inspectors—

I do not care to read anything about that.

Now we come to this:

Letters, checks, vouchers, and witnesses, including Mr. Edwin P. Knott and others, to show that Clyde O. Eastus, now United States attorney in Texas, while in Washington, D. C., in the month of April 1933, arranged for his appointment as said United States attorney in consultation with Mr. Farley, wired Edwin P. Knott and otherwise gave to understand that the said Edwin P. Knott's case was being arranged through Mr. Farley, provided said Edwin P. Knott wired immediately $1,000 to go to Mr. Farley for politics.

What are the facts? Knott is in jail; in the penitentiary. The insinuation here is that Knott bought his freedom from the criminal law with a bribe to the Democratic Party. It is true that Eastus sent him a wire, but Mr. Farley is not responsible for that. It is true that the man made a contribution, but Mr. Farley did not know the man was indicted. When the authorities here found there was an indictment, they lost no time in ordering that he be prosecuted to the limit. Eastus was withdrawn as attorney. The Department of Justice put a disinterested man there, and Knott got a sentence of 5 years.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. LONG. What became of Eastus?

Mr. BAILEY. I do not know; but I will say in perfect frankness that I think Eastus ought to get out.

Mr. LONG. Eastus is United States attorney today.

Mr. BAILEY. I know it. I say he ought to get out as United States attorney.

Mr. LONG. So he is the man, instead of Farley, although Farley got the money.

Mr. BAILEY. No; Mr. Farley got a contribution in absolute good faith. Mr. Eastus' guilt lies in the fact that, representing that man, he induced him to make a contribution. His guilt lies in the fact that he imposed upon James A. Farley; and his guilt is all the more damnable because the Senator from Louisiana can use facts like that to damn the character of a perfectly innocent man. That might happen to me. That might happen to you. That might possibly happen to the senior Senator from Louisiana.

Again:

Witnesses: Richard M. Atkinson, former attorney general in the State of Tennessee—

Here is a great, long paragraph about a bank. We investigated that, and fortunately the chairman of our committee knew all the facts about it. He gave the committee absolute assurance that there was not one scintilla of truth in the allegation. Moreover, the Comptroller of the Currency put in writing the statement that Mr. Farley had never in his life had one thing to do with the appointment of receivers or attorneys for receivers, and I have that statement here. Moreover, the Department of Justice of the United States filed its solemn asseveration before our committee that never had they been party to prosecuting or investigating or having anything to do with that banking situation or any other banking situation by the suggestion—direct, indirect, or remote—of James A. Farley. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKellar] has explained that on the floor, and I do not intend to go further into it.

While I have not read every word of the letter from the senior Senator from Louisiana, I have read practically all of it. He says:

That further to prove the extent of the said Farley's control of the Department of Justice and the purposes to which it is manipulated, that when a gangster was about to be indicted in Kansas City by the United States grand jury, appeal was made to Farley to prevent the same, and Farley took the same in hand.

That is Lazzia. What happened to him? He is in the penitentiary. Where is there the slightest evidence that Farley ever had a thing to do with it? Nothing beyond the fact that a man out in that part of the country sent Mr. Farley a letter or a wire. I am not responsible for letters and wires that come to me. I should hate to have any Senator or any human being put under suspicion because some scoundrel writes him a corrupt letter; and yet that is precisely the case here. On the other hand, we have the record of the man's indictment and his prosecution. We have not the slightest suggestion of anything wrong about Mr. Farley, or that he ever even touched the case in the remotest degree.

Mr. McKellar. Mr. President, before the Senator leaves that subject, and as further evidence, the Attorney General of the United States had this to say concerning this particular matter:

No action taken by the Department of Justice in any of these matters was at the instance or suggestion of Mr. Farley. No appointment or designation of any attorney or agent to handle any phase thereof was suggested by him, nor was any official removed or caused to resign by him.

Mr. BAILEY. Yes.

Mr. President, I have gone through all this matter so far for the purpose of showing that notwithstanding the affirmations made here, and the assurances given here, and the impression created upon the public mind here that there was something dreadfully wrong, and that the evidence was at hand, notwithstanding the assurances given to the Post Office Committee, we come here in the month of May, when the thing began on the 11th of February and has been kept up practically ever since, and at the present moment there is not a scintilla of real evidence which would be admissible in a court which would justify even the slightest suspicion that any of the serious charges against Mr. Farley could be sustained, or ought to be investigated.

Then the Senator comes along and says, "Oh, well, but Mr. Farley has a news ticker in his office"; and that news ticker at once magnifies itself into a great gambling institution in which the former friend of the Senator from Louisiana is involved. He says Sullivan is in that.

I have the Senator's book here. He speaks of his friendship for Sullivan. He tells how he broke with Sullivan, and he does not tell anybody that he broke with him because Sullivan was a gambler. He says he broke with Sullivan because Sullivan could not deliver the votes. That is in the book. If there is any question about that, I will read it.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator repeat that statement? I did not understand it.

Mr. BAILEY. I will let the Senator read the book.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not want to read it.

Mr. BAILEY. I referred to Sullivan. Does the Senator want me to read that part of it? Let me see if I can find it. The chapter is entitled "Breakers Ahead." I read from page 120.

Mr. TYDINGS. From what book is the Senator reading?

Mr. BAILEY. Every Man a Kingfish. [Laughter.]

Now, Colonel, let me tell you how bad it was; 95 percent of the money we raised for my campaign for Governor was spent through Mr. Sullivan in New Orleans—

Mr. TYDINGS. Who is Mr. Sullivan?

Mr. BAILEY. He is that terrible gambler who has now got in with Farley through this news ticker down here at the Post Office Department.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina does not mean to say that the Senator from Louisiana would authorize Sullivan to spend 95 percent of his campaign funds?

Mr. BAILEY. I would not say it, Mr. President, for anything on earth, but I can read it from the book which the Senator from Louisiana wrote, and I think it might be believed.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. What position was the Senator from Louisiana holding at the time these campaign funds were collected and expended?

Mr. BAILEY. I am sorry that I do not know.

Mr. CONNALLY. Railroad commissioner.

Mr. BAILEY. Railroad commissioner or Governor; I do not know. It is on this page. I will let the Senator read it. It is pages 120 and 121 in the book Every Man a King.

Mr. TYDINGS. He was Governor after that, was he not?

Mr. BAILEY. Let me read it:

Now, Colonel, let me tell you how bad it was. Ninety-five percent of the money we raised for my campaign for Governor was spent through Mr. Sullivan in New Orleans—

That explains what his position was—

Including all of the money we raised in the country, and yet I ran a poor third in this city. One candidate beat me more than 20,000 votes, and another candidate beat me about 5,000 votes, and with no money to carry on our work in the country I had to hit the line of the city 70,000 votes ahead of my nearest opponent to get the office. Now, what is our answer?

"Well, I will ask you", replied the colonel.

Well, Colonel, you know and I know the people of this city will not stand for Sullivan and his business as a gambler. We had to get him to get your help. Now, if we want to be his friend, had we not better tell him the truth and give him to understand that while we can be of help to him he should locate himself in something besides politics? He cannot help anybody and can only hurt himself.

My point was that he did not get rid of him because he was a gambler; he got rid of him because he was unpopular. Yet he thinks this testimony here would involve Mr. Farley's name, and by way of doing it he finds a mere news ticker in the Department. They are all over Washington, and they are all over the country.

I will make a little distinction. There are news tickers and there are stock tickers. The stock tickers confine themselves to the momentary prices of stocks and bonds, with a little item of news now and then. The news ticker takes in prices of important stocks and important bonds, and takes in the news.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. LONG. You said I made objection to a news ticker being in Farley's office.

Mr. BAILEY. No; I said you took that as the foundation for your allegation that he was engaged in gambling transactions.

Mr. LONG. Where did you get that?

Mr. BAILEY. I got it from your speech.

Mr. CLARK. A point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BARKLEY in the chair). The Senator will state it.

Mr. CLARK. The point of order is that the rules of the Senate provide against Senators addressing each other directly in the second person. This debate, it seems to me, affords an adequate opportunity for the enforcement of the rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. LONG. I have not used the second person.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator said "you."

Mr. LONG. Will the Senator read where I objected to the news ticker? Is it not a fact that I said there was a gambling wire service in which Mr. Farley was interested, without any relation whatever to news tickers that go into offices?

Mr. BAILEY. I think that is what the Senator said.

Mr. LONG. Then why does the Senator make these other statements he has been making all the time?

Mr. BAILEY. The only basis for it is a news ticker down there.

Mr. LONG. Where does the Senator get that?

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator stated in his speech that Mr. Farley had one in his office down there.

Mr. LONG. Where did you get that?

Mr. BAILEY. I will read it. I have all the records.

Mr. LONG. I would like to have the Senator read that.

Mr. BAILEY. I will read all the speeches.

Mr. LONG. The Senator will find that I said that the General News Service, a well-known wire gambling service, which I proved in a senatorial hearing, that furnishes the information upon which gambling can be indulged in throughout the United States, was affiliated with Mr. Farley.

Mr. BAILEY. I am agreeing to that, the General News Service, and I said that the general news service, not mentioning the title, but all the news services, carried stock quotations, and that with that for a basis he imputes gambling to Farley, without a scintilla of evidence.

Mr. LONG. Will the Senator yield for just one further interruption?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. LONG. I wish to state to the Senator that those tickers in offices are not the General News Service at all, but that is not the thing I am talking about at all. The General News Service does not specialize in general news, but only in gambling news. So the Senator is confused.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina is not confused. I have stated the facts as to the difference between a stock ticker and a news ticker, and have stated the facts as to what the Senator said. Now I go further. The very simple fact that stock quotations come into any department in Washington does not justify anyone in raising an imputation that somebody is gambling.

Mr. LONG. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I agree with that—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana must address the Chair if he desires to interrupt.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. LONG. Will the Senator from North Carolina permit me graciously to agree that the last observation the Senator made was correct? And will the Senator permit me to state now to the Senator from North Carolina, in the third person, that what I was referring to was a ticker that has nothing whatever to do with the ticker that goes into brokers' offices?

Mr. BAILEY. Very well. The Senator has graciously agreed with me, and I am going graciously to refuse to permit this aspect of the matter to be further prolonged. I think I have stated the facts as they are as they appear in the RECORD.

Now I wish to come, by way of conclusion, to the report of the committee, and I shall read, first, the findings of the committee on the subject as they appear on page 10:

CONCLUSION

Your committee further reports that at the end of the hearing the following resolution was offered and passed by vote of all those present.

I hope Senators hear me in this. That was joined in by all parties and everybody. Two of the Senators were absent, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL]. All the others were present. This is the resolution:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the committee that the senior Senator from Louisiana has not produced facts or evidence constituting a proper case for investigation by the Senate under his Resolution No. 74.

That was the unanimous decision of the Senate committee, consisting of representatives at the time of three political parties. That was after 4 days of session. The committee further made report as follows:

Resolved, That Senate Resolution No. 74 be reported back to the Senate with the recommendation it do not pass, and the chairman be authorized to make the report.

That is the decision of the committee. Let us look at the statements or dissenting decisions from the other members, minority views, as follows:

We concur in the findings of the majority of the committee that upon the record there has not been presented a prima facie case for an investigation of the charges contained in Senate Resolution 74.

I wish Senators to dwell upon that. The signatories to these findings, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR], and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. GIBSON], say:

We concur in the findings of the majority of the committee that upon the record there has not been presented a prima facie case for an investigation of the charges contained in Senate Resolution 74.

They add this paragraph:

It is our view, however, that the wide-spread circulation of these charges has created suspicion in the public mind. We believe that the interests of the parties concerned and the public welfare can best be served by a prompt and thorough investigation of the charges made in Senate Resolution 74.

Mr. President and Senators, I desire to be heard on that for just a word. These minority views cannot justify the passage of this resolution in any aspect of the matter. I have argued the facts of the case and have waived every consideration of law. My argument has been that there was no evidence to justify the charges. My argument has further been that there was evidence to negative the charges, and that it was very powerful evidence. But I am going to argue now that the minority views as expressed cannot justify the adoption of the resolution:

We concur in the findings of the majority of the committee that upon the record there has not been presented a prima facie case for an investigation.

If they have that view, on what basis can they insist that we proceed to investigate? That is the question of law and the question of the character of the Republic and the question of the power of the Senate. It is not an unsettled question.

Take the other words:

It is our view, however, that the wide-spread circulation of these charges has created suspicion in the public mind.

Granted; but that does not lay the basis for the remotest power of investigation by the Senate of the United States. There cannot be an investigation of anyone in the United States, in office or out, by the Senate, simply because the "circulation of charges has created suspicion in the public mind." We are not here to allay suspicion. This is a legislative body, with vast powers beyond the legislative character. The Senate has the power of investigation, and that power is clearly defined. That power was laid down by Chief Justice White in the case of Marshall against Gordon, and with an historical background that leaves no doubt in any man's mind. The Senate has the power of investigation with a view to legislative action. It can aid itself in legislation. But it has nothing whatever to do with undertaking to allay suspicion in the public mind, and I do not hesitate to say that if it ever departed from that doctrine and went into the business of undertaking to allay suspicion in the public mind by investigations of the character sought, we would create a whirlwind of suspicion and of fear and of disaster, rather than allay any suspicion whatever.

I think that is self-evident. We can turn this body, if we choose, for a period into a general smelling committee. We can have Senators come here and vent their spleen against someone up and down the street. He can gather up newspaper editorials or news stories, file them here in the RECORD, and demand an investigation, and some Senators may say, "Well, the thing has gone so far we have got to have an investigation in order to allay suspicion." Once we start that we will go all the way. We will lose our function as a Senate and assume the function of delivering this body over to every man who wants to stir the depths of hate and strife and fear in the hearts of the American people.

I will read the additional minority views. They do not sustain the proposition that this resolution should be adopted:

The undersigned respectfully disagree with the report of the majority of the committee.

The charges made in Senate Resolution 74 are of a serious nature, and in view of the fact that the author of the resolution has repeatedly stated on the floor of the Senate and before the committee that he can and will furnish witnesses and evidence to sustain the charges made, and that in all fairness to the Postmaster General he should be accorded an opportunity to vindicate himself and to allay the suspicion that has been created in the public mind by the constant reiteration of these charges.

We therefore recommend that a prompt and thorough investigation be made of the charges set forth in Senate Resolution 74.

There is not a phrase, there is not a word in this expression of the minority views by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL] that will justify in the remotest degree the adoption of this resolution. What do they say? They want it adopted in fairness to the Postmaster General. We have nothing to do with fairness to the Postmaster General. He is in his own right, and he can defend himself, and this is not the arena to clear his character. That, too, is self-evident. We have one opportunity here. Should a public servant be impeached we may try the impeachment, but we cannot adopt resolutions here to save a public official from disgrace. We have nothing to do with that. That is beyond our function.

What is said in the Daugherty case? What is said in the Marshall case? Plainly the Senate of the United States has the power of investigation in aid of its function as a legislative body. When did we ever get the idea that somebody could prefer charges here and we would have to vindicate those charges? I am not here to vindicate the Postmaster General. I am not going to vote today to give him a chance to vindicate himself. I am voting on the facts. I am voting within my powers as a Senator. Granted that we had here a definite occasion by inference for legislative action, the situation would be different. I am perfectly willing to grant it, because in such case the powers of the Senate to investigate are very broad, but they are not broad enough to take in the allaying of suspicion or the vindication of character.

Do I need to elaborate that view? I have the cases here, but I know I have taken too much time.

I have an old book here, and a book that I like to read, Alexander Hamilton and James Madison's book. We call it the "Federalist." It tells us how this Ship of State was built. It tells us of its structure and its character. I often feel, Mr. President, that if we would keep to that building and keep to that structure it would be incomparably better for the mighty people whose destiny personally and in the mass is dependent upon their Ship of State. Right here on this matter of the possible conflict between the three departments of the Government:

The accumulation of all powers—legislative, executive, and judiciary—in the same hands, whether of one, a few, or many, and whether hereditary, self-appointed, or elective, may justly be pronounced the very definition of tyranny.

Were the Federal Constitution, therefore, really chargeable with the accumulation of power, or with a mixture of powers, having a dangerous tendency to such an accumulation, no further arguments would be necessary to inspire a universal reprobation of the system.

The reasons on which Montesquieu grounded his maxim are a further demonstration of his meaning. "When the legislative and executive powers are united in the same person or body", says he, "there can be no liberty, because apprehensions may arise lest the same monarch or senate should enact tyrannical laws to execute them in a tyrannical manner."

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BARKLEY in the chair). Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. Assuming that the Senator believed the facts as set forth in the statement made by the Senator from Louisiana, would he then feel that an investigation should be had?

Mr. BAILEY. I was arguing, I will say to the Senator, that an investigation could not be had under the two sets of minority views. If I felt that all this matter printed in the newspapers were true, I would have to make a very violent assumption, because, as I said to the Senator just now, a great deal of this newspaper matter negatives itself; it brings an accusation, and then gives an explanation, and no man could reach a conclusion that there was anything worthy of investigation from reading the newspaper statements. If the Senator wishes me to demonstrate that, I will read it. I want the Senator to get this. Take the matter of the public building in New York. Take the matter of the Hillside housing project. The newspapers put in that evidence, facts showing that Mr. Farley was in no way connected with it, facts showing that there was nothing to raise a suspicion; that is to say, they gave the news, they raised the suspicion, they have the honor to tell the truth on the other side. I do not think that is evidence.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me say to the Senator that he apparently misunderstands my question or the purpose of my question. He has correctly stated, in my judgment, the fact that upon the statement of the minority view no investigation could be based upon that view, but if the Senator believes that those facts were true, as set forth in the charges made, would he feel that there should be an investigation?

Mr. BAILEY. Does the Senator mean I should take all of the evidence in the newspapers, in the editorials, and the news stories, and everything that the Senator from Louisiana has said here on the floor on information and belief, and then believe it to be true? I would not only be in for an investigation; I would be in for an impeachment.

Mr. WHEELER. The point I wanted to make was this. I wanted to find out how far the Senator went, because the same question came up with reference to the Daugherty investigation. The statement was made on the floor of the Senate by those defending Daugherty, and it was repeatedly made, that the Senate should not go into investigating a Cabinet officer unless we showed affirmatively that we intended to pass some legislation. Now, of course, in that resolution which was drawn for the investigation of Daugherty it was not suggested in the resolution at all that we were seeking to pass legislation, but the Supreme Court in its interpretation, as I remember the language, said that it would be presumed, of course, that we were passing it upon the theory that we wanted to propose legislation.

Mr. BAILEY. I am in full agreement with the Senator about that. I stated that the power of investigation was very broad, but it must always be directed to legislation, and I argued the whole case until I came to the minority views on the merits, and I did not wish to invoke the law. I have invoked the law only to show that the minority views are not founded in the law, and defeat every conception of the power of the Senate. I want to read to the Senator the Daugherty case.

Mr. WHEELER. I am entirely familiar with the Daugherty case, because I handled it pretty nearly from beginning to end. However, the point I wanted to make was this, that repeatedly when investigations have been carried on by the Senate of the United States or by the Federal Trade Commission the hue and cry goes up that the Senate of the United States has not any right to investigate. I just want to make this statement. In my 12 years of experience in the United States Senate I believe that one of the most important functions which this body has had to perform and has performed, and one of the most important things that it has done, that the greatest good it has brought about has been through many of the investigations it has carried on. We may have overstepped our powers in the minds of those whom we investigated, or in the minds of a lot of great corporate wealth of this Nation, but, nevertheless, if there be taken away the power of investigation into these things the legislative branch of our Government will be made pretty nearly impotent to deal with the problems with which it is faced.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I am in full agreement with the Senator from Montana. I am afraid he overlooked my statement which I made in a condensed way in the interest of time, that our powers were very broad, and that I had assumed in all that had gone before, until I got to the minority views, that we could invoke some sort of legislative prospect here for justification, and I had argued the merits rather than the law.

But when I came to the minority views I was content to show that those views did not contemplate anything of a legislative character; they contemplated the allaying of suspicion and of vindication of Mr. Farley, and I am saying that that is not within the power of the Senate. The Senator agrees to that?

Mr. WHEELER. I agree to that.

Mr. BAILEY. In McGrain v. Daugherty (273 U. S., at p. 178), the Court says:

The only legitimate object the Senate could have in ordering the investigation was to aid it in legislating—

They agreed that that object need not be written in the text of the bill—and we think the subject matter was such that the presumption should be indulged that this was the real object. An express avowal of the object would have been better, but in view of the particular subject matter was not indispensable.

We are agreed about that; but how does that affect my argument that the minority report fell outside the power of the Senate, in that the Senate has no power to investigate a public servant in order to allay suspicion or in order to give him a vindication?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. Did I understand the Senator to contend that the minority report gives no justification for the investigation?

Mr. BAILEY. That is my contention.

Mr. BORAH. By reason of the fact that it is manifestly outside of any purpose to acquire information for the purpose of legislation?

Mr. BAILEY. And by reason of the fact, if I may say so to the Senator, that on its face in the one case it says to vindicate himself and allay suspicion created in the public mind, and, in the other case, says it believes the interests of the parties concerned and the public welfare would be served. I am saying that those purposes are all out of the constitutional power of the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. In other words, the minority report eliminates the question of legislation. Does the Senator admit that the charges in the minority report or what is covered by it are sufficient to base a presumption that an investigation should be had for a legislative purpose?

Mr. BAILEY. I did not take the position before, and I wish to say to the Senator that I am thankful for the opportunity to make it clear that I did not wish to come into this case with anything that could have the appearance of a confession and avoidance; I did not wish to come here with anything that would look like a technical objection; I did not wish to raise the question of the power of the Senate. I reserved all of that after having presented the case on the evidence, and assuming that there was no law to govern it, but now we are in that portion of my argument in which the law is necessarily involved, and I want to touch upon that. The minority views do not constitute a basis for presumption of legislative purposes.

What, Mr. President, would be the consequences if we should adopt this resolution? Every officer in the public buildings of the executive departments in Washington, every head of a department, every head of a bureau, every assistant, too, would live and work in holy terror that the Senate of the United States was going to call him in to question at the instance of some Member.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me say to the Senator that I think every head of an executive department, if any question arises with reference to his official conduct, should be subject to investigation by the Senate of the United States. I was afraid the Senator was going to take the position that the Senate of the United States should not have the right to investigate such officials unless a specific charge was made that it was necessary to do so in the interest of enacting some legislation. I repel that suggestion, and say, if that is the Senator's viewpoint, I should regret to see him take that position, because if the Senate of the United States has not the power to investigate the various departments, if they are crooked or corrupt or there is maladministration, the Senate of the United States and the House of Representatives of the United States become impotent in dealing with many of the things which arise in the conduct of the business of the Government.

Mr. BAILEY. I am very much obliged to the Senator. That is not what I am saying and that is not what I am contending. I will have to reiterate. I said that the power of the Senate under its authority of investigation with a view to legislation was very broad. It is sufficiently broad to investigate the official conduct of any bureau of any department, with a view to legislation providing correction; and, of course, "legislative correction" is a very broad term. The Senate has no power, however, to drive a man from office. We do not have the appointing power. The Senate has no power to raise suspicion and bring about such a loss of public confidence in an official that his usefulness is destroyed. Its power in that respect has got to be guarded. I go back to my argument, that we cannot cause an investigation to be had in order to allay suspicion or to vindicate character or on the ground of the general welfare.

Now, let us see the implication. The Senate of the United States has no power whatever to dominate over the executive department of the Government. That department is just as independent of us as we are of it.

The Senate of the United States has no right to use its legislative and investigating power for the purpose of enabling anybody to domineer over, to threaten, to hector, or to control or to vent its disappointment upon any officer. They are free and they must be free. If this Government is to remain the Republic it always has been, and always ought to be, the three coordinate departments must be maintained separate. We cannot legislate about the judges; we cannot disgrace the judges, either. Thus far and no further may we go.

We cannot affect the Attorney General of the United States by bringing him into disgrace and driving him from office. There is a way, if necessity arises. We can investigate the conduct of officers; but the moment we step beyond the good faith of legislative action we have usurped the power which we have sworn not to usurp. I know I am right about that, and I know what the consequence of unauthorized action would be. The adoption of a resolution such as this will set a precedent; and the consequences of that precedent, faithfully followed, will be a "kingfishery" in the United States. [Laughter.]

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. The adoption of the pending resolution would not set any precedent, let me say to the Senator, because, as a matter of fact, the precedent has long since been set. It was set when the Senate investigated the Teapot Dome conditions, and when it investigated Attorney General Daugherty and the Department of Justice.

I am not contending as to facts and I am not disputing with the Senator whether the facts at the present time are sufficient to warrant an investigation in this particular instance; but I do not want to see the Senator led astray into saying that the adoption of the resolution would set a precedent which would destroy the Government, because, if he says that, then he is using identically the language that was used by the other side when we investigated Daugherty and the Department of Justice under him. At that time the other side said, "You seek to tear down the Government; you are going to destroy the faith and confidence of the people of the United States in the Government. I submit that we never destroy the faith and confidence of the people of this country in their Government except in one way, and that is by putting the soft pedal upon charges against men in high places who are charged with corruption and crookedness. That is the way faith and confidence are destroyed; not by bringing out the facts, but by suppressing them."

Mr. BAILEY. I do not think, Mr. President, the Senator and I greatly differ about the law of the case. He is simply taking the view that I am carrying my argument to the point of saying that we cannot investigate a public servant. I know very well we can, and I have just read the case. I am saying that in connection with any investigation there has to be a legislative object in view; to correct conditions by legislation and not to drive a man from office, not to blacken his character, not to destroy public confidence in him; and I am perfectly satisfied that the moment we construe our legislative power into the province of investigating a man for any other purpose than constructive legislation, we have extended the power of the Senate into the executive department of the Government, and we will have every official in that department wondering what he may say to a Senator who comes to his office and makes a demand upon him.

Mr. President, I think I understand the whole situation. I have gone through it with a great deal of care. I have left out one thing, and I am going to discuss that and then take my seat.

There is a great deal more involved here than the insinuations against Mr. Farley, because the Senator from Louisiana himself has said he has preferred no charges.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield further to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. I should be inclined to agree, although I have not followed the testimony before the committee and was not able to do so. The thing that impresses me is that this morning this affidavit is presented. I will say frankly if I had been in Mr. Farley's place or if the Senator from North Carolina had been in Mr. Farley's place and charges of this serious nature had been made on the floor of the Senate, the Senator from North Carolina would have said and I would have said, "I should like you to bring on the witnesses and have an investigation." However, that is beside the question.

Mr. BAILEY. Let me interrupt the Senator. That is precisely what Mr. Farley did. Nobody called upon him for the statement he sent to the chairman of the committee. Mr. Farley voluntarily sent a statement of all the facts to the chairman of the committee. When he sent that statement, so far as I was concerned, I considered it an invitation to send for him if we should find any facts or any evidence, and I found none. I think Mr. Farley's conduct in this matter has been absolutely above criticism. I am afraid the Senator from Montana has not read his statement.

Mr. WHEELER. I have not read his statement.

Mr. BAILEY. He took up each allegation, gave us the facts, and made no effort to get out of anything. That reminds me that I have left out all that trivial stuff about the stamps, and I think the Senator understands that. Will the Senator now continue?

Mr. WHEELER. Here is an affidavit presented this morning. Regardless of whether it was presented too late or whether it was not presented as it should have been presented, it does seem to me the committee at least ought to call this woman, because she presents a sworn affidavit. She can be prosecuted for perjury if it is not true. She has presented a sworn affidavit making what I consider serious charges. I think it would be exceedingly unfortunate if the committee should say, "We are going to disregard the sworn affidavit" of some woman whom I do not know and whom none of the rest of us know. It seems to me the least the committee can do is to call the woman before the committee and ascertain what she does know, and whether or not she can prove the things to which she has sworn in her affidavit.

Mr. BAILEY. I would not subscribe to that suggestion.

Mr. WHEELER. I think if that is not done, in view of the publicity involved which is going all over the country, it will have a bad effect.

Mr. BAILEY. If we should do that and the lady came before the committee and did not make good, and we came again to argue this case here on the floor of the Senate, there would be another lady with another affidavit. I intend to have a conclusion of things so far as I can. We began this matter on the 11th day of February. It is not our fault it has not been heard. There has never been a day since that report was made when the chairman of the committee and myself were not ready to go forward in the matter and sustain the report. It is not our fault it is brought up now, but having been brought up, let us finish it. Otherwise the Senate would go into an investigation and come here again with a report. We gave the man making the accusations 4 days, when he earnestly assured us he had the evidence and could produce it in 40 minutes, and now he comes forward at the last moment in his argument today with an affidavit dated April 23. If he desired the committee to examine anything, why did he not bring it to us and file it with us?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator will recall that in discussing the case in the committee it was freely prophesied, as I remember, by several members that it made no difference about what we reported on the charges already made, the Senator from Louisiana would have additional charges when he got to the floor of the Senate.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes.

Mr. WHEELER. It certainly would not take very long for the committee to send a subpoena and bring this woman here, whoever she may be, and have her testimony in executive session if the committee desires it taken that way. My own view about the matter is that I would want it done, and I think it would be much better for the Postmaster General himself if it were done in that manner.

Mr. BAILEY. I respect the Senator's judgment about it, but my own judgment is quite to the contrary. Most of us have tried cases. I rarely have seen anybody convicted but that some time, between the day of conviction and the day of meeting the penalty, he would bring forth an affidavit.

Mr. WHEELER. Yes; and if he brings it forth with reference to material facts, a new trial is ordinarily granted.

Mr. BAILEY. In some jurisdictions, and in some others we have to have an end of the litigation.

Mr. WHEELER. Yes; in many jurisdictions, if he brings forth material facts to prove his innocence, he is entitled to have a new trial.

Mr. BAILEY. He must show that in good faith, in the first instance, he produced the evidence he had. He must show it was not his fault if he did not have the evidence newly presented. He must show that at any rate he had a case in the beginning. I do think either of these three principles could be established here as a foundation for the procedure suggested by the Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. He must also show that he acted with diligence in presenting his evidence after he got it. The affidavit in question here is dated April 21, and this is the first time the committee ever heard of it.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield—

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. Of course if the Senator wants to base it upon a technicality I would agree with the Senator that if he had the affidavit he should have presented it. I agree that he ought not to have waited until the last minute to present it. I agree further that he had not cooperated with the committee in the manner in which he should. I am perfectly willing to agree with the Senator upon all those points.

Notwithstanding that fact, no matter who it was that presented it, even if it was the worst enemy I had and he presented evidence of fraud against the Postmaster General of the United States or any other Cabinet member, in the form of the sworn affidavit that this person would testify so and so, if that affidavit were presented on the floor of the Senate, then I would think, in justice to the Senate, in justice to the Postmaster General himself, that the woman ought to be called before the committee and she ought to be interrogated as to where she got the information, and so forth.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, the Senator from Montana totally ignores the facts already in the Record. That affidavit relates to the General Builders' Supply Co., the Stewart Co., and the public works of New York, especially the public-building and housing projects. On the desk of the Senator from Louisiana right now is the last word on those subjects.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. LONG. The last word is, "We find fraud, and we recommend that they stop." That is the last word—that they found the charges were apparently supported, that he swindled the Government, and they ought to cease. That is the last word.

Mr. BAILEY. There is no word in the reports to that effect.

Mr. LONG. Let me read it. Here it is. The charge is in the words of Mr. Glavis himself that the change in marble, after the award of the contract to them, for which they allowed a credit for $140,000, but it is alleged the credit should have been much larger. They finally wound up the report by saying that they ought to investigate Stewart first, and then after that—

In view of the requirement of the Treasury Department that before any contractor's file should be examined, the names of complainants and sources of complaints must be furnished, as well as specific complaints on which the investigation is based, such procedure would make the investigation practically impossible. Being unable to reveal how the sources of information have been secured, it is recommended the investigation of the above allegations by this Department be closed.

Mr. BAILEY. There is still nothing in what the Senator read that remotely connects the matter with the matter now in hand. I have been through those files. I know how they started and I know how they ended. I read every document. I shall give some testimony. I never saw a more thorough-going investigation of anybody, and I will pay Mr. Glavis and his chief, the Secretary of the Interior, the compliment of saying that they appear to have overlooked nothing.

They were not investigating Mr. Farley, I agree. They say they were not; but they were investigating everything touching the Hillside housing project and the Federal building in the city of New York. They investigated the contractors and the subcontractors. They investigated the letting of the bids for the subcontractors as well as the contractors. It is a manifest impossibility, Senators, for anyone to go through each of those documents on the floor of the Senate, but they are here for the inspection of Senators, as I inspected them; and I think you may go all the way through and back without the remotest suggestion of a suspicion upon Mr. Farley. The only connection he could possibly have had with the matter was the fact that he was a stockholder in the subcontractor, General Builders' Supply Corporation; and the evidence produced by the Senator from Louisiana, this newspaper article, carries the statement that the General Builders' Supply Corporation did not receive any more business than it had ordinarily received in similar businesses in New York. That is in his evidence.

Mr. President, I was saying just now that I had finished and come to my conclusion. Senators here are witnesses to the fact that this matter, this purported resolution of accusation—whereas it is not; it is merely one of insinuation—has been made the occasion more than twice for reflections of the most damning nature upon the character of the President of the United States.

I do not think it would be fair to myself for me to take my seat without expressing some resentment. I do not think the character of the President of the United States needs defending as against the attacks of anybody. I do not think the character of the President of the United States can be injured by anything that may be said here. That is beyond the power that seeks to destroy the national faith in him. I think it is a matter of self-respect in a Senator's breast that he should not be content to sit in this Chamber and hear a Senator asperse the character of the President of the United States.

We are witnesses here to what has happened. We heard the words, and I have too much respect for the Senate to repeat them. I condemn them, not in his interest, but in my own.

The President of the United States is the symbol of the Nation. The great masses of men do not find the repository of their faith in parliaments or congresses or conventions. They always look to one man. As said by the ancient prophet:

And a man shall be . . . as the shadow of a great rock in a weary land.

This was a weary land in 1932 and 1933. Whatever else may be said—and I would say nothing in unkindness—the American people found their man in November 1932. They exalted him to the Presidency, not in order that he might be just a President, but he was "the shadow of a great rock in a weary land." He was the repository of the faith of 126,000,000 people, and he is; and while we may differ with him, and we should be free to differ with him, it is of the essence of things that in a time like this, if not in all other times, no responsible man in the Union should ever venture, should ever dare to utter a word or make a suggestion calculated to destroy the national faith in him. That is the greatest asset.

I am told that there are eight billions of gold in the Treasury, but the faith in the President is more precious than the gold in the Treasury and means more to the life of the Nation. The faith in the President means more than the rising market or the hope of the harvest. The President is the symbol of the Nation in the darkest hour of its existence.

These are not easy times, Mr. President. These are difficult hours. Things are better than they were, thank God, and they are better than they were because Mr. Roosevelt is what he is, and has been the President that he has been. He has justified that faith. We are surrounded with the testimony that that faith was well worth its exercise. The farmers have an income increased by two billions in the year. The workers have incomes increased by twenty-seven millions every week. The national income has increased in his administration from thirty-eight billions to fifty-two billions. Best of all, whereas men were desperate until they found him, and whereas there was despair in millions of eyes until they beheld him, and whereas there was confusion of counsel like the confusion of Babel until he spoke the word of power and hope from yonder steps, now the people have found themselves. They are planting their crops with hope. They are going about their work with cheer. There is a unity in America, and the basis of that unity is faith in Franklin D. Roosevelt. Differ with him though we may, question his policies if we will, he is not true to his country who undertakes, in an hour like this, to destroy the faith of the American people in the man whom they chose, and who is their President and their leader.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I am aware that for me to take the floor after the very able, learned, and eloquent address of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY] savors greatly of an anticlimax; and I should not undertake to trespass upon the time of the Members of this body if it were not for the fact that I am in position to give personal testimony.

The Postmaster General is my friend. I am very happy to take advantage of the opportunity that is afforded me today to say a word for him, to say here that I am proud of that friendship, and to say to my associates upon this side of the Chamber that they also may be proud of the record that man has made, and is making, and of the character of man he is.

I say I can give personal testimony because I had the honor of serving with the Postmaster General in New York City in the conduct of the campaign of 1932, which resulted in the election of President Roosevelt; and because, at the conclusion of that campaign, the Postmaster General did me the honor of asking me to become First Assistant Postmaster General.

I did not desire to leave my private practice as a lawyer to enter the service of the Government in the Post Office Department. It was the last thing that had entered into my head to do. I so stated to Jim Farley, when he asked me to become his First Assistant Postmaster General. Then he told me that he likewise had no desire whatsoever to enter into the Cabinet of the new administration, but he felt that, in response to the invitation of the President-elect, he could not refuse, and he said to me that he expected me to perform in exactly the same manner.

I am happy now that I did, because, from the 6th of March 1933 until the 3d day of January 1934, I was First Assistant Postmaster General of the United States, and I know how that Department was operated; I know the motives and the principles which guided the Postmaster General in what he was doing; and I know the high standard of service which he held up to the rest of us.

Let me say, Senators, that the Postmaster General realized, when he was entering upon that responsible position, that there had been many charges in the past of improper manipulation of Government authority. He knew that there were contracts to be let. He knew that the great aviation system of the country had prospered greatly on an air mail subsidy. He knew that the ship subsidy was being operated under a law passed by the Congress.

He knew that great buildings were being constructed throughout the length and breadth of the land, and there were applications which came to his desk for appointment to all of the principal positions of the Post Office Department from men who, by reason of their association with aviation, or with shipping, or with the construction of buildings, were claiming special fitness to take charge of the bureaus which would have to handle such contracts.

The Postmaster General laid down the principle that the Assistant Postmaster General who should have charge of aviation or with shipping contracts should be a man who had had no connection near or remote with any aviation company or with any shipping company, because he wanted to make it certain that the Second Assistant Postmaster General, under whose jurisdiction those contracts would come, would be above any possibility of reproach. I say to you, Senators, that you can take a great deal of satisfaction in the fact that the man upon whom that selection fell was the Honorable William W. Howes, of South Dakota, whose honor and whose integrity and whose ability are recognized by all who know him.

Under the leadership of Mr. Howes and of the gentleman who was appointed to succeed him when he became First Assistant Postmaster General—I refer to the Honorable Harlee Branch, of Georgia—under both of these gentlemen the business of the air mail subsidies and the business of ship subsidies have been conducted in a manner that does credit not only to Jim Farley, not only to the Democratic Party, which he represents, but it does credit to the great Government of the United States as well. The reports as to those things have been laid upon our desks where every man may read them. We know that in these branches of the service there was opportunity enough for any official who wanted to be corrupt, and we know that the record of the Department is as clean as the proverbial hound's tooth.

That was not all. Under the jurisdiction of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General came the business of specifying what the postal needs were so far as buildings were concerned. Under the system in vogue at that time the construction of post-office buildings as well as their custody was under the jurisdiction of the Treasury Department. So, for the position of Fourth Assistant, as well as for the others, Jim Farley sought a man who would be above any possibility not only of suspicion, but of temptation, by reason of former associations. There was therefore selected as Fourth Assistant Postmaster General the Honorable Silliman Evans of the State of Texas, and there is no man who knows Silliman Evans or who knows his record who does not know that he also is a man of the highest standards upon whom the utmost reliance can at all times be placed.

When Silliman Evans resigned that position to accept a responsible and very remunerative post with a large private corporation, the Postmaster General, this man against whom these charges are being hurled in the reckless and wanton manner that has been described by the able and eloquent Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], this Jim Farley, at whom certain people for political purposes like to hurl sneers, this "Jim" Farley sought then for the position of Fourth Assistant Postmaster General the Honorable Smith W. Purdum, a civil-service employee, a man who had worked his way up from the very lowest position in the civil service; a man who had made such a record for efficiency and integrity that the Postmaster General felt himself honored to designate him as his Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, and to place him in charge of all that went on, in this department, with respect to building. Was that the conduct of a man who harbored the purposes charged by the Senator from Louisiana?

The Postmaster General knew, because he had been in politics, that charges were likely to be made. He did not know, of course, from what quarter they might come, but he did know, and we all know, that he who enters into the political arena takes his character in his hand, because there is never a lack of men who, for the purpose of advancing their own cause, or the cause of an organization which they think they represent, are willing to pervert the evidence in order to create suspicion and to undermine character. Knowing this, the Postmaster General was guided, as I have pointed out, in the selection of these various and sundry principal assistants.

Because he understood the method of political attack, however, he went a step further, and upon the day I took the oath of office as First Assistant Postmaster General, Jim Farley came to me and said, "Joe, I want you to select the chief Post Office inspector, and I want you to select a man upon whom the Post Office Department can depend for absolute integrity and one whose ability and loyalty will be unquestioned, and one in whose actions the people of the United States can place reliance."

So, Senators, carrying out the instructions of my chief, I undertook to select the Chief Post Office Inspector, the man who is at the head of this bureau which, you have heard it said, is being used as an instrumentality for tracking down witnesses, and intimidating them, and seeking to suppress evidence.

Senators may be interested to know how that selection was made. Not a single political endorsement was received from any quarter of the country, because we desired to have a post-office inspector and a post-office inspection division which would be under obligations to no leader, to no group, to no interest except to the Postmaster General and the administration. So I sent word to all of those who were candidates for appointment as chief inspector to write a memorandum of a certain length suggesting improvements in the Postal Service, and indicating the conception of each of the respective candidates of the duties he would be called upon to perform should he be selected.

As a result of that competition conducted by the First Assistant Postmaster General, the choice of chief postal inspector fell upon Kildroy P. Aldrich, whose ability in the Postal Service had been such that he had been designated by the previous administration as inspector in charge at Chicago, one of the most important offices in the country. And so Mr. Aldrich became the chief post office inspector.

Then one day—I think it was in April 1933, or shortly after he was appointed—Mr. Aldrich called upon the Postmaster General and said, "We have here a case against one Edwin P. Knotts, which comes up from Texas. You may be interested in it, because it appears from the record that this Mr. Knotts made a contribution to the Democratic national campaign committee fund." That is the contribution which has been mentioned in the charges which were presented to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. And Mr. Farley said to Aldrich, "Go and see the First Assistant Postmaster General. Whatever he says about this case is all right with me. I have placed him in charge of the postal-inspection branch of this service. Take it up with him."

So Aldrich came to me with the Knotts case. This is the case upon which all this mountain of suspicion has been built. I reviewed the file, and I said to Mr. Aldrich, "Why, there is only one thing to do. Proceed with the case. I am sure that will be the judgment of the Postmaster General. Let us put it up to him."

Accordingly, Aldrich and I together went to the Postmaster General, made him acquainted with all the facts, and he said, just as I knew he would say, "Proceed with the case; let the chips fall where they may."

So Knotts was prosecuted, and the accused pleaded guilty of using the mails to defraud. So much for that.

I do not intend this afternoon to go into all the charges which were presented to this committee. That would take too much time. I am just talking to the Senate of some of the things that I know of my own knowledge so that the Senate may have the benefit of that first-hand information.

THE STEWART CO. CONTRACT

The principal charge in all this case has to do with the contract which was awarded to the James Stewart Co. for the construction of the post-office annex in New York City. There again I can speak from personal knowledge.

In December 1933 the Postmaster General took his first vacation and went to Europe. Going to Europe, he left me in charge of the Post Office Department, and from the day that he departed early in December until after New Year's day in 1933 I was the Acting Postmaster General in charge of the Department. During that period this question of James Stewart & Co. and the New York annex building came up. I followed the same course with respect to that contract that I had been instructed to follow by the Postmaster General with respect to all other matters coming under my jurisdiction as Acting Postmaster General; that is to say, the law and the facts without favoritism of any kind.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DUFFY in the chair). Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. LONG. Is the Senator talking about the courthouse building?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I am talking about the annex.

Mr. LONG. The post office?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The post-office annex.

Mr. LONG. The marble matter was in the—

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Oh, that is just another phase. The marble was in the courthouse. We will take them one at the time, if the Senator will permit.

Mr. LONG. I was wondering if the Treasury Department marble building was in there.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. We will take that up in due course.

Mr. LONG. All right.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The curious fact is that the controversy with respect to the construction of this post-office annex lay between a contractor by the name of Driscoll and a contractor by the name of Stewart—the Stewart Co. A Member of this body, the distinguished senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], called me by the telephone because he said a constituent of his was interested in Stewart & Co. He said that Stewart & Co. were entitled to receive the bid, but he had information that something was going on somewhere to take the contract from Stewart and give it to Driscoll. In other words, the charge which was repeated to me by the senior Senator from Maryland was that some political forces were in operation seeking to take the contract away from Stewart, the company Farley was said to be favoring, and give it to Driscoll & Co. It was clear to me that the Senator thought the Post Office Department was favoring Driscoll. I was able to say to Senator TYDINGS, "The Post Office Department will have no part whatsoever in the awarding of this contract. If you have any complaint to make upon that score, take it up with the Treasury Department, because the Treasury Department is the Department of the Government which has jurisdiction." That the Senator did. On the 18th of January 1934 he took the floor in this body to speak about this very question. His address will be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for January 18, 1934, beginning at page 857. On page 858 I find these words referring to an opinion of the Attorney General. The senior Senator from Maryland said:

That was sent to the Secretary of the Treasury. That removed the firm of Driscoll & Co. from the field. The contract then should have been let to Stewart & Co., who were the lowest qualified bidder having signed and complied with the N. R. A. code prior to the time of the opening of the bids, which Driscoll did not do until a week later, when he found he was the lowest bidder and thus had an unfair advantage of making a second choice as to whether or not he wanted the contract or did not want it at all. Of course, Driscoll & Co. then wanted the contract. They knew the Attorney General had ruled against them, so they appealed to the Comptroller that the contract should be given to the lowest bidder, notwithstanding the provisions of the invitation to bid.

The provisions of the invitation to bid, of course, were that the successful bidder should comply with the N. R. A. code, and Driscoll had not complied.

I do not believe the Comptroller had all the facts, but his opinion, which I have not here, simply indicates that the lowest bidder, whether qualified or not, should have the contract.

Then there was some interruption of the Senator, and he concluded with these words:

It has not been let—

The contract has not been let—and that is the reason why I am here today, because I am afraid it is going to be illegally let, and if it is we will air some things I have not time to go into this morning.

Now, what was that charge? The charge of the senior Senator from Maryland was that he feared the bid was about to be illegally let. To Stewart & Co.? Not at all. To Driscoll & Co. And Driscoll & Co. is not the contracting firm which the Postmaster General is alleged to have favored.

THE FEDERAL COURTHOUSE

The Senator from Louisiana has referred to the Federal courthouse. It may be interesting to note that the contract for the Federal courthouse in New York City was let on January 19, 1933, before the beginning of the present administration. It was let by the then Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, Ferry K. Heath, an appointee of the previous administration. The board, by the way, which had jurisdiction over the letting of contracts at that time consisted of James A. Wetmore, Acting Supervising Architect, H. G. Sherwood, executive officer, L. A. Simony, superintendent Architectural Division, and G. W. Stone, who acted as substitute that day for Mr. George O. Von Nerta, supervising engineer. Each one of these individuals was a civil-service employee. And afterward under the present administration there was no political appointee in the Treasury Department in charge of the construction activities of that Department except the Honorable L. W. Robert, Jr., Assistant Secretary of the Treasury.

He had assisting him the same George O. Von Nerta, supervising engineer; J. W. Ginder, superintendent architectural engineering division; T. C. Brooks, superintendent structural engineering division; N. S. Thompson, superintendent mechanical engineering division; and H. S. Roome, chief of the law division—every one of them a civil-service employee.

Under the Procurement Division in charge of the public-works program of the Treasury, the Director of Procurement is Admiral C. J. Peoples, and under him a long list of civil-service employees, including W. E. Reynolds, L. A. Simon, J. W. Ginder, Neal A. Melick, T. C. Brooks, N. S. Thompson, J. G. Schaefer, and William K. Laws—all of them, as I said, civil-service employees.

Mr. President, I shall not undertake to trespass further upon the time of the Senate, but I do want to say that Admiral Peoples, Director of Procurement, has made a report, which is available to any who desire to see it, upon all of the changes in the Federal courthouse to which reference has been made by the Senator from Louisiana. I ask that it may be printed at the close of my remarks. However, the point in which we are interested, the point in which the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads is interested, is that the Postmaster General had nothing whatsoever at any time to do with the letting of the contract; that all of this work was carried on by the Treasury Department through its own agents, and that any changes in specifications which were made, were made at the order of the Treasury Department without the intervention in any way of the Post Office Department or the Postmaster General.

So I say, Senators of the United States, every single charge which has been made in the resolution can be analyzed and controverted in exactly the same way. I know of my own knowledge that the Postmaster General never undertook to control the discretion of the Attorney General or of any other officer in the Government in the selection of appointees. I know that the instructions which he gave to all who were assisting him and the word which he sent to the head of every department to which a clearance might go from him, were, "Appoint nobody who in your judgment is not competent to perform the task you want done."

Mr. President, let me conclude by saying that having worked with Jim Farley in New York and in the Post Office Department in Washington for more than a year, I can testify that there is not in the United States of America a man of higher ideals; there is not a man in the United States whose integrity stands higher than his; there is not a man or woman in the United States whose morals can be said to be any clearer than his. I am proud to call myself his friend; and Senators, whether on this side of the Chamber or upon the other side of the Chamber, may be proud that Jim Farley is a member of the Cabinet of the President.

The report of Admiral Peoples on the changes in the courthouse building in New York, I now send to the desk.

The report is as follows:

FEBRUARY 27, 1935.

MR. LOUIS R. GLAVIS,

Director Division of Investigations,

Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. GLAVIS: In my letter to you of September 21, 1934, in reply to your letter of August 22, 1934, I stated to you that all of the items referred to in your letter, excepting nos. 5, 9, and 10, appeared to relate to the New York courthouse project which, it was understood, was not to be further investigated by your agents; and that the necessary steps to investigate the remaining items could be taken by the Treasury Department. I find on examining the file that I have never further replied to your letter nor indicated to you the result of such investigation. For the purpose of completing the record, I am now transmitting the following information, the result of my inquiries of the persons having knowledge of the transactions, and an examination of the pertinent records:

Item no. 1—Substitution of marble, resulting in reduction of $140,000

An increase in the cost of the foundations and other portions of the structure over the original estimates made it necessary to provide for savings and reductions in cost wherever it was possible to do so. One of the proposals was a substitution of less expensive types of marble for interior finish. As a result of representations from the representatives of the marble industry in various States, it was determined to allocate the material so that as many States as possible would be represented. The approximate distribution of marbles, by States, under this allocation, was as follows:

State:	Allocation	Cubic feet
Montana	-----	1,200
Missouri (Ozark)	-----	6,000
Missouri (Ste. Genevieve)	-----	2,000
Tennessee	-----	4,000
Georgia	-----	4,000
Maryland	-----	2,000
Alabama	-----	3,000
Vermont	-----	24,000
Total	-----	46,200

The architect proceeded to revise his distribution of interior marbles throughout the building, and on May 24, 1933, submitted to the contractor such distribution floor by floor. This list consisted of 16 different marbles, as follows:

Imperial Danby, Vermont.
 Special White Danby, Vermont.
 Northern Ivory, Vermont.
 Neshobe Gray Veined, Vermont.
 Pink Lepanto, Vermont.
 Westland Cream, dark, Vermont.
 Broccadillo or Cipolin, Vermont.
 French Gray, Vermont.
 Ozark Claire, Missouri.
 Ozark Veinless, Missouri.
 Ste. Genevieve Golden Vein, Missouri.
 Light Cherokee, Georgia.
 Alabama Veined Cream, Alabama.
 Montana Travertine, Montana.
 Cardiff Green, Maryland.
 Gray Tennessee, Tennessee.

The reallocation affected only 38,200 cubic feet out of a total of 46,200, 8,000 cubic feet of the original allocation being maintained; and later a further item of 4,200 cubic feet was omitted because of the change from marble cornices in elevator lobbies to plaster.

On this reallocation of the marbles the Supervising Architect's Office estimated a saving of $150,000, made up as follows:

(1) Additional cost of freight	$10,000
(2) Floor-tile changes to 17 inches by 33 inches for floor filled areas only and marble borders to remain as originally required	23,000
(3) Ashlar for wainscots throughout building to remain 1 1/4 inches thick where originally required	5,000
(4) Marble cornice for which there is an alternate to change to plaster for a deduction in contract price of $57,000 is about 10 percent of total marble cost and is included in the contractor's proposed credit of $140,000 to the extent of about	12,000
Total	50,000

Office estimate as of Apr. 5, 1933, was a deduction of 200,000
 Deduct the above items 50,000

Estimated credit due Government for marble changes 150,000

The final result compared with the Assistant Secretary's allocation is as follows:

State	Assistant Secretary's allocation	Architect's final distribution
	Cubic feet	Cubic feet
Montana	1,200	548
Missouri (Ozark)	6,000	5,960
Missouri (Ste. Genevieve)	2,000	2,040
Tennessee	4,000	3,900
Georgia	4,000	3,877
Maryland	2,000	1,467
Alabama	3,000	3,065
Vermont	24,000	25,343
Total	46,200	46,200

The change was finally agreed to with the contractor on June 15, 1933, on the basis of a credit of $140,000.

A letter from the contractor, James Stewart & Co., to the procurement division, sets out the following detail as to the result of its credit of $140,000:

Original amount included in our bid	$800,000
Credit to Government, alternate A	$57,000
Credit change in marbles	140,000
Total credits	197,000
Balance included in contract	603,000

Actual cost to us	$662,500
Net loss to us	59,500
In addition thereto we pay Duffy Bros. for plaster cornices where marble was omitted in the elevator lobbies	6,000

Making a total loss to us of 65,500

"Due to the substitutions and modifications by the architect and the Government.

"We must call to your attention the fact that N. R. A. was just coming into being during these negotiations, causing great increases in mill and quarry wages in the sections selected by the Government for the purchase of these marbles. Your Department, however, held us to our credits with the consummate loss to us as above set forth."

Two of the above items were substantiated as follows:

The original amount included in bid of $800,000 was supported by a sworn copy of an original proposal of April 14, 1933, from the F. E. Gates Marble & Tile Co., of Indianapolis, for all marble according to the plans and specifications for the sum of $800,000.

The actual cost to the contractor of $662,500 was substantiated by a sworn copy of a contract dated August 15, 1933, between James Stewart & Co., and Mutual Marble Corporation, showing the cost to be the amount referred to, $662,500.

Both of the foregoing sworn copies are at present in our file.

Item no. 2. The extra order for cabinet work aggregating $189,000, following the award to the contractors of the general contract and reconciliation of the amount involved

The woodwork in question involved special cabinet work, carving and sculpture, and required particularly careful treatment. The amount originally set aside for this work by the architect was $300,000. It was originally contemplated that this item would be covered by a special contract. However, under date of March 17, 1933, the architect recommended that because of the necessity that this work be coordinated with the work that the contractors were doing, it be handled by a subcontract by means of invitation for bids from subcontractors, a proposal based thereon to be submitted by the contractors to the Supervising Architect's Office. In view of the close contact which a separate woodworking contractor would have to have with similar work in the general contract and the fact that the general contractor could without difficulty take bids from a selected list of thoroughly qualified woodworking concerns, it was decided to authorize the general contractor to proceed in the manner suggested. Such instructions were issued under date of April 5, 1933, by the Acting Supervising Architect to Cass Gilbert, the architect.

On April 25, 1933, the architect forwarded a proposal from the general contractor with a recommendation that the lowest of the nine bids secured by the contractor be accepted in the amount of $172,418.05. To this amount the general contractor had added 7 1/2 percent for general conditions and overhead and 10 percent fee for his services in handling the work and for profit, amounting to a total of $203,834.34. The architect recommended that this proposal of the contractor be accepted and called attention to the fact that the amount recommended is $96,000 less than the amount carried in the reservation set up for the special woodwork.

After full consideration the contractor was required to eliminate the 7 1/2 percent for general conditions and overhead, and on May 25, 1933, Assistant Secretary Robert accepted the modified proposal of the contractor, in the amount of $189,659.85.

Under date of August 15, 1933, the Comptroller General questioned the addition to the contract from the standpoint of the 10-percent allowance of the general contractor. This communication from the Comptroller General was answered on November 11, 1933, with a general statement of the facts involved. In a second letter of January 12, 1934, the Comptroller General took further exception. This letter was answered on June 19, 1934, with a letter pointing out that while the construction engineer in charge of the project inspects the material and generally supervises the cabinet work, the supervision over detailed work in connection with the cabinet work, which is of great importance, is part of the duties of the general contractor, and to assume these duties the Government would necessarily have had to employ additional experienced help. It was also pointed out that the bids for the cabinet work received by the general contractor did not include provision for hoisting material, furnishing power for machines, heating of the building, protection of materials, coordination of various trades, and responsibility for paying for material and labor prior to acceptance by the Government. The Department stated that it considered the contractor entitled to the 10-percent fee for all foregoing services.

No further reply has as yet been received from the Comptroller General.

Item no. 3. The circumstances surrounding the use of granite instead of limestone for exterior of the building

The only relevance to investigation of this project which is perceived in connection with this item is that on the basis of the bids submitted a limestone building would have been cheaper than one constructed of granite. For reasons which were deemed sufficient, the Supervising Architect's Office determined, on the basis of recommendations of the architect of the project, that granite was the appropriate material for the outside finish of the building.

Excerpts from a letter dated January 11, 1933, from the architect, Cass Gilbert, who, incidentally, designed the new Supreme Court

Building, and, as you know, was considered to be an outstanding member of his profession, sufficiently explains the basis for his recommendation:

"The site is located between the municipal building and the county courthouse. It faces the civic center, around which some of the most important public buildings in the city of New York have been grouped and others will be located. Included in this group are the municipal building, the new county courthouse, the hall of records, the new State office building, all of which are of granite, and the new board of health building, now under construction, which will be of granite.

"The United States courthouse will be the most prominent building in this group, and it seems desirable that the material of which it is built should be of the most permanent character and in harmony with the public buildings adjacent to it. Many expressions from prominent citizens of New York have reached us and all are unanimously in favor of the use of granite for the exterior of this building * * *.

"All of the bids are exceptionally low, and this is especially so of the granite bid, for in the granite trade there is a very large number of unemployed men. By the use of granite not only will the Government get a very good bargain but it will put more men to work than in using any other material, for granite requires a larger percentage of hand work and less machine work in its fabrication * * *."

Item No. 4. The change in specifications after award of the contract, whereby brick was substituted for marble in the air shafts, and a reconciliation of the $49,000 allowed therefor

The necessity for savings in the final cost of the building has already been indicated. On February 21, 1933, the architect was instructed to submit a list of items further to reduce the cost. With his letter in reply, of March 21, 1933, the architect forwarded a proposal from the contractor offering a deduction of $40,000 for the substitution of certain brick wall facings and trim where granite was required by the original contract, this change being suggested after study by the architect in accordance with the Department's instructions. The architect recommended the acceptance of this proposal. As a result of further negotiations with the contractor, the amount of the deduction was increased to $49,000. The allowance for the granite omitted was about $70,000 and the allowance for the additional cost of the brick in place thereof was about $21,000. It is understood that the face brick was purchased by the contractor from Fredenburg & Lounsbury, of New York City.

There follows a detailed statement of the method of arriving at the foregoing figures prepared in the Office of the Supervising Architect at the time, based on the contractor's figures and on independent verification thereof, and the original of which is in our files:

Items nos. 5 and 9: Relations said to exist between Harry D. Watts, vice president of Stewart & Co.; Assistant Secretary L. W. Robert and Mr. W. E. Reynolds, of the Procurement Division; and whether or not Government officials were entertained by Stewart & Co. by being brought from Washington to New York at their expense to prize fights and other entertainments, and if so, the identities of such officials

The Director of Procurement questioned closely Mr. W. E. Reynolds as to alleged relations with Mr. Harry D. Watts. Mr. Reynolds gave assurances that he barely knew Watts, that his relations with him were purely official on public business, and that he had not accepted any courtesies from Stewart & Co. or from Mr. Watts; and, in fact, was not present at any prize fight as their guest. The Director of Procurement made inquiries from Mr. Melick as to any such relations; also from Mr. Martin, and was advised to the contrary. The Director has observed Mr. Reynolds since he has been Assistant Director of Procurement and there has never been the slightest intimation or indication of anything which could raise a question or the slightest suspicion as to his honesty and integrity.

I know that these charges against Mr. Robert have been investigated by the Treasury Department, and that no evidence was found to substantiate them.

Item no. 6: Observation on the fact that when the contract was awarded, January 1933, and it was then known that costs of approximately $300,000 in excess of the expectation would result, changes were not made in the plans for the superstructure before awarding the general contract

It is assumed that the only alternative being suggested is, that when the low bid was found to exceed the amount available, bids should have been rejected, specifications altered, and new bids requested. Whether this action should be taken involved the exercise of judgment and the necessity for an administrative determination. There is certainly no evidence, in view of the urgency of creating work by placing the building in construction at the earliest possible moment, the low prices prevailing at that time, and the wide competition in the bidding on the contract for the superstructure, that this judgment was exercised unwisely; still less, that it was exercised irregularly. The fact that the savings required amounted to no more than approximately 5 percent of the estimated cost of the building presumably indicated that there would be no difficulty in securing reasonable reductions in cost as the building progressed.

It is assumed that the only place this item might have in this connection is that it indicates some irregularity in the proceedings. No slightest suspicion of this arises from the facts stated. It may be added, incidentally, that those officials referred to in your report as possibly being involved in close relations with the contractor, were not, at the time this bid was accepted, in any way connected with the Procurement Division or the Treasury Department.

Item no. 7. Whether the total amount of marble originally aggregated 55,000 feet, which was reduced to 46,000 feet, and if so, had a comparable credit been given the Government?

The original amounts were not reduced. The original amount of 54,000 cubic feet (not 55,000) was made up in part of 7,800 cubic feet of miscellaneous marble, limestone, and green slate. This item was retained unchanged in addition to the 46,200 feet, the allocation of which is explained in detail under item no. 1. In addition to the 7,800 cubic feet of miscellaneous marble, limestone, and green slate, an item of 8,000 cubic feet of Missouri marble originally specified was also retained without reallocation, as explained under item no. 1. Obviously no credit was due the Government in connection with this item.

Item no. 8. Whether the size of the tiling in marble floors was reduced from that originally specified and a reconciliation of the credit allowed the Government on this account

The size of the tiling in the fields only in the marble floors was slightly reduced. The original contract called for tiling of 4½ square feet each, the dimensions being 18 by 36 inches. It was finally determined to reduce the tiling in the fields, but not in borders, etc., to approximately 3.85 square feet each, the dimensions being 17 by 33 inches. This resulted in a reduced cost principally of labor of approximately $25,000, due to the union wage scale, which required higher rates for setting tile over 4 square feet. This item of $25,000 is included in the $140,000 saving described in item no. 1, the marble covered by item no. 1 including all marble tile and its installation.

The figure of $25,000 was, as appears from the original figures in our files, arrived at as follows: 74,200 square feet of field, 35 cents per square foot, saving $25,850.

Item no. 10. Whether relatives of officials of the Treasury Department or Procurement Division are or were employed by the contractors in connection with either project

It having been discovered that a son of Construction Engineer Edward F. O'Brien was employed by Stewart & Co. working on the Post Office Annex, Mr. O'Brien was, on July 14, 1934, requested to see that the employment referred to was terminated immediately. A carbon copy of this letter is in our file. On July 17, 1934, a letter of Mr. O'Brien contained the following:

"On receipt of your letter of the 14th instant, relative to my son Emmett, I at once requested the contractors to terminate his services, and last evening he was separated from his position on this operation."

This is the only instance in which any information has been obtained of a relationship of this character.

Very truly yours,

C. I. PEOPLES, Director of Procurement.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I feel at this juncture that the minority views, in which I concurred with the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] and the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. GIBSON], should appear in the RECORD, and my own remarks concerning it are going to be very brief. I, therefore, ask unanimous consent that the clerk read these particular minority views, for there is a second minority report also, in addition to the one to which I refer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerk will read as requested.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

MINORITY VIEWS

We concur in the findings of the majority of the committee that upon the record there has not been presented a prima facie case for an investigation of the charges contained in Senate Resolution 74.

It is our view, however, that the wide-spread circulation of these charges has created suspicion in the public mind. We believe that the interests of the parties concerned and the public welfare can best be served by a prompt and thorough investigation of the charges made in Senate Resolution 74.

ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE, Jr.
W. WARREN BARBOUR.
E. W. GIBSON.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, while the report, which, as the Senate will have observed, is a very brief one, fully covers our views, I feel I should briefly refer to them, nonetheless.

First, may I point out that while I was not in the Chamber, and I am of the opinion that none of us were in the Chamber during all of the remarks of the distinguished Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], which were very long, though, as always, most eloquent and compelling, I believe the distinguished Senator rather disposed of the report of this particular group of the minority as being of no particular moment or importance. I do not criticize the Senator for his views as he may have expressed them in relation to the report, and I know he did not say what he did in criticism, either, but I do want to say, and I believe I am speaking for the other two Senators who signed it, that we were, of course, entirely sincere in what we said and felt, as we still feel, that our views were, in their own way, just as important as any other views on the subject.

I am not going to indulge in any of the personalities which have been raised in this matter, and I make no accusations myself, but it is certainly my honest conviction that in the light of the wide-spread publicity that has been given to the charges of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG], and in the light of the very grave nature of these charges, despite what might be called the animus on the part of the author of the resolution, in the Postmaster General's own interest, and in the public interest, there should be a full and complete investigation. Certainly if the charges were made against someone associated with an administration "on this side of the aisle" so to speak, that most certainly would be my view also.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. BARBOUR. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator was of the opinion, however, that the charges which had been brought by the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] had no evidence to support them?

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I was going to say in a moment anyway, and it would have been only fair to say it, that, in the first place, the Chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, of which I am a member, and the other members of that committee were fair in the way they considered the resolution, and were diligent and careful. I feel, as expressed in this minority report, that there was nothing actually adduced in the hearings of the committee which would have warranted an investigation of the Postmaster General or anyone else. In that statement of fact I concur with the majority of the committee.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. BARBOUR. I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. At the time the minority views were filed did the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads have before it, either in substance or in effect or in form, the affidavit which has gone into the Record of the Senate today, or any part of it? I refer to the affidavit, or purported affidavit, of Miss Humphreys, which appears to have been regularly taken. I wonder if the Senator or his committee had any cognizance of the facts, if they be facts, set out in that affidavit.

Mr. BARBOUR. I think not, Mr. President. If I have in mind aright the affidavit to which the able Senator refers, it is entirely new matter which has been brought up since the deliberations of the committee in respect to the resolution.

I shall not delay the Senate much longer. There is on my part no partisan feeling in this matter, and my views are simply these: Entirely aside, as I have said, from the fact, as it must be said in all fairness, that there was not brought before the committee in its deliberations what one might call actual evidence, although the committee and its chairman gave every opportunity for such evidence to be brought forward; none the less, in the light of the extreme gravity of the charges which have been made here on the floor of the Senate against a Cabinet officer, I feel that it is not only in his interest and in the interest of public opinion, that the investigation should be made, but, frankly, although I myself make no charges, I am astonished and surprised that the Postmaster General himself has not demanded that a full and complete investigation should be made.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I have given to this controversy every moment of time and every ounce of training and every measure of fairness that comes by reason of years of experience. I address the Senate after listening to a splendid presentation of one phase of the matter coming from the eloquent tongue of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], and after a pleading and most pathetic presentation by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY]. When I use the term "pathetic", I do so out of my recognition of the splendid heart in the breast of the Senator from Wyoming, who is naturally favorable to his great principle. Out of it all, however, there comes a thing which to me is uppermost in all of this controversy; and I hope I may deal with it in the same spirit of fairness as I should deal with it were it presented to me on a court of last resort.

Everything else may be waived aside; all that the learned Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY] says has its force and effect; everything that the able Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] says has its place in the picture, and everything that the able Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] says has its place in the picture, to be viewed from their various standpoints; but there comes before the Senate, and there has been admitted into the Record, a matter which now goes before the American people, and we cannot stop it to save our lives, the affidavit of an individual, made under the solemnity of an oath, which stands here condemning somebody. Either the person who made that oath and that affidavit should be punished as having made a false affidavit which brought the recognition of the Senate to the extent that it has gone into its own records, or else the great, broad, determined, fearless powerful man standing at the head of a great party should say, "I challenge the facts, if they be facts, set out in that affidavit, and I want an investigation. I want my party to investigate, because my party is in control of the Senate of the United States, and it will have the majority of the membership of the investigating committee."

I am speaking now for a man for whom I have the most profound respect, and I am not speaking against a single utterance that has been made here. I am speaking in the interest of the future strength of the Democratic Party. We can lead this party downward or we can lead it upward if we desire. We can lead it downward by smothering facts, or we can lead it upward by saying, "Come on and prove the facts"; and, if I may for the moment quote from Shakespeare—

And damn'd be him that first cries, "Hold, enough!"

Jim Farley to me, so far as I know from this record, stands as a man before a bar, presumed to be innocent; and in my mind he is innocent; but I do not want him to be convicted by that affidavit. I am now speaking for Farley, and I am speaking for my party. I do not want him, and I do not want my party to be sent downward under a single affidavit to which we did not dare say to the affiant, "Come on and prove your facts!"

Why do we not call a committee here? Why do we not present the affidavit to the committee before which it now stands, the Post Offices and Post Roads Committee, and say, "Go into that affidavit and call every witness that the Senator from Louisiana will even intimate has any knowledge of the facts?"

Let us take up this thing fearlessly. It is not a question of dropping the subject or smothering it under. Things cannot be smothered under with the American populace; and if democracy stands for anything, it stands for fair play. Fair play demands that Mr. Farley be defended and that this affidavit be not permitted to be smothered in the RECORD of the Senate of the United States.

Mr. President, I say to every lawyer here who has ever presided over a court that if that affidavit were presented to a court having power to issue writs in equity there is not a court in the land which would not issue a temporary restraining order or a temporary injunction upon that affidavit ex parte. If that be true, does the Senate of the United States say it is afraid to go into an investigation in order to defend its own administration?

Democracy is in the balance here in a larger way than some of us may think it is. Courage will do more for democracy than smothering it under or smearing it over or saying the blame should be thrown on the Senator from Louisiana. I hold no brief for any Senator who brings somebody before the bar for investigation, but it is not a question of the Senator's activity. It is a question of whether or not the public should have the facts so that the public may say that the party to which the accused belongs was fairly dealt with, convicted if need be, but acquitted, pray God!

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the pending resolution is before us under unanimous consent, which, I presume, will require that it be disposed of before any other business may be taken up.

As I read the resolution, I can find in it no request for an investigation for the purpose of eliciting facts to aid us in legislation. As I read the resolution and the statement of the facts, and hear the facts discussed, I must conclude that the investigation sought is one which would not have for its purpose that of guiding us in legislation, but that it would be an investigation which would have for its purpose getting rid of one who is charged to be an incompetent public official. This is an attack based on malfeasance in office. It is upon the resolution as I find it here in the Senate that I must pass, and therefore I discuss it according to its terms.

Whatever might be thought by some as to the propriety of the Postmaster General in asking for an investigation, or whatever might be regarded as the proper procedure from a party standpoint, I have to do with the resolution and with our authority to deal with the subject as the resolution is presented.

There are about seven charges lodged against the Postmaster General. At least four of these charges, if true, would render him wholly incompetent to hold the office which he now holds, and not only that, but some three of them would render him liable to indictment and prosecution in the courts of the country. It cannot be any ordinary matter, therefore, when we come to deal with a member of the President's Cabinet upon such grounds as are here alleged.

I do not know of any graver responsibility than that of this body undertaking to pass judgment on a member of a coordinate branch of the Government. As I find the resolution not justifying an investigation on the ground that it would bring forward facts which would aid us in legislating, I do not know of any authority by which we can proceed to investigate for the purpose of removing an official from office.

The President of the United States is solely responsible for Mr. Farley's presence at this time in his Cabinet. He has the sole power to continue him in the Cabinet, or to dismiss him. The President is responsible to the people of the United States the same as are we. He has his responsibility under the Constitution, and that responsibility is particularly defined by the Constitution in this particular instance.

Let me ask, if the Senate under this resolution should proceed to an investigation, and it should be found on investigation that the charges were true, what would be the result? What would we do about it? What could we do about it? What power have we in the premises? What power would we have in the premises to move any further?

We could not pass a resolution which would result in the removal of Mr. Farley from office. We could not take any action which would result in his removal from office. He would still be a member of the President's Cabinet, if the President saw fit to retain him. In other words, we would be utterly without power to effectuate the result of our investigation. We would be utterly without power to accomplish anything in the way of removing one whom we might desire to remove by reason of the demonstration of his incompetency to hold public office. If the purpose is to secure removal from office you must go to those who are vested with power to remove him.

The President of the United States, however, has the exclusive power, and the President now has the information, and I must assume that the President will act in accordance with the public interest as he views it. If he does not, the responsibility is his, not mine. The Constitution fixes responsibility and I have no power and this Senate has no power to change it.

Suppose we proceeded to the investigation and brought in our report, as I have stated, and suppose we passed a resolution condemning Mr. Farley. Then this body, which is the only court for the trial of impeachments, would have passed judgment in advance of any judicial procedure known to the Constitution. If thereafter anyone should lodge articles of impeachment against Mr. Farley in the House of Representatives, and they should be voted upon the facts as presented, the case would come to this body for trial, and the body which would have to pass upon Mr. Farley's impeachment and determine whether he should retain office, what would be the position if this Senate would have rendered a decision in advance which would make it wholly incompetent to perform its duties as a tribunal for the trial of the impeachment?

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. In just a moment. There are three tribunals which under the Constitution may take charge of such a matter as this and deal with it. There is the House of Representatives, where impeachment proceedings may be lodged, and the Senate must try the impeachment. There is the President of the United States, who may dismiss, under the Constitution, and remove Mr. Farley in that way. There are the courts, which are open, and as to three of the charges particularly the court would have jurisdiction if the cases were placed before them.

But under the Constitution and under our law the Senate of the United States is given no power whatever to remove Mr. Farley from office, and no power to deal with such a matter, except to try the party charged in case of impeachment. The one body which has no jurisdiction is the Senate.

I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. McCARRAN. I take it, from the discussion of the able Senator from Idaho, that he is contending that an appointive officer is subject to impeachment by the House of Representatives. Is that his position?

Mr. BORAH. That is my position.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I wonder whether the Senator would permit me, during his time, to amend my resolution. I would like to send an amendment to the desk, because perhaps the Senator might take a different view.

Mr. BORAH. Perhaps the Senator would better wait until I finish, for fear that if the resolution were amended as he has it in mind to amend, my remarks would not be relevant. [Laughter.] I shall be very brief.

Mr. President, it will be recalled that during the investigation of the oil matter the Senate did proceed under a resolution to make investigations.

But there we were investigating concerning a matter which was clearly within the jurisdiction of the Senate. It clearly had to do with the matter of legislation. It clearly had to do with the property of the United States concerning which we had the right to legislate. But the time came when a resolution was offered here requesting the President of the United States to dismiss a member of his Cabinet or members of his Cabinet. I only recall it for the purpose of saying that at that time it was my view, expressed at length in the RECORD, February 8, 1924, more so than I shall at this time, that the Senate was without power or without jurisdiction to control either the judgment or discretion of the President of the United States as to who should remain in office under his appointment. I said at that time:

The President of the United States is responsible to the same constituency to which we are responsible, and that is the only constituency to which he is responsible. The Senator and I account for our stewardship to the people. The President of the United States has had lodged with him, as the President, the sole duty of executing the law, and therefore, as Mr. Madison said, he must have unhampered judgment and discretion in the retention of his instruments for the execution of the law. Suppose the President keeps Mr. Denby in his office. The Senate may want him out, but we have no power by which to remove him from office. The President of the United States alone has the power of removal.

That, in my opinion, Mr. President, is the situation as it is presented to us here at this time.

Mr. FRAZIER obtained the floor.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Dakota yield?

I send to the desk an amendment to my resolution, which I offer and ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to insert as the first paragraph of the resolution:

Whereas the said James A. Farley, in addition to the position of Postmaster General, also holds and exercises the office of chairman of the National Democratic Committee and chairman of the State Democratic Committee of New York, and the Congress of the United States should have information so as to determine if there are not practices pursued as a result thereof requiring the enactment of legislation to prevent the Postmaster General exercising the position of chairman or executive of the committees of national or State political parties.

On page 3, in line 13, it is proposed, after the word "investigation", to insert the words: "to enable the Congress to secure such information as may be necessary for the consideration and enactment of legislation."

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BARKLEY in the chair). The Senator will state it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Under the rules of the Senate the resolution had to go to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. At this late hour, just preceding the time when I hope we shall have a vote, an amendment is offered.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I have the right to amend my resolution.

Mr. McKELLAR. I concede that right, but that amendment should go to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and be passed upon by the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution?

Mr. McKELLAR. No; only the amendment should now go to the committee as it seems to me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair holds that when an amendment to a pending resolution is offered the amendment is not referred to the committee, but it is voted on as an amendment to the resolution.

Mr. LONG. I desire the RECORD to show that I offer those amendments to my resolution. I have that right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The preamble of the resolution is not acted on until the body of the resolution is adopted, and the question then is whether the Senate desires to change, amend, or eliminate a preamble.

Mr. LONG. I have one amendment, however, which affects the substance of the resolution. I refer to the last one.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I had not intended to take any part in the discussion this afternoon, but I am a member of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to which this resolution was referred, and my name having been brought into the discussion this afternoon, as I was one who signed one of the minority reports, I desire to submit just a few remarks.

I do not know just what authority the Senate may have in regard to these investigations, but I know that a great many Members of the Senate are moved to act on precedent. Personally, I am not a confirmed follower of precedent, but inasmuch as a large majority of the Senators belong to what may be termed the "profession" which acts largely on precedent, I desire to refer to the Daugherty resolution, which was offered by the junior Senator from Montana at that time [Mr. WHEELER]. It was offered on February 13, 1924, and was voted on March 1, 1924.

There were some very keen speeches made in defense of Mr. Daugherty, especially by the then Senators from Ohio, from which State Mr. Daugherty came, and I think he had a personal acquaintance with both the Senators from Ohio. I remember the senior Senator from Ohio, the late Senator Willis, at that time made a very eloquent speech in behalf of Mr. Daugherty, and stated, as I recall, that he had known him for years; and the junior Senator from Ohio, Mr. Fess, made the statement that while he had not been exactly a political follower of Mr. Daugherty, yet he believed Mr. Daugherty was honest and believed in his integrity and all that.

I remember that on the other side of the aisle there were a number of very eloquent speeches made by prominent Members. I find in the RECORD some remarks by the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and the former senior Senator from Alabama, Mr. Heflin, and by the late Senator from Arkansas, Mr. Caraway, in regard to this question.

When the resolution was brought up by the Senator from Montana on the 1st day of March, Senator Willis, of Ohio, offered some amendments. The word "alleged" was inserted in several places to avoid any direct statements. That is one of the things which in the present case has been objected to by some of the members of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads—that there were no direct statements, and I think it is mentioned in the majority report that the charges are alleged, and so forth. Those amendments were accepted, and there was no further discussion on the resolution at that time. The resolution was read and the vote was taken.

I find that on March 1, the same day the resolution was called up before the Senate for discussion and for consideration, there were on the record vote 66 yeas and 1 nay. In fact, every Member present and voting on both sides of the Chamber, except one, voted for the resolution.

As I read it there was no legislation or contemplated legislation in view in the resolution in the Daugherty case. It simply charged the Attorney General at that time with not carrying out the duties of his office, and so forth. It had been discussed in the Senate and in the newspapers. Senator Willis, of Ohio, the day it came up had inserted in the RECORD some newspaper articles. One was from the Herald-Examiner of February 23, 1924, by Arthur Brisbane, copyright in 1924 by the Star Co. I desire to read just a paragraph of what he said:

The fight between Attorney General Daugherty and the crowd trying to drive him out of office will be worth watching. The Attorney General is a fighter. His enemies include some able men. One question is: Who are the men behind those who are trying to get rid of Mr. Daugherty?

The same question is now asked here: Who are behind those who are trying to get rid of the Postmaster General?

The article by Mr. Brisbane continues:

The charges made against him are vague.

That is the same argument which is now made, that the charges made against the Postmaster General in this resolution are vague.

Then the article by Mr. Brisbane goes on to say that the Attorney General had nothing to do with the Teapot Dome investigation, and so forth. There were printed in the Record a couple of more articles, one from the Cincinnati Times-Star and another from the Akron Beacon-Journal, and if the Senator from Ohio had wanted to put in extracts from newspapers he could have put in a great many more, of course.

What I want to call attention to is the fact that the charges have been made. The names of some witnesses were given and cases were named. The Senator from Louisiana, the author of the resolution, stated that he could furnish affidavits and also witnesses to testify and bear out the facts he had stated both on the floor of the Senate and before the committee. It seems to me that in all fairness to Mr. Farley the investigation should be had. Personally, I have not a thing against Mr. Farley. I know him only casually and have nothing against him, but I have heard many of these complaints and many statements about him. In all fairness to Mr. Farley it seems to me an investigation should be made.

A good precedent to follow is the Daugherty case, in which an investigation was made. As I remember, the only two Members of the Senate to speak in behalf of Mr. Daugherty and in his defense were the two Senators from his own State of Ohio. When we voted on the resolution as amended, both Senators from Ohio at that time voted for the resolution of investigation. The committee to investigate was chosen by vote of the Senate itself. As the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] said, of course, the Senate has no authority to discharge any Member of the Cabinet. That is a foregone conclusion, of course. However, as I said, both Senators from Ohio at that time voted for the resolution to investigate Mr. Daugherty.

Personally, it seems to me that the friends of Mr. Farley should be the ones to demand that the investigation be made. The charges have been made and given publicity in the newspapers throughout the land.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. FRAZIER. I am glad to yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Does the Senator concur in the minority report which states that at the tentative or preliminary investigation there was not evidence enough adduced to establish a prima facie case?

Mr. FRAZIER. No; I did not concur in that report.

Mr. CONNALLY. Does the Senator concur in it now?

Mr. FRAZIER. No; I do not.

Mr. CONNALLY. Does the Senator think, even if we should investigate, that we ought to investigate merely on the basis of vague charges? Does not the Senator think there ought to be something substantial in the way of charges before we do anything?

Mr. FRAZIER. I think there is enough substantiating evidence to warrant an investigation, and so I said in substance in the minority report which I signed with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL].

Mr. CONNALLY. The minority report of the committee concurred with the majority in stating that there was not any evidence in the record sufficient to establish a prima facie case. Is not that correct?

Mr. FRAZIER. The Senator will find, on the last page of the report by the committee, that there is a minority report, signed by the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL] and myself, in which we stated that we did not agree with the majority report of the committee.

It seems to me, in all fairness, an investigation should be made. If there is nothing to the charges, the sooner the investigation is made the better. It should have been made sometime ago. The sooner it is made and the sooner the charges are cleared up, if they are to be cleared up—and I am not one to say they cannot be cleared up—the better it will be for all concerned, including Mr. Farley and his friends. I think the resolution should be adopted.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. FRAZIER. I am glad to yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. I refer to the conclusion in the majority opinion of the report, which states as follows:

Your committee further reports that at the end of the hearing the following resolution was offered and passed by a vote of all those present.

Mr. FRAZIER. I did not happen to be present when the resolution was adopted.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator was not present?

Mr. FRAZIER. No.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator does not join in the minority report, which says that while there was no evidence to establish a prima facie case, yet it was thought there was sufficient evidence to justify an investigation?

Mr. FRAZIER. Over on the next page the Senator will find an additional minority report, which I signed.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, in answer to the statement made by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] with reference to the fact that the resolution does not contain a statement that it is with the idea of having legislation enacted, I desire to call his attention to the language used by the Supreme Court in the Daugherty case. In the investigation of Daugherty there was nothing said in the resolution of investigation with reference to the fact that we were seeking to investigate because of a desire to enact legislation or to ascertain facts. The Supreme Court said that the adoption of the resolution itself would be presumed to be for that purpose, and they sustained the resolution on that ground.

While it is better practice, as a matter of fact, without a question of doubt, to allege in the resolution calling for an investigation that information is sought upon which to base the legislation, nevertheless, when the Senate of the United States acts in such matters it is to be presumed, particularly where we are proposing to investigate a Cabinet officer, that it is for the purpose of enacting legislation to correct certain evils which may be found by the committee to exist.

Mr. President, a word with reference to the resolution. First of all, I wish to say I have known Mr. Farley for a long period of time. I came in contact with him and was associated very closely with him during convention days, both before the Chicago convention and after the Chicago convention. Personally, I have high regard for him and for his integrity and his honesty. Nevertheless, when charges are made upon the floor of the Senate by a United States Senator, it is quite different from charges being made by some person who is not a Member of the United States Senate. A Member of the United States Senate is supposed not to make charges unless he can verify those charges by facts and evidence, and unless he at least has some reasonable grounds upon which to base those charges.

It may be the Senator from Louisiana has no facts whatever in his possession. It may be that his charges are based entirely upon his personal spleen, if one desires so to term it; but notwithstanding that fact, regardless of what the reason is, when a Member of the United States Senate rises in his place and denounces a man, as the Senator from Louisiana has denounced Mr. Farley, it seems to me if I had been in Mr. Farley's place I would immediately have said, "Under these circumstances I want an investigation."

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I am glad to yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. One day last week—I forget which day it was, but the Record will show—the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] in just as unmeasured terms denounced Franklin D. Roosevelt, the President of the United States. Those charges were just as vigorous, just as poignant against the President of the United States as any charges he has made against Mr. Farley. Would the Senator vote for an investigation of the President of the United States upon the charges made by the senior Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. WHEELER. If he presented a resolution setting forth acts of corruption on the part of the President of the United States, I should vote for a resolution to investigate those charges.

If the Senator will recall, during the Daugherty investigation and during the Teapot Dome investigation—

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President—

Mr. WHEELER. Let me finish the statement. During those investigations evidence was produced showing corruption on the part of high officials which led up very close to the White House door; and yet there was no man on this side of the Senate Chamber who for one moment wanted to stop those charges because they involved a Cabinet officer or an executive officer of the Government of the United States.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, the Senator from Montana is aware that since that time the Senate has adopted a rule that before investigations shall be ordered, the charges shall go before an appropriate committee. After the charges were made by the Senator from Louisiana, they were referred to the Post Office Committee. Every opportunity under Heaven was given the Senator from Louisiana to produce his witnesses or to make a showing which might result in an investigation. He did not do it. The committee had to write to him two or three times before receiving an answer. He failed again to undertake to substantiate the charges.

Suppose the Senator from Louisiana should offer a resolution to investigate the President of the United States on the charges he made last week, and then should refuse, before the appropriate committee, to make any effort to sustain those charges. Would the Senator from Montana still think the Senate ought to investigate the President of the United States?

Mr. WHEELER. I do not know what the charges were which the Senator from Louisiana made against the President of the United States. I was not here, and I am not upholding him in making any charges against either Mr. Farley or the President of the United States. I think it is exceedingly unfortunate if the Senator made such charges. I neither saw the newspaper reports about the matter, nor do I know what the charges were. I should regret it exceedingly if the Senator from Louisiana made any charges against the President of the United States such as the Senator from Tennessee indicates.

Let me call the Senator's attention, however, to the fact that if, in the case of the Daugherty investigation, we had had to have the resolution go before some appropriate committee controlled by Senators on the opposite side of the Chamber, we never should have had an investigation of Mr. Daugherty and the Department of Justice. I say these things because I know what the facts were.

The only way in which we were able to get an investigation at that time was by offering a resolution asking for the appointment of a special committee, because the Members of the Senate would not permit the resolution to go to one of the standing committees of this body. If it had not been for the appointment of the special committee, Mr. Daugherty would have served as Attorney General throughout Mr. Harding's and Mr. Coolidge's entire administrations.

If Senators will go back to that time and refer to the headlines in the newspapers, they will see that every night, when the testimony came out in the Daugherty investigation, the headlines of the papers carried Mr. Daugherty's story. It will be recalled how difficult it was for us to get any information from the Department of Justice; and the thing which finally compelled Mr. Daugherty's resignation was that he refused to give the committee information which he had in the Department of Justice. He refused to give it to the committee, and it was only after that fact was brought to the knowledge of President Coolidge that he asked for the resignation of Mr. Daugherty.

For weeks and months, however, it was impossible to obtain from one of the departments any information concerning Mr. Daugherty or his activities. I was denounced in practically every leading newspaper throughout the United States, both the Republican and the Democratic newspapers. The great newspapers of the city of New York, Democratic as well as Republican, denounced me and said that I was trying to tear down the Government of the United States because I was seeking to drive an unfaithful servant out of office here in the Capital of the Nation. Yet, when the facts finally came out, day after day and day after day, of course, the great daily newspapers changed their story. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] has called attention to the argument of Mr. Brisbane. That was not only said by Mr. Brisbane, but it was in every single newspaper from one end of the country to the other.

I do not believe Mr. Farley is guilty of the things with which he has been charged. I have confidence in his honesty and in his integrity, and I do not believe the statements. I think it is unfortunate that the Senator from Louisiana has brought them forward. Here, however, is an affidavit which he has produced, sworn testimony, upon which the affiant can be prosecuted for perjury if it is not true.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. The statement has been made before this time that this affiant could be prosecuted for perjury if she had made a false affidavit. I believe that statement is erroneous, for the reason that she could be prosecuted for perjury only for making a false affidavit in accordance with the requirement of some law. There is no law which requires such an affidavit to be made.

I will state to the Senator from Montana that there is an easy way by which that affiant and all others connected with that affidavit can be caused to testify under oath. She and anyone else can be summoned to appear before the grand jury in the State of New York to state what they know about those facts, how the affidavit was obtained, why it was given, why a person who is alleged to have been working in a confidential capacity suddenly aroused herself to the extent of calling up somebody over the long-distance telephone at 1 o'clock at night to give an affidavit. I am frank to state to the Senator from Montana that I think all of it should be investigated before a grand jury, and I believe it would be most advisable to have the matter taken before a grand jury in New York, where the witnesses can testify under oath, and let them testify, and find out all about the facts as to the affidavit, and what prompted it.

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator from Alabama is not so naive as to believe that a grand jury of the city of New York would make a complete investigation of a thing of this kind.

Mr. BLACK. If the Senator will yield—

Mr. WHEELER. Let me finish. If the Senator wants a grand-jury investigation, he can have it; but why should the Senate of the United States refuse an investigation of this matter, when the Senators on this side of the Chamber voted for an investigation of Daugherty upon evidence just as flimsy at the outset as the testimony here?

I had never at any time presented to the Senate a sworn affidavit charging fraud or crookedness upon the part of Daugherty. At the outset of that investigation I had only letters which had been written to me by people whom I did not know, but whom I assumed to be responsible. I did not have any affidavit, and yet every Senator on this side of the Chamber voted for that investigation. Is the Democratic Party going to say it is not willing to have an investigation now because it is a Democratic Cabinet officer, and not a Republican Cabinet officer, against whom the charges are made?

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for an answer to that question?

Mr. WHEELER. I venture the assertion that practically every Senator on this side would vote for an investigation if the charge were brought against a Republican.

Mr. BLACK. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I am saying that an investigation of these charges is for the benefit of the Democratic Party. I appreciate the feeling that exists in this Chamber against the man who made the charges; but I say to Senators that we should not let our prejudices run away with us, and we should not be afraid to vote for an investigation because the charges are against a Democratic official.

Mr. BLACK. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I believe thoroughly that these charges will be disproved. I feel that an investigation of them will be a boomerang upon the Senator from Louisiana. I think he has made a mistake in making the charges; but, notwithstanding that fact, when an affidavit is presented here, when statements of this kind have been repeatedly made upon the floor of the Senate and broadcast throughout the country—

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I will yield to the Senator in a moment. When these statements have been broadcast throughout the country from one end to the other, I say the Senate owes it to itself to investigate the matter, and Mr. Farley ought to desire an investigation of it.

Mr. BLACK and Mr. McKELLAR addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, the Senator made some statements which I feel sure were made in the heat of debate and which he did not intend to make. The Senator left the inference that practically all the Democrats on this side who would vote against the resolution would do so either because they were afraid to investigate a Democrat—which I deny—or by reason of the fact that the charge was not made against a Republican. So far as I am concerned, I wish to state to the Senator that it would make no difference whether it were a Democrat, a Socialist, a Communist, or who it was. I do not believe the Senator intended to leave the inference, which from his statement I am sure would be left, that many of those on this side who were against the resolution were against it because the charges were against a Democrat.

I may say to the Senator that I think, frankly speaking, that if he will review the history, he will agree that quite a different situation was presented with reference to the Daugherty resolution than is presented by the pending resolution. It was not merely one man who was seeking to have Daugherty investigated. It was generally believed, by the Senator from Montana and a large number of others, who had not been engaged in any political feud with Mr. Daugherty, who had not been engaged in attacking him from day to day, who had not been engaged, as the Senator from Louisiana has on this floor, in making personal attacks, that certain conditions existed which made an investigation necessary. I think the Senator will agree with me that there was nothing in the political background of himself and others, or in the fight in which they had been engaged, which would lead to the conclusion that there was a personal feud. That makes quite a different situation from that which now exists here.

Mr. WHEELER. Of course, there was no political feud between Mr. Daugherty and myself, because I had never met him and did not know him, and, so far as I was concerned, there was nothing of that kind. But that does not alter the situation, as I see it. What I stated was that every Democrat voted for the Daugherty resolution.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to obtain some information. I have seen the copy of the affidavit which was handed the clerk, but has anyone seen the affidavit? I would like to know where the affidavit is. I have not seen it.

Mr. WHEELER. I just asked for the original affidavit, but did not get it.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. LONG. The affidavit is in a bank lockbox, because my desk has been rifled several times since this controversy began, and my telephone has been tapped. I have put the document in a bank lockbox because I wanted to preserve it.

Mr. McKELLAR. We are proceeding, then, on a copy of a supposed affidavit that is in a lockbox somewhere.

Mr. LONG. No; it is a genuine affidavit.

Mr. McKELLAR. In whose lockbox is it? This grows mysterious.

Mr. LONG. Oh, no; it is not mysterious.

Mr. McKELLAR. Why should an affidavit of this kind be put in a lockbox?

Mr. LONG. Because many original documents have been stolen from my files by somebody since I started, and it is very hard to retain a document.

Mr. McKELLAR. Surely the affidavit could be made again.

Mr. LONG. I have the original affidavit in my lockbox in the city of Washington, D. C., and can produce it in any daylight hour. My integrity in producing these documents has never yet been questioned.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am not questioning it, but I am saying to the Senator that it seems to be a strange proceeding, when we are asked here at the last hour to have our votes influenced by reason of an affidavit, when we do not have the affidavit before us.

Mr. WHEELER. I think we have to have just a little bit more faith in one another.

Mr. LONG. I reciprocate—

Mr. WHEELER. I refuse to yield. I am sure that if anybody, the Senator from Tennessee or anybody else, rose in the Senate and said that a paper he held in his hand was a copy of an original affidavit and that he had the original in his lockbox we would not question it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I suppose we would not; but that is not what happened. It is not explained at all, but just a copy of an affidavit is sent to the clerk's desk.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Montana yield to me?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. This morning, when the affidavit was offered, I wondered that the able Senator who had charge of this matter did not call for the original, but I took it as a matter of course that the able Senator was entirely content to have the carbon copy go into the RECORD. Otherwise, it should not have gone in at all.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I did not know that the copy that was handed me when I asked for it was not the original. I supposed the original was here. I do not know where the original is.

Mr. McCARRAN. I take it that it is an authenticated copy of an original somewhere, and that the Senators—

Mr. McKELLAR. It is not an authenticated copy. It is just a copy, without anything else on it.

Mr. WHEELER. Does the Senator doubt that this is a copy of the original?

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Louisiana says he has the original in a lockbox. But that is a strange proceeding. Why should an affidavit which he seems to regard as of some value be withheld from the Senate when the clerks are just as honest and straight men as I ever knew? There is no reason why, having once gotten into their hands, it could not be reproduced or could not be kept in perfect shape. I do not see why a lockbox is a better receptacle for an affidavit than is the Senate of the United States.

Mr. WHEELER. I agree with everything the Senator has said with reference to it, but I am frank to say that I assumed the original had been produced. I did not question the affidavit, because I had never seen it, and I asked that a copy of it be sent me.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. LONG. Copies of original documents are offered here constantly, but this is the first time I ever heard one questioned on the floor of the Senate. If I had palmed off a forged document on the floor of the Senate I would certainly be amenable to immediate expulsion.

Mr. WHEELER. I desire again to call attention to the statements in the affidavit:

My name is Helen Humphreys; my residence is St. Albans, Long Island, N. Y.; and I make this statement to be verified by affidavit, of my own free will and without the promise of any reward or other consideration and for the sole cause of public good.

I have no doubt but that this woman was discharged from Stewart & Co. I do not know that, but I am assuming that she is probably a discharged employee. However, that does not change the fact that she has made this affidavit.

When "Roxie" Stinson was called before the special committee investigating the Dougherty matter, the newspapers denounced "Roxie" Stinson and said she should not be believed. Notwithstanding that fact, as the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] will verify, every single statement she made before the committee was subsequently verified by other evidence that was produced in the courts. Yet many people would have said, "You cannot believe her because she is a prejudiced witness." She detailed a tremendous lot of hearsay testimony, hearsay because it had been told to her by "Jess" Smith. Yet every detail of her testimony was verified in subsequent evidence produced in the courts of the United States.

We find out things of this kind from discharged employees, or people in similar situations. We do not find them out ordinarily from people voluntarily coming up and giving their testimony. We find them out only when people become angry because they have been discharged. We get such evidence only in that way. The affidavit continues:

It is a matter of my own personal knowledge—

Not hearsay, as a result of something she got from other persons, but—

It is a matter of my own personal knowledge that the firm of James Stewart & Co., Inc., some years ago took into its employ one Harry D. Watts, who at first served as contact manager for the purpose of securing new business, and after about 1 year he was made vice president of the business at about $12,000 salary; the said Watts did not have the money to pay for the stock placed in his name on some kind of credit basis; at about the time of the election in 1932 the said Watts began to make representations to and later demands upon the Messrs. A. M. and James C. Stewart that, on account of contacts he had with James A. Farley, representing that big business was to accrue through Government business thereby, and that for the work he could and would bring, that he should have advancement in pay and position with the firm and a contract for not less than 3 years at a salary of about $25,000 a year.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President—

Mr. WHEELER. Let me comment on this. That statement may be of no value whatsoever, because it may be that Mr. Watts was simply trying to work his employers to get an increase in pay. He may have misrepresented Mr. Farley entirely. I think hardly a day goes by but someone in Washington or somewhere else goes to a corporation and says, "I should like to have you employ me, because I have influence with certain Senators", or "I think I could influence somebody down in Washington." They are doing such things without the knowledge of the Senators, and they are doing it for the purpose of getting money out of some of the big industrial corporations by reason of their supposed influence. So it does not make any difference to me that such a statement may have been made.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to ask the Senator a question. After the original resolution was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads to enable them to make a report as to whether there should be an investigation, and it submitted a report of the facts which were presented to it, after a full opportunity to present facts had been afforded the Senator from Louisiana, does the Senator think it is fair to bring into the Senate of the United States affidavits subsequently obtained, which were not in existence at the time the committee made its report, without ever presenting the affidavits to the committee at all?

Mr. WHEELER. I am not at all interested in the technicalities of the situation. I think the Senator from Louisiana should have presented the affidavit in question to the committee if he had it at that time. I think he should have cooperated with the committee, and he should have furnished the names of witnesses to the committee, if he had them, and he should have done all the things he is charged with not having done. That is not the question now involved. The present problem is a bigger and broader problem. Has there been any evidence presented to the Senate which ought to be heard? I am frank to say to the Senate that I do not know whether an investigation should be had, but I do say that the members of the committee owe it to themselves to call this witness before the committee, and they ought to find what is back of this affidavit if they can, and find out why she made it, and just what information she has. They can have such an investigation in executive session if they desire.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I fully agree with the Senator as to that.

Mr. WHEELER. That is all I am saying. Before we vote on this question the committee ought to call this woman before it, either in public or in executive session, and find out whether she is telling the truth, and whether or not she has the facts she says in the affidavit she has. If the committee does not do that, and this affidavit is allowed to appear in the RECORD without such investigation, it is just playing into the hands of the opposition; it is playing into the hands of the gentlemen on the other side of the aisle; it is playing into the hands of everyone who is opposed to the present administration, and Senators are going to have to meet this question upon the hustings a year and a half from now.

Do not make any mistake about it at all. If you suppress this evidence, if you stop the committee from going into the matter, you are going to have to answer for it. You ought to call a meeting of the committee in executive session or in open session and call the witnesses and investigate the statements made in this affidavit, regardless of when the charges were brought.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. I desire to state to the Senator that should we vote on the resolution, which is reported on evidence entirely different from that presented in the affidavit, the committee would not be prevented from calling this woman to testify before it hereafter. I fully agree with the Senator, and if I were a member of that committee and the Senate were to vote on the resolution today I would summons her here, and I would also submit that question to some grand jury which has jurisdiction, where the whole matter can be gone into. But I do not see any reason why we ought to be called on to hold up the vote on this resolution, with reference to which evidence was submitted, simply because an affidavit is presented at the last moment.

I agree with the Senator that if I were a member of the committee I would vote to summons the woman to appear before the committee. I see no reason in the world why they should not summons the signer of this affidavit to come before them. However, I do think we ought to be permitted to vote on this resolution on the evidence which was presented before the committee.

Mr. WHEELER. If she were called to appear before the committee, there would be the loss of only 1 day. They could immediately issue a subpoena and summons the woman to appear before the committee, and they could easily and quickly tell whether they wanted to go farther.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Can the Senator explain why this woman was not brought before the committee by those interested in getting her testimony in the record?

Mr. WHEELER. I cannot.

Mr. LONG. I can.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield; and, if so, to whom?

Mr. WHEELER. I would rather not yield now.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me call attention to the fact that the affidavit is an ex parte affidavit. The Senator, as a lawyer, knows that one can go out and get ex parte affidavits from anyone on nearly any question. The Senator speaks of fairness. Is it fair to the Senate and to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, after the committee has made a tentative investigation of facts and of the charges filed, and after it has made a report, and the matter is ready for conclusion, that someone should rush in and say, "Here is an affidavit"?

Let me call the Senator's attention to the fact that the refusal to go on with these charges and have an investigation, as pointed out by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK], does not foreclose the matter. The courts are open, the grand jury is open, and the Senate committee is open, and any time anyone brings forth any evidence which the Senate deems of sufficient importance to justify an investigation we can go ahead and have an investigation. But I refuse to vote for an investigation, and a new investigation and a rehearing, every time somebody runs in here and waves an ex parte affidavit from somebody. We do not know who this woman is. We do not know whether she is a credible person, nor do we know anything about her. I have no objection to the committee's having her before it, and I am wondering why the parties who think so much of her testimony did not produce her before the committee when the committee was hearing these charges.

Mr. WHEELER. I will say that I am not interested in the technicalities of this question whatsoever. As I pointed out before, the committee could, of course, have subpoenaed this woman before it when it was considering the resolution; but the Senate is now asked to vote on a resolution when an affidavit is before the Senate. I do not think it should have been produced under the circumstances. Nevertheless, the affidavit is before us, and we are asked to vote on it, when, as a matter of fact, the committee could convene and issue a subpoena and have the woman here in 24 hours. Such action would simply mean a delay of 24 hours. The committee could have the woman brought before it, and then the committee could decide whether or not she is credible, or whether she knows what she is talking about.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator be good enough to say, after reading the affidavit, whether or not the woman even says that she knows Postmaster General Farley? As I read it, she does not even claim to know him.

Mr. WHEELER. No one can read the affidavit, it seems to me, without coming to the conclusion that she knew Mr. Farley, or else she testified falsely in the affidavit. Here is what she says—

Big business was to accrue through Government business thereby and that, for the work that he could and would bring that he should have advancement in pay; * * * that the said Watts, in the course of his demands, caused a telegram to be exhibited, either sent through Farley in person or through Farley's brother-in-law, Harry Finnegan, offering—

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. What the Senator just read is what I want to call attention to. Somebody showed a copy of a telegram that was supposed to have been sent by Farley. How does she know who sent it?

Mr. WHEELER. She does not purport to say who sent it.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is what I say.

Mr. WHEELER. She does not purport to say Farley sent it. She simply is reciting what Watts did.

Mr. CONNALLY. If we are trying Watts, it would be a different thing. We are not trying Watts.

Mr. WHEELER. I will get to the other point. I simply say she is reciting what she saw; that is all. She had a perfect right to say that she exhibited a telegram which purported to come from Farley or from Farley's brother-in-law.

Mr. CONNALLY. She does not say "purported." Read the affidavit.

Mr. WHEELER. She said—

Watts * * * caused a telegram to be exhibited, either sent through Farley in person or through Farley's brother-in-law.

Mr. CONNALLY. She is swearing there that it was sent through Farley or through his brother-in-law. She did not say "purported." That is the kind of testimony the affidavit affords.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. I desire to make reply to the able Senator from Tennessee in charge of this matter, wherein he comments on the lack of knowledge or acquaintance of this affiant with Mr. Farley. That she does not know Mr. Farley goes to augment the force of her statement, so far as the record goes. The whole situation in my mind, if I may continue to interrupt for just a moment, is that if this affiant has made a false oath and filed it before the Senate she should be prosecuted, if it is false. On the other hand, if it is fair, if it is reasonable, if it is true, then there ought to be an investigation.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. That is the third time the statement has been made that the signer of this affidavit could be prosecuted for perjury. I think it would be wise at this time to read the definition of perjury.

Mr. WHEELER. From what is the Senator reading?

Mr. BLACK. I am about to read from the United States law defining perjury.

Mr. WHEELER. That is an entirely different proposition. This affidavit was made in the State of New York.

Mr. BLACK. I can very easily get the New York statute, but all the State statutes provide, just as this does, that the affidavit must be made in pursuance of some clause where there is an obligation to make the affidavit. There is no duty imposed by law to make this affidavit. It is a voluntary affidavit. The Senate has only a copy of an affidavit, when even if it had the original it would be impossible to prosecute the woman for perjury.

Mr. WHEELER. I am inclined to think the Senator is correct.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. Certainly.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let us suppose the woman did make a false affidavit in New York State and is guilty of false swearing under the New York State law. Can we try her for that?

Mr. WHEELER. Of course not.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. WHEELER. Certainly.

Mr. LONG. If the lady were brought here and swore to these facts, she could be prosecuted for perjury in the District of Columbia if she testified falsely; but I am fearful that Senators do not want the lady to come here and testify and to have that opportunity.

Mr. WHEELER. Of course, if she came here and testified falsely, if she testified to matters which were untrue, then, as the Senator from Louisiana has said, she could be prosecuted without any question of doubt.

Mr. BLACK. I wish to say to the Senator from Louisiana that here is one Senator who is not fearful about her coming down here. I sincerely hope the committee will bring her here tomorrow and find out the facts in connection with the matter. It will not affect my vote on the pending resolution when the affidavit has been withheld somewhere in somebody's pocket or somewhere else until right at the moment when we are about to vote on the resolution.

Mr. LONG. The affidavit was made on the 23d day of April. The report of the committee had been filed for several weeks before the lady called me and told me that she wanted to make this statement.

Mr. BLACK. The committee was still in existence. It was here and the Senate was here. The affidavit could have been brought before the committee. Here is an affidavit of innuendoes and insinuations which has been made and brought here at the last moment to try to damn a man when there was not any evidence to present to the committee to condemn him. The committee was there and the affidavit could have been brought before the committee at any time since it was signed.

Mr. WHEELER. I am willing to agree it could have been and should have been brought to the attention of the committee, but I repeat that that does not change the situation, as I see it, in the slightest degree. I am unable to follow the Senator who says, because of the fact that some Senator did not do what he should have done in presenting certain evidence and has presented it at a different time, that we should stand upon some technicality in a matter of vital importance not only to the Postmaster General and the administration but to the people of the country.

Mr. BLACK. Let me state to the Senator that I am not claiming or asserting that the Senate should decline to act on a technicality. I agree with the Senator, except that I go further. I say the matter should not only be investigated before the committee with reference to what is charged in the affidavit, but the whole matter with reference to the way the affidavit was obtained, what prompted it, what efforts were made to get it, even before the lady called the Senator from Louisiana over the telephone. Let us find out everything behind it. Let us act as a grand jury and ascertain all the facts in connection with it.

Mr. WHEELER. I am in thorough accord with the Senator from Alabama with reference to that. If this woman has made a false affidavit or if somebody got her to make a false affidavit, then, in my judgment, it was a dastardly act.

Mr. BLACK. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. WHEELER. The whole matter should be thoroughly investigated to ascertain whether or not that is the fact.

Mr. BLACK. I agree further that she ought to be heard at the earliest possible moment before some tribunal which has authority to administer an oath in order that if it shall prove to be a false oath, if it shall prove to be perjury, not only the person who makes it but anyone who instigated it may be properly prosecuted.

Mr. WHEELER. She may be brought before the committee and have a hearing. Let me invite the Senator's attention to the fact that no resolution is pending before the committee. There may be some question as to the authority of the committee to call this woman and swear her with reference to some matter when there is no resolution pending before the committee.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. WHEELER. Certainly.

Mr. LEWIS. Is there any record here, disclosing whether the affidavit, as has been suggested, has ever been presented to Mr. Farley or that he has become cognizant of its contents, and any reply thereto has been made?

Mr. WHEELER. I assume he has never seen it. That is why I say the woman should be called before the committee, and Mr. Farley should be given opportunity to reply if there is any substance to the affidavit. I am assuming that the Postmaster General has never seen the affidavit. I am assuming that if this woman should come before the committee, Mr. Farley would want to come before it and deny the statements there made if she testifies to what she has stated in the affidavit.

But that does not alter the situation. It seems to me that Mr. Farley ought to have an opportunity to answer the affidavit, and the woman ought to have an opportunity to be called before the committee to testify before we are called upon to vote upon the resolution.

Mr. LEWIS. Knowing the Senator from Montana to be a good lawyer and one of experience, is it assumed here that an affidavit made at the date named in the affidavit has lain like some sword in its scabbard to be drawn here at the last moment, with no knowledge on the part of the accused that such a decree holds over him, and in the meantime it has been secretly held to be used thus suddenly on an occasion such as this?

Mr. WHEELER. I will say to the Senator that I disagree on that policy. I was not in the confidence of the Senator from Louisiana with reference to it and never heard of the affidavit until he read it this morning. But, I repeat, that does not alter the situation that we have an affidavit pending before us and that we are called upon to vote upon the resolution before this woman is asked before the committee to testify and before Mr. Farley has a chance to refute the charges. In the course of her affidavit she says:

That the said Stewart brothers called in deponent at about the time of the aforesaid negotiations with said Watts and instructed her that, since they feared the said Watts and the turns and things which he might do, she should carefully listen to all conversation which the said Watts might have, particularly by telephone, and report the same to them regularly.

Then the said Watts was often called, not only by Farley and Farley's secretaries both in Washington and in New York, and said Watts was called and called upon by the said Farley's brother-in-law, Harry Finnegan, and said Watts was in frequent conversation on calls made by said Watts with said Farley and his aids.

These are more or less statements of fact, but I would seriously doubt that they were true unless the woman was cross-examined, because this is an ex parte affidavit. Nevertheless, if she is not examined these statements go out to the country as statements of fact by a supposedly reputable employee, a girl who, it has been said here, was getting $50 or $60 per week.

On one occasion the said Farley called the said Watts from a pay station to avoid any chance of detection.

Of course, that last statement must be a conclusion that he did it to avoid detection.

* * * all of which covered a wide range of matters having to do with the manipulating of Government business and grants and contracts, among which were included the following:

1. How insurance premiums in which Farley was interested should be given to one J. L. Nolan, and the particulars thereof.
2. The awarding and placing of orders for marble on the Federal office building in New York.
3. The making of arrangements for meeting of Farley and Watts while Farley was in New York and the designation of the time and place of meetings.
4. For the giving of certain materials to various concerns in which Farley disclosed interest and concern.
5. For $303,000 to be given to the Raisler Heating Co., in which Farley indicated his interest, which said Watts indicated had been done per orders.
6. Conversations relative to valuable stamps being given by Farley to Watts; later pay-station calls from Farley to Watts that the matter was in serious shape; Watts' information that the stamps had been given, as per understanding, to one Randolph Cook, with the Pennsylvania Railroad Co., for business to be had from the railroad to the said Stewart Co.; Watts' calls to Cook, which failed to materialize; later Watts' calls to Elsemann, with the same railroad office in Philadelphia, whereby information came that said stamps had been deposited in a bank as security for a loan with the resultant later printing of stamps to undo the harm.
7. That Farley had managed to grab all the papers and correspondence between Ickes, Green, and Glavis (which occurred about the time said papers were being called for in Washington for investigation) and that Farley desired that Watts should come over to the New York office of Farley to go over the matters.

And deponent has various detailed proof of such matters and others of the kind to submit, and other witnesses whose names she can give to prove the same.

That, further, pursuant to such calls, the entire files of the said Stewart Co. were taken out and mostly destroyed, and a new filing system installed on advance notice that investigation would likely soon occur.

If that affidavit, as I have previously said, is untrue, it is one of the most dastardly lies, one of the most dastardly things that has ever been presented upon the floor of the Senate. It is inconceivable to me that the Postmaster General should be guilty of these things, and I am frank to say to the Senate that I do not believe it. If he is guilty of them, however, if he has done the things and if they have been done in the manner in which this affiant says they have been done, and these telephone calls have been sent, certainly he is not fit to be Postmaster General.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President—

Mr. WHEELER. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let us assume that Mr. Farley is guilty of all these things: Does the Senator think Mr. Farley or anybody else would call up and discuss the matter over the telephone, when there are 40 exchange girls, and others all along the line who, if they wanted to, could hear everything he said? Does the Senator think he would say, "This is Farley speaking. I am getting ready to crook somebody out of $303,000 on marble. This is Jim Farley speaking. I want to put you wise, everybody that is listening, to the fact that we are going to pull off another crooked deal somewhere?" Does not the whole affidavit on its face bear evidence of falsification, improbability, and unbelievability? If the woman were here and swore to those statements, would the Senator believe what she says?

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator is asking me whether I would believe it. Yes; if she swore to the things she has stated in that affidavit—

Mr. CONNALLY. She has sworn to them in the affidavit, and the Senator said he did not believe it.

Mr. WHEELER. Oh, no; do not misunderstand me. I say it is inconceivable to me that Mr. Farley could be guilty of these things. Whether or not I believed the woman would depend upon her demeanor; it would depend upon her previous character; it would depend upon her cross-examination. In other words, I would not believe an affidavit just as an affidavit, because anybody who is familiar with the practice of law knows that an affidavit may be obtained, and many times the affiant, when called to the witness stand, will not substantiate the conclusions and the statements in the affidavit. No; I should not believe the affidavit. I should want to hear the affiant testify. I should want to check up on the testimony before I should ever think of believing anything of the kind. I should desire in some way to have the evidence substantiated, if possible.

Nevertheless, here is an affidavit which has been made—and, to all intents and purposes, it is made by a reputable person—making very serious charges against a member of the Cabinet of the President of the United States. I say that we cannot overlook that kind of an affidavit, going into the public record, going into the press of the country. If we do not investigate those charges we shall be doing Mr. Farley an injustice, in my judgment, and doing the administration itself an injustice. Mr. Farley ought to be the first one to come before the Senate committee and before the country and demand a thorough investigation of the situation, and let the chips fall where they may.

If this woman is guilty of perjury, she ought to be prosecuted and convicted of perjury. I agree with the Senator from Alabama that if somebody induced her to testify falsely, that person ought to be prosecuted for subornation of perjury; but the whole matter ought to be investigated from top to bottom, every detail of it ought to be investigated from top to bottom, and the Senate should not by any manner of means be a party to suppressing an investigation of a matter of that kind.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I know the Senate does not desire to listen to further argument this evening. It is nearly 6 o'clock. I must of necessity answer some very erroneous statements which have been made, and it will take a while. I should prefer that we complete this matter tomorrow. I am willing, so far as I am concerned, to come here at 10 o'clock or at 11 o'clock, when the Members of the Senate will be more in a frame of mind to listen to further argument on this subject.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, let us go on. It was understood that we were to finish the consideration of this resolution today. There was virtually a unanimous-consent agreement to that effect. That was included in the agreement. Let us go on. I ask the Senator to let us proceed and vote.

Mr. LONG addressed the Senate. After having spoken, with interruptions, for about 30 minutes—

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for the purpose of proposing a unanimous-consent agreement?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business today it take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow, and take a final vote on the resolution at 1 o'clock.

Mr. LONG. Will not the Senator make that 1:30? I desire to finish my speech on this matter. I took only 45 or 50 minutes earlier in the day. I did not take nearly so much time as my opponents have taken.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, for the present, at any rate, I object.

Mr. LONG. I do not mind going on tonight; I think it is a good idea, but I do not want to be rushed. It is not late. It is only 6:15.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. Did I understand the Senator from Tennessee to object?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; I did. I think we should vote on the resolution tonight.

Mr. JOHNSON. No matter what time? Then, will the Senator from Louisiana yield to me to make a parliamentary inquiry? I make it only because of the statement that we must vote upon this resolution tonight. Would it be in order to move to refer the resolution back to the committee with instructions?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the opinion of the Chair, it would not. The unanimous-consent agreement was that the Senate should consider this resolution and vote on it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Vote on it tonight.

Mr. JOHNSON. There was no unanimous-consent agreement to vote on it tonight.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; the agreement was to take up the resolution today and vote on it.

Mr. LONG. The agreement did not say "vote today."

Mr. McKELLAR. That is the interpretation which has been given to it, and I think it is the proper interpretation.

Mr. JOHNSON. I appeal to the Senator from Tennessee. Why not take a recess and vote at 1:30, or at whatever time we may agree upon? What is the use of keeping us here now for 2 or 3 hours?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow, and vote at 12:30 p. m.

Mr. LONG. Give me a little longer than that. Make it 1 o'clock.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, in all fairness, there should be a division of the remaining time.

Mr. LONG. Well, I do not know. I have not had more than 45 or 50 minutes.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from Louisiana does not know how long he has spoken. He has spoken much longer than that.

Mr. LONG. There you go on arithmetic again.

Mr. ROBINSON. I am not complaining of that; but the Senator cannot expect to have an agreement under which he shall have all the remaining time, and it is not right that he should ask it.

Mr. LONG. Very well; let us make it 1:30 and divide the time.

Mr. ROBINSON. Why not meet at 11 and vote at 12:30?

Mr. LONG. That would suit me.

Mr. McKELLAR. The time to be equally divided.

Mr. ROBINSON. The time to be equally divided.

Mr. LONG. That is satisfactory.

Mr. McKELLAR. I amend my unanimous-consent request to that effect.

Mr. JOHNSON. That the Senate recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow?

Mr. McKELLAR. The request is that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock a. m. tomorrow, and vote on the pending resolution at 12:30 p. m. o'clock, the time between 11 and 12:30 to be equally divided between the two sides.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Let the Chair understand. How is the time to be divided?

Mr. ROBINSON. That the Senator from Louisiana control one-half the time and the Senator from Tennessee control the other half of the time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. McKELLAR. The request included, of course, the provision that the Senate should take a recess until 11 o'clock a. m. tomorrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That was included in the request.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, knowing my friend from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] and my friend from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] to be very highly skilled constitutional lawyers and prosecuting officials, it strikes me as very strange that they are unwilling to have these charges investigated, especially in view of the fact that each and every one of the allegations of this particular affidavit can be proven true or untrue by other sources. All it is necessary to do is to go into the books of the Raisler Corporation and see if they paid $303,000. The Senator would not have that investigated. All it is necessary to do is to go into the accounts of J. L. Nolan, or whatever his initials are, and see if he was getting the insurance-premium money. The Senator does not want that investigated.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, the Senator from Texas did not say that. The Senator from Louisiana ought to know that he did not say that. The Senator from Texas said that at any time after this resolution is voted on, if there is any proof to be adduced of a criminal character, the Senate can investigate it, and the grand jury can investigate it. I did not ask, and do not ask, that the matter be foreclosed.

Mr. LONG. The Senator from Texas is asking for a great deal worse than foreclosing it, and if he will stay here long enough to hear me I will prove it to his own satisfaction.

The Senator probably was not here in the first part of the session today. There was another allegation as to which Senators can go to the Government records and find out whether or not it is true. The person who executed this affidavit says that they switched the marble. What did I do? The only document available to prove these seven enumerated items of defalcations, fraud, and corruption was the record of the new courthouse building in New York City in regard to that marble, because there I could find it out.

We could not get the files from the office of the Secretary of the Treasury, but we did find a very prominent official of a very prominent public body of this country, one of the highest ranking officials of America in the line of work in which he is engaged. I finally found him. I knew, from outside information, that he knew this story, and I sent a high-class newspaperman of this country to ask him whether this woman's statement was true or false; and he sent back word to me that he could not allow his name to be used now, but that the woman's affidavit was true. I then sent back and got him to write out the facts before I brought this affidavit to public notice, and I got these facts from him, in the form in which I have them, only a few days ago. I have the original typewritten sheets he furnished to me; and he showed that there had been at the least a defalcation and a swindle as to which this woman gives evidence, of $387,000.

Thereupon I went to Comptroller General McCarl last Saturday, I think, or perhaps Friday, and I asked the Comptroller General if I could see such records as he had on this particular contract, after office hours; and he allowed me to see them. There I went through the records, and I saw with my own eyes that they had substituted $12.50 Missouri marble for $4 marble; that they had reduced the quantities from 60,000 cubic feet, the best I could calculate, to 46,000 cubic feet; and there were the prices and specifications, verifying what this woman had sworn, verifying what this prominent man sent me word had been done, that they had robbed the United States of $387,000; and there it is, according to their own figures.

When I found that Glavis' report had stated that they had before them the allegation that there had been that swindle, and that some persons and officials had shut out the investigation after he made the preliminary report, with that information I knew beyond any question of a doubt that this woman was swearing to God's eternal truth.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President—

Mr. LONG. There is not any use in trying to convince the Senator from Tennessee. He would not know the facts if he saw them in this Farley case. If you should put a light right in front of his face, if it showed the truth about Farley's defalcations, he would not believe it, and he will not believe the records of the Government now.

He will not take a pencil and figure that 2 plus 2 equals 4. He will not take the figures and show that they took 60,000 cubic feet of Missouri marble and made it 46,000 feet of inferior marble, and that by multiplying the items themselves they have taken $387,000 belonging to the United States. He does not want an investigation so that we can bring an architect and bring an engineer and figure it right out from the books themselves that the Government has had $387,000 of its money taken away from it. He does not want an investigation. He said he did not want an investigation.

Talk about no facts to back it up. I went before that committee. I have been before committees. I have been head of committees once or twice. I was put on several committees in the national convention with work to do and did it.

I want to tell the Senate what happened. I want to be complimentary to the committee. I will not say anything on the floor of the Senate that breaches its rules; but I am not going to say that that committee was acting as if it were trying to get facts on Farley. If it is necessary in order not to offend the rules of the Senate for me not to say anything, I will not say anything.

What was the function of this committee? I am going to show in just a moment what the committee has done, according to the Senator from North Carolina. The committee wrote me a letter. It did not do what the Senator from North Carolina said it did. He is mistaken and does not remember the facts, and the Senator from Tennessee is mistaken, too, and does not remember the facts.

They did not ask me to summon witnesses; no. They wrote me a letter, signed by the Senator from Tennessee, asking me to give him a list of the witnesses and an outline of what they would swear. I deliberated and decided I would give them the names of enough witnesses to convince anybody, I thought. But there were some I could not afford to give. They told me not to give their names. They said, "Call me under a subpoena, put me on the stand and ask me this question, and I will answer the truth; but please do not give my name as having volunteered anything about this case."

As an example, with regard to the case in West Virginia, I had two witnesses. One said, "Here is the first witness; here is the second witness; and if neither of them will testify, I will have to be the witness myself."

I gave them the name of a man by the name of Knotts, because Knotts had already gone to jail, and I thought Knotts could not be hurt. It was only a short length of time before they jumped on his wife and the other man down there and began to threaten them with criminal prosecution. They have not yet prosecuted them, I understand, but they have been down there threatening them with prosecution ever since they delivered the telegram whereby they were to "Send us a thousand dollars. We are fixing the case up. Send me a thousand dollars; and I don't mean maybe." And the copy of Mr. Farley's telegram back to them: "All right. I have your thousand dollars. Thank you very much." Or perhaps that was a letter, the last one. Then what happened a little bit later on? The gentleman who pulled off that deal was made United States attorney.

The Senator from North Carolina says they ought to make that United States attorney quit because he imposed on Mr. Farley. What more right have we to presume that Mr. Eastus imposed on Mr. Farley than to say that Farley imposed upon Eastus? Both of them knew what they were doing. I do not think either one of them imposed upon the other. At least, however, this investigation has done so much good already that the Senator from North Carolina, carrying the bell rope here for this opposition to an investigation, says that the man who was the Barcocheba of Mr. Farley in this matter ought to be run out of office because he was unfaithful to Mr. Farley.

Gentlemen of the Senate, I do not think you could run Eastus out. Why not let us investigate that? Here is a place where some good can be done. The Senator from North Carolina suggests that at least one of these appointees of Mr. Farley, by reason of having defrauded Mr. Farley, ought to be run out of office. Why not investigate and do at least that much public good and have the investigation without further delay? They will not run Eastus out of his office. He will be there as long as anyone is in office.

Here is something we do not have to go far to find. This lady said to me, in this affidavit, and it is in there, "You will find that Farley was getting business not only from the General Builders Supply Co. but that the General Builders Supply Co. was getting business from other contractors." She said, "You will find how that thing worked in."

I did not have time to look very far, but I looked and saw this much today. Here was the Hillside Development contract. Right off the bat I have found the General Builders Supply Co. getting a contract for plaster and for finishing lime and for gaging plaster that was much over and above the contract for the brick.

I looked over a little bit further, and I saw where this same concern, the General Builders Supply Co., was getting a contract likewise from Starrett Bros. and Eken, Inc. Let me tell Senators what they will find in this file, which has been submitted on only one of these deals, because, gentlemen of the Senate, they kept out of this return made by Mr. Ickes the matter of the new courthouse building; but you will find that when they returned the file here dealing solely and only with the Hillside Development Co. and the new post-office annex in New York City, in that file alone there is contract after contract that was being garnered here for the General Builders Supply Co.

Information was volunteered here that Mr. Farley owns 14 percent of the General Builders Supply Co. Where does the Senator from North Carolina get those facts?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. BAILEY. They are in the record.

Mr. LONG. Who gave them?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Farley.

Mr. LONG. I am reliably informed that if I am allowed to bring Farley before the investigating committee I can develop that Finnegan never paid Farley 5 cents for the stock; that Finnegan never had a dime to pay his brother-in-law, Farley; that Mr. Finnegan is nothing in the world but a mask for Mr. Farley; and that the public records are there to show it. All we have is, not testimony but a statement Mr. Farley has sent to the committee.

Whatever Mr. Farley has sent to this committee has been accepted as though it were manna falling from heaven. It is something which has come from the celestial ether. Anything on earth that big Jim Farley, the party accused in this case, will certify, not under oath, is accepted, but, oh, no, for this poor woman you are about to prosecute here, I understand, because she has dared to say something about this big high muck-a-muck of American corruption in this country. Whence comes this idea of protecting political spottedness against which she dared to speak? None must speak evil in the presence of the king, but Farley's word, denial, explanation, modification is accepted to undo the four tables of arithmetic. It does not make any difference that the old arithmetic says 4 times 4 is 16, or that 8 from 10 leaves 2—the Senator from the State of Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] says that he was up there at the Department—and if anything means that Farley did something that does not carry out the rules of arithmetic, do not believe the arithmetic. That is like the man who gave his wife a clock with the specific instructions that if he told her what time it was when he came in and the clock struck something else that she should not believe the clock, but should believe what he said; that probably there was something wrong with the clock. That is the kind of instructions that come here from these gentlemen. I would be ashamed of myself to stand up in a civilized open legislative forum when you have got the figures right out of the Government records showing that they took $387,000 of the money belonging to the people of the United States, showing that they took money just as openly and fraudulently as dared to be taken, and nonetheless with your own figures verifying it, you decline to allow these things to be threshed out in a manner that can be done by sworn testimony under cross examination. You say I was called upon and given the right to produce testimony and make that statement.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I shall be very happy to read the very short letters I wrote.

Mr. LONG. All right, read them.

Mr. McKELLAR. The first is as follows:

MARCH 4, 1935.

HON. HUEY P. LONG,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR LONG: When before the committee today you stated you could not recall the names of the witnesses you desired to produce in support of the statements made by you, but you could furnish such names to the committee in connection with its consideration of Senate Resolution No. 74.

I am directed by the committee to ask you to present to the Chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, not later than noon, of Tuesday, March 5, 1935, the names of the witnesses whom you propose to call and the substance of the evidence which you propose to elicit from each.

Very sincerely yours—

Signed by me as chairman of the committee.

I received no answer to that, and on the next day I sent a second letter, as follows:

MARCH 5, 1935.

HON. HUEY P. LONG,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR LONG: I wrote you yesterday by direction of the committee but I have received no response to my letter.

The committee has adjourned until Wednesday, March 6, at 2 p. m. I write to express the hope that you will be kind enough to furnish by that hour the information requested in my communication of yesterday and which you stated that you could furnish.

Very sincerely yours,

KENNETH McKELLAR, Chairman.

There are two requests. The Senator did not furnish the evidence or the names of the witnesses.

Mr. LONG. Oh, yes; I did! Here it is, and I am going to make the Senator from Tennessee swallow every word he said about it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will swallow it if it is right to swallow it.

Mr. LONG. Or else, if the Senator does not understand it, the Senator does not understand English. The Senator wrote one letter, and wrote another letter the next day, probably 11 hours apart. He wrote me one day and said, "I ask you please to send us the names of the witnesses and what they will swear." Before I could get the letter he wrote me another one telling me the committee was not going to meet until Wednesday. Now he tells us he had to write me twice. Why not put the proper interpretation on it?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do put the proper interpretation on this thing.

Mr. LONG. Why not learn to lose this partisan explanation in matters of this kind?

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator was asked to send a statement of the evidence by a certain date, when the committee was to meet. He did not send it, and we gave the Senator a reminder. We tried to do everything in the world to expedite the Senator's hearing before our committee.

Mr. LONG. A letter came in one day and the next day the committee met again, I understand, early in the morning and announced they would meet Wednesday, and they hoped I would have the letter there by Wednesday, and they had it by Wednesday. Here is what I wrote them—I am going to read to the Senate what I wrote them. The only way in the world the Senator can say that this did not give them plenty of witnesses to prove that Farley ought to be run out of the United States and put in the penitentiary is just to say that you would not summon the witnesses, that is all. Here is my letter to them:

GENTLEMEN: In response to the letter received from your chairman, Senator McKELLAR, asking for information as to names of witnesses, what they would testify relative to James A. Farley, and his connections and transactions handled under and with his authority, I beg leave to submit the following:

I talked this over directly and through other parties with members of that committee.

Your committee, I am sure, on reflection will not come to the conclusion that I should expose all witnesses and persons who are prepared to give testimony with regard to Mr. Farley, who must, of necessity, be protected if there is to be any investigation.

Did that prove correct? No. 1 was the case of the man named Knotts who gave the original telegram, and the Senator from North Carolina said the man helping Farley ought to be run out of office for deceiving Farley already; and yet they ran after these poor devils they claim on a charge pending in the Post Office Department for which they have never yet been arrested and never were bothered until I gave their names in this forum.

In addition to that, the Senator from North Carolina alleges culpability, but not to Farley. He said Farley was deceived by the man Eastus, whom he appointed United States attorney, who sent the wires for Farley and who got the money not for himself but turned it over to Farley, and Farley made the acknowledgment of the money.

The next name I mentioned was Mr. Moses. I thought I might mention Moses' name because Moses had alleged in print some of the information that he had. Lo and behold, I mentioned Mr. Moses at a time when Mr. Ickes said that they would not let New York State have any money.

Mr. McKELLAR rose.

Mr. LONG. I will not yield now. At a time when Mr. Ickes said they would not let New York have any money for a certain thing unless Moses resigned in connection with it, Moses stood his ground. Thereupon I gave his name. I was not the cause of it, but it is just one of those little incidents in life—that a few days later they went up and gave Moses the money.

Now, I wish to say to the Senator that you do not have to eat a whole beef to tell when it is tainted. When you give one man's name and they run and threaten to put him in the penitentiary if he does not hush his mouth, and then you give another man's name and they say they are not going to give him any money if he does not quit the office, and then they give him the money, I do not have to eat the whole beef to know that it is not all right. All I have to do is to take one bite. I do not have to put my head in the halter. And these learned and illustrious statesmen from all over the United States who know more about this business than I do, they may be wiser statesmen than I am, but I am pretty good on proving my case in court, and you know you have got to protect your witnesses, Mr. President, when they are doing what this crowd is doing here.

I have had too many lawsuits. I used to fight the corporations in my country, and I had to keep my list of witnesses secret. The day I would go and put down on the book who the witnesses were, and have the sheriff to summon those witnesses, 5 times out of 6 when the case would come up I would not have any witnesses by the day I tried my lawsuit. I learned the expedient of going out in my automobile into the oil fields or the lumber camps on the day when the case was to come up and bring my witnesses in at 9 o'clock on that day. That is the old experience that proved just as good in the United States Senate as it did out there in the woods.

Let me go a little bit further:

Further, some of these witnesses have asked that they be called and placed under oath before their names are in any manner disclosed.

Investigators were sent who threatened to indict them for income-tax matters. A. A. A. and N. R. A. inspectors were sent to my State and gave them a rubbing over the coals for various matters. There never was a reign of corruption and terror under Daugherty or any other man in the control of the political government of this country that compares in terrorism and rottenness to the reign of this man Farley, who has used the processes of the Government to protect his friends and used the processes of the Government to condemn every man who dares raise his voice to expose his rottenness. Yet it is insisted that we ought not to know who they are.

Let us see what was done to those we did disclose:

Further, surely your committee will understand that to a large extent the verification of the charges which I make, and others which could be made, would be shown from public and private records—

Just like this affidavit I produce today. There is the public record to show that—the production and examination of which would be asked in ordinary course.

I could not even get the public records out of the Treasury Department. The Comptroller General of the United States did let me look at one up there, but that was the best I could get.

However, in order that this committee may know that to some extent I can offer to be specific, I stated the following which I expect to produce and prove:

1. Witnesses: Officers of the concerns listed on the building directory at 205 East Forty-second Street as occupying office no. 1701 (being the private headquarters of James A. Farley)—

They said they did not know who they are. The names of the people and a photograph of the list of the concerns were placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and were published and were presented to this committee. There were the names of every one of them placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and made available to the committee. The name and case was most specifically designated and handed to them in the course of the hearing.

I did not expect the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] to pay much attention to it. I think he is just as blind as an ox in this case. I should hate to see a man any more blind than the Senator is being in this case. I know him to be an honest man whose prejudices, when they reach the inner cells of his understanding, know absolutely no rule of logic or arithmetic or grammar or anything else.

I had photographs and I had names, and I listed them with the committee. Did they summon one of them? No! There were 24 of them. Did they summon one of them? No; surely not! Why not? Because of the fact that under the law that committee cannot summon witnesses. The reason why this committee had the resolution to consider was because of the fact that before one 5-cent piece could be spent summoning a witness there had to be a report by a committee. That is the word used by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] on the floor of the Senate when I undertook to keep the resolution from going to the committee on the ground that it might involve an expenditure. He said:

The first witness you swear involves an expenditure. Even taking down the testimony in shorthand involves an expenditure.

For that reason the committee presided over by the Senator from Tennessee did not have any jurisdiction whatever to swear a witness, and I knew it, but if they did have authority, why did they not do it? The names were given to them.

I continue reading:

To show that more than twenty-odd concerns there operating, including six holding companies, have been organized, combined, and affiliated for practically the sole purpose of transacting and dealing in matters with which the United States Government is identified for the purpose of making private profit, a large part of which inures to James A. Farley.

There are plenty of people who will sound the tocsin "Farley, Farley, Farley, Farley" as long as he is dispensing jobs in the United States. Judas Iscariot would have had defenders just as Farley has them now. It would not have made any difference. They would both have their defenders. That is our system of government.

I read further:

For practically the sole purpose of transacting and dealing in matters with which the United States Government is identified for the purpose of making private profit, a large part of which inures to James A. Farley in violation of four criminal statutes of the United States insofar as concerns said Farley.

They said I did not give them anything—

Said witnesses to prove the said purpose of concerns affiliated with said Farley and occupying space in his office by reason of the same, and that they were in position of financial bankruptcy—

Get this—

And that they were in position of financial bankruptcy prior to Farley's ascendancy and since that time have become financially affluent; to prove that Farley interposed his brother-in-law—

Farley said this was not so, so the committee said they did not need any of these 20 witnesses to prove it—

To prove that Farley interposed his brother-in-law as a poor simulation as the head of concerns.

And Farley said that was not true, so the committee said it was not true. We do not need to summon any witnesses. Farley says it is not so—this culprit against whom charges have been filed. Nonetheless, his denial is the balm of Gilead that wipes away any such thing as an insinuation against the name of Farley as long as he is handling the patronage and the plums and the doles of the United States Government. Mr. Farley! Mr. Farley!

That any pretense to show the disposition of his interests is a further simulation.

This could have been disclosed from bank records to show that Harry Finnegan did not have money enough to shine his shoes, let alone money enough to purchase any stock certificates in a company of James A. Farley or his building company or other supply concerns—

To prove that through the various concerns there enumerated as affiliated with James A. Farley contracts for materials have been listed in advance of the awarding of contracts by the United States Government.

Understand this; he puts it out on a blackboard and tells us:

And that contracts to low bidders have been refused—

Listen to this! I had to put this in the RECORD a long time before this little woman gave me the information about how they held up these contracts from various and sundry concerns who could not make the bonds they were requiring of them. This little lady came along and said, "If you will look in the record you will find time after time, when some little concern got one of these contracts, that James A. Farley's General Building Co. practically took over and did the work, or James A. Stewart took over and did the work or furnished the materials, as the case might be, in order that the profits could go to the Farley firm.

They did not summon any witnesses to find out if this was so or not. Oh, no. They said they ought to have some witnesses and ought to hear them. They had 20 witnesses named by me and did not summon even one of them. Was it because of the fact that the name of HUEY P. LONG was signed to the letter they had? It will be signed to more letters than that in the next few years. There will be plenty of chance to go over some of the States and explain it to the people. We will find out how we stand in some of them in the days to come.

In this connection the officers and records of Stewart & Co., of Driscoll & Co., and of Severn & Co. will be produced. The testimony of Commissioner Robert Moses, of New York, and the data which he has assembled will be called for the purpose of proving such sales have been made by firms with which Farley is identified—of the appropriation of funds on the jobs where Farley's firm were furnishers of materials, for the expansion of subdivisions under the guise of being projects for slum removal.

I had the written statement of Moses to that effect. I submitted that written statement.

There they were out there developing a new subdivision on the ground that it was removing slums, and there had never been a slum there since Christ came to earth! Did they want that witness? No; they did not want that witness. They ran up to New York and said, "Mr. Moses, when we published the statement that we were not going to give this money to the city of New York as long as you were to handle it, we did not know what we were talking about.

We have changed our minds. The money is going to come." That is what they did.

Did they summon Moses? No. They say no prima facie case is made out. We could not make out a prima facie case unless you wanted to call the witnesses and take the testimony. You did not have the right to call them. The committee did not want to call the witnesses and take the testimony. The only thing it had the right to do was to report back to the Senate on whether or not these allegations were sufficient to justify the calling of the witnesses, and now it makes the pretext that there has been no case made out because no witnesses were produced!

Here is a list of the witnesses who could have been subpoenaed. Here are the names. Not one of them has been called, for the simple reason, as stated on the floor by Senators, that none of the committees has a right to call a witness, or to have one called, or else because they did not want witnesses called, in order to keep Mr. Farley from being investigated. As a matter of fact, under their own interpretation the law did not allow a witness to be called.

Oh, no; there never was a Member of the United States Senate who offered in the United States Senate a resolution of any kind to investigate HUEY P. LONG, but you had five senatorial investigations of HUEY P. LONG without a single Senator ever making one allegation on this floor of anything to justify it—five different committees, 4,500 pages of testimony—but not one page of testimony can be taken with regard to James Aloysius Farley, handler of the boodle and of the funds of the United States Government at this time. All right.

The testimony of Commissioner Robert Moses, of New York, and the data which he has assembled will be called for the purpose of proving such sales have been made by firms with which Farley is identified, of the appropriation of funds on the jobs where Farley's firms were furnishers of materials, for the expansion of subdivisions under the guise of being projects for slum removal; for the paying of excessive prices for property—

For paying excessive prices for property. I gave that to them in writing, showing that here is what they did with these allies of Farley who were buying this material from him, that they paid about two or three times as much for this land to his allies as they paid for other lands, and that they kept the frontage of the land and only sold them the rear part, so that the business part that might be built up would be available to the private owners for future sales. I put that in the RECORD, too. Did they call for that? No; they could not call for this information. The only time this case can be tried is after the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate has approved the appropriation. That is what the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] said on the floor. He said that we could not have any expenditure of any kind by any investigating committee until the resolution had first been sent to a standing committee, and later approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is, where expenditure is required under the resolution.

Mr. LONG. Yes; and the Senator said that an expenditure would be required to bring a witness. Those were the words the Senator used—that it would necessarily require an expenditure to summon and bring a witness, or to take testimony through stenographers.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is true.

Mr. LONG. That is true. I am not arguing that matter with the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON. But where the circumstances show, as I think they do in this case, that the Senator from Louisiana is persistently pursuing a personal grudge against Mr. Farley, I do not believe an investigation is justified.

Mr. LONG. I am not arguing that particular point, but the Senator agrees with me that the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads could not swear a witness or take a line of testimony, because the resolution has first to go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON. Oh, no; the committee can swear witnesses and take testimony.

Mr. LONG. Testimony that involves no expense.

Mr. ROBINSON. It might involve expense.

Mr. LONG. All right.

Mr. ROBINSON. If the witness refused to attend without payment of his expenses or his fees, it might involve expense, but all standing committees of the Senate are authorized to swear witnesses and take testimony.

Mr. LONG. That is the argument I made.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Post Office Committee has the power to do that.

Mr. LONG. Why did not the Post Office Committee summon the witnesses then? Here are their names. Why did not the Post Office Committee summon them?

Mr. McKELLAR. We were not asked to do so.

Mr. LONG. Here is the list.

Mr. McKELLAR. It was not given to the Post Office Committee.

Mr. LONG. Here it is.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator read that list to the Senate. He did not present it to the committee.

Mr. LONG. Oh, I know the Senator from Tennessee has cast aside the four tables of arithmetic. He is now going to throw out the dictionary because it shows that he got the names of the witnesses; it shows that he was told that they would swear to certain things, and it shows that he did not issue a subpoena to a living soul, but he ran in here and said, "There is no prima facie case. There is no evidence before the committee." That is what the Senator said.

At this point Mr. LONG yielded to Mr. McNARY to propose a unanimous-consent agreement, and debate ensued, following which Mr. LONG yielded the floor for the day.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The PRESIDENT pro tempore, as in executive session, laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations and an international agreement, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received see the end of Senate proceedings.)

RECESS

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the unanimous-consent agreement the Senate will stand in recess until 11 o'clock tomorrow morning.

Thereupon (at 6 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Tuesday, May 14, 1935, at 11 o'clock a. m.

NOMINATIONS

Executive nominations received by the Senate May 13, 1935

ADMINISTRATOR OF THE RURAL ELECTRIFICATION ADMINISTRATION
Morris L. Cooke, of Pennsylvania, to be Administrator of the Rural Electrification Administration.

UNITED STATES ATTORNEY

Frederick V. Follmer, of Pennsylvania, to be United States attorney, middle district of Pennsylvania, vice A. A. Maguire, appointed by the court.

UNITED STATES MARSHAL

William P. McDermitt, of New Jersey, to be United States marshal, district of New Jersey, to succeed Frederick C. Schneider, term expired.

PROMOTIONS IN THE COAST GUARD

Commander LeRoy Reinburg to be captain, to rank as such from May 1, 1935, in place of Capt. Herman H. Wolf, retired.

Lt. Comdr. Elmer F. Stone to be commander, to rank as such from May 1, 1935.

The above-named officers have passed the examinations required for the promotions for which they are recommended.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, MAY 13, 1935

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Blessed be the Lord God of Israel from everlasting to everlasting. We are glad that we are still in the hands of a living God and a loving Heavenly Father; before Thee we bow in humblest reverence. To Thee we are linked by bonds stronger than death and with the lights of the ultimate sky. O Faith! thou art a saving power hanging over all the things of time. The weakest life that flutters and falls to the ground is redeemed by a soft and tender radiance of divine love. Forgive us the instances in which we have caused one another pain in which we had no desire. Clothe us for self-assertion, for public declaration of faith, for principle and loyalty. We pray Thee to let the week be a most useful page in the Book of Life, in the garden, with fruit, flowers, and sunshine. In the Redeemer's name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, May 10, 1935, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed a concurrent resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. Con. Res. 14. Concurrent resolution authorizing the Committee on Finance, United States Senate, to have printed 1,000 additional copies of the hearings before that committee on S. 1130, the Economic Security Act.

DELEGATION OF AUTHORITY

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication:

MAY 11, 1935.

The SPEAKER HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Washington, D. C.

SIR: Desiring to be temporarily absent from my office, I hereby designate Mr. H. Newlin Megill, an official in my office, to sign any and all papers for me which he would be authorized to sign by virtue of this designation and of clause 4, rule III, of the House.

Yours respectfully,

SOUTH TRIMBLE,

Clerk of the House of Representatives.

THE BANKING ACT OF 1935

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Speaker, the Banking Act of 1935 provides for a sounder, a more effective banking system.

I hesitate to discuss this bill, because of the general impression that banking bills and banking problems are complicated technical subjects that only a few banking experts can understand. However, the past few years of misery and suffering have taught the people the importance of money and banking. People now understand that the volume of credit and the volume of currency have an important influence upon the prices of goods, upon employment and unemployment, and upon the economic state of the Union.

PRIVATE CONTROL OF MONEY DANGEROUS

The control of the people's money by private bankers, the use of bank credits and of investments by private bankers, the control of the insurance of money and of the expansion or contraction of credit by private banks have been important factors in bringing about the depression.

Whoever controls the monetary system, whoever controls the banking and credit system of the Nation controls the destinies of the people. No great and lasting improvement is possible until the control and supervision of the banking and of the credit system of this country are taken from the private bankers and vested in an agency of the Government itself.

The banking bill of 1935 consists of three sections or titles. Title I places on a permanent basis the insurance of bank deposits by the Federal Government. Title III makes technical amendments in the National Banking Act and in other banking statutes. Title II deals with fundamental changes in the Federal Reserve System.

I shall first briefly discuss title I and the insurance of bank deposits, and then shall devote the balance of my speech to title II and to the important changes which it makes in the Federal Reserve System.

FEDERAL INSURANCE OF BANK DEPOSITS

During the last year of the Hoover administration the people were fast losing confidence in the soundness, and often even in the integrity, of the banks. Withdrawals of banking deposits increased at an alarming rate. People had completely lost confidence in the soundness of the banking structure. However, at all times they retained confidence in the Government. This is evidenced by the increase of postal-savings deposits. In 2 years postal savings increased from $347,000,000 to $1,200,000,000 because the people knew the Government was behind these deposits and would guarantee them. Therefore, Government insurance of all bank deposits was the logical step.

FEDERAL INSURANCE HUGE SUCCESS

The Federal insurance of banking deposits has been a singular success. It has caused money to come out of hiding and to be redeposited in the banks, where it could be used for industrial- and commercial-credit purposes.

Ninety percent by number of all the licensed commercial banks in the United States have been admitted to the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation. Over 90 percent of the total deposits in commercial banks and trust companies in the United States have been insured.

This insurance of bank deposits, up to $5,000, is now made permanent by the banking bill of 1935. The insured maximum of $5,000 is held to be sufficient because 98 percent of the banking deposits are less than $2,500. There are over 50,000,000 depositors in this country, but 1,000,000 depositors have as much on deposit as the combined 49,000,000 other depositors have. The average single deposit is only $183.12.

Member banks of the Federal Reserve System have their deposits insured. Banks that are not members of the Federal Reserve System may terminate their deposit insurance after July 1, 1935. If they choose to do so, they must notify all depositors of such action.

CLOSE CONTROL OF BANKING CREDIT POLICY

There is a difference between monetary policy and banking operations. Monetary policy has to do with the expansion or contraction of the credit or of the currency of this country. In the past this policy has been turned over to the bankers, who have managed it and manipulated it for their private gain, without regard to the national welfare and without responsibility to anyone. The banking bill of 1935 changes this. It diverts the control of monetary policies from the private bankers and vests it in a Federal Reserve Board appointed by the administration in Washington and controlled by it. Let me repeat, the main object of title II of the bill is to lessen and to reduce the power of the bankers to determine the monetary policy of the United States.

This bill does not greatly affect the ordinary operations of banks. The usual function of a bank is to receive deposits and to lend its own money and the money of its depositors to borrowers. These functions are not affected by this bill. They are left to the individual banker. But the determination of our monetary policy is an entirely different matter. Our monetary policy must be based on the purchasing power of money, on the prices of goods and commodities, on gold reserves, and on many other factors that make for a sound currency. They have nothing to do with the usual and ordinary functions of a bank.

I want to explain to you that there are two kinds of money—currency and credit money. About 95 percent of our supply of money is in the form of bank credit and only 5 percent in paper bank notes and other money such as quarters, dimes, and so forth. In view of the prevalence of checks and negotiable notes, the largest amount of business can be conducted on bank credit, without reference to the actual supply of paper money. So when a bank increases or decreases the total amount of bank loans and bank credits, it thereby increases or decreases the supply of credit money. For instance, if a bank grants a loan of, say, $1,000, that has the same force and effect as if the bank had printed 1,000 new $1 bills, since, because of the facility with which checks are cashed, they have the same value in ordinary business transactions as actual cash.

IMPORTANCE OF CREDIT CONTROL

In the past each bank or group of bankers could grant as much credit as it desired. It could refuse to give credit and thereby disrupt business; it could call in loans and foreclose on property at will, by the simple expedient of refusing further credit.

This privilege, this power the bankers have greatly abused; their policies have contributed to bringing misery and suffering and unemployment upon millions of people during the past few years.

As of last June the total of the capital and surplus of all the banks amounted to seven and one-half billion dollars. On the basis of the 10 to 1 ratio permitted to banks, the banks could have had deposits amounting to $75,000,000,000. But, in fact, all the deposits totaled only forty-six and one-half billion dollars. In other words, the banks contracted currency or stopped the supply of money to the extent of about $30,000,000,000. Had the banks extended sufficient credit so as to have bank deposits totaling $75,000,000,000 instead of $46,000,000,000 there would have been no money shortage today; there would have been few foreclosures of homes and farms; private industry and business would have been able to reemploy millions of men now idle, and the wheels of industry and of commerce would have been turning rapidly.

Now, under this bill the Federal Government will exercise control over the credit policy of the Federal Reserve System by influencing the election of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System.

The movements in the volume and supply of money and credit must be controlled by some responsible Government agency. They must be controlled in the interest of the public, in the interest of society as a whole, and not in the interest of the banking community alone. The banking bill of 1935 places the responsibility in a committee of the Federal Reserve Board called the "Open Market Operations Committee", whose orders are made mandatory.

The banking bill of 1935 is not a complete solution of the banking problems. It will not eliminate all banking abuses, but it is a beginning. It is a step in the proper direction.

The power of banks to issue currency has already been curtailed. Now the power of banks to affect the volume of the credit of the Nation has been greatly reduced. The elimination of these two evils will go a long way to bring financial freedom to the people of the United States.

IMPEACHMENT PROCEEDINGS

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Committee on the Judiciary I send to the desk a privileged resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 220

Resolved, That for the purpose of conducting an examination in order to determine its recommendation to the House of Representatives with reference to House Resolution 214, the Committee on the Judiciary, as a whole or by subcommittee, is authorized to sit and act during the present Congress at such times and places in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, whether or not the House is sitting, has recessed, or has adjourned, to hold such hearings, to require the attendance of such witnesses, and the production of such books, papers, and documents, and to take such testimony as it deems necessary.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?
Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. As I listened to the reading of the resolution I thought it was in the usual form that we have under such proceedings. Is that correct?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I will say to the gentleman from New York that this refers to the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] last week. The power and authority requested is the usual power and authority requested by the committee, with this exception and this difference:

This resolution is to give the Committee on the Judiciary authority to send for persons, papers, and to administer oaths, and so forth, in order to enable it to conduct the preliminary examinations deemed necessary by the committee in order that it may be advised as to what sort of recommendation the committee should make to the House on resolution 214.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Utah?

There was no objection.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, this Congress has seen fit to appropriate $5,000,000,000, the major part of which will be spent for public works. In yesterday's New York Times I read an article written by Secretary Ickes, which in my opinion is one of the most statesmanlike articles I ever read on that question. I think there is information in the article which every Member of Congress, especially those who voted for the appropriation, should read, and I ask unanimous consent at this time to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include therein this article written by Secretary Ickes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Utah?

Mr. RICH. Reserving the right to object, I question whether we should have newspaper articles inserted in the RECORD.

If Mr. Ickes has a manuscript that the gentleman would like to have inserted, there might be some merit to it, but I question whether we should permit newspaper articles at this time to be printed. For that reason I object.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman reserve his objection?

Mr. RICH. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. If I get the manuscript from the Secretary of the Interior, will the gentleman still object?

Mr. RICH. I shall not object to one of the Cabinet officers having inserted his remarks if they are from his own manuscript, but if we are going to take a newspaper article, I object.

Mr. MURDOCK. I contacted the Secretary this morning on this matter and, of course, he assured me that the article appearing was his own manuscript or at least taken from his manuscript.

Mr. RICH. If the gentleman will substitute the manuscript, I shall not object.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I agree with the gentleman from Pennsylvania that if the newspaper articles come from the Hearst papers or the Washington Post they would be unreliable, but I should think that the manuscript would be satisfactory.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I modify my request. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and to include therein the manuscript of an article of Secretary Ickes on the question of public works.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Utah asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks and to include therein the manuscript of Secretary Ickes on the subject of public works. Is there objection?

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object—and I shall not object—I suggest that the gentleman have Mr. Ickes refrain in this article from criticizing the Honorable Senator from Louisiana, Mr. Long, and Father Coughlin because they happen to think and believe that all the people ought to have more of a share in all of the wealth in the country.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Ohio yield?

Mr. TRUAX. Yes.

Mr. WOODRUM. Does the gentleman approve the sentiments of Senator Long and Father Coughlin?

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago I read into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the 16-point platform and program of the National League for Social Justice, and stated at that time—and I reiterate that statement now—that I do approve of the principles laid down in the 16-point program.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRUAX. Yes.

Mr. RICH. If those 16 points are adopted by the Democratic platform, will the gentleman support the Democratic platform, or will he support a platform of Father Coughlin?

Mr. TRUAX. I think that part of the 16 points is taken from the Democratic platform.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Utah?

There was no objection.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, it has been said that "when there is no vision the people perish." Because our political leaders during the decade following the World War lacked the vision essential to statesmen, our country and our people were led perilously near the verge of ruin. That time has passed, and with it has passed the blindness that permitted us to plunge into depression. During the past 2 years our great President and his administration have succeeded in planting our feet firmly on the road that leads to hitherto undreamed-of prosperity; to an era of economic justice. The new deal is consecrated to the promotion of the general welfare. One of the most important phases of the new deal is the Public Works Administration. The public-works program, as planned and as administered, is a mighty example of statesmanship with vision. It involves a new form of an age-old concept of justice—the concept according to which every willing worker is entitled to work, to earn a livelihood, and to enjoy freedom and happiness. Fortunately a statesman with vision to perceive the potential greatness of our country, and with ability to administer the expenditure of vast sums of money honestly and effectively, was chosen to direct this program. I refer, of course, to Hon. Harold L. Ickes, Administrator of the Public Works Administration. Mr. Ickes recently wrote an article which is one of the finest economic and social documents I have ever read. The text of this article follows my remarks, and I recommend it to every Member of Congress as worthy of his careful study.

(The article referred to appears under remarks of Hon. Edward P. Costigan, of Colorado, p. 7353.)

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an article which appeared in the New York Herald Tribune of Sunday last by former Under Secretary of State William R. Castle on the cotton situation. I have the manuscript, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The lady from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend her remarks by including therein a publication by former Assistant Secretary of State Castle on the textile situation. Is there objection?

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, if the gentlewoman will substitute the manuscript instead of the newspaper article, I shall not object.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. Do I understand that the article referred to is by some former public official?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. YOUNG. Not holding any public position at the present time?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Not at the present time.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, I object.

FORMER REPRESENTATIVE WILLIAM WALLACE M'CREIDIE

Mr. EKWALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 minutes to make an announcement of the death of a former Member of this House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. EKWALL. Mr. Speaker, I rise with considerable regret to announce the death of William Wallace McCredie, a former Member of the House from the State of Washington. Mr. McCredie was born in Montrose, Susquehanna County, Pa., April 27, 1862. He attended the University of Iowa Law School and was admitted to the bar in 1890 and commenced the practice of the law at Vancouver, Wash., which is just across the Columbia River from my home city of Portland, Oreg. He served as a prosecuting attorney of Clark County, Wash., from 1894 to 1896. Thereafter he engaged in the general practice of law and was elected and served as judge of the superior court of Clark County, Wash., from 1904 to 1909. In 1909 he was elected to the Sixty-first Congress to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Francis W. Cushman.

Judge McCredie served one term. Probably he was not known to many of the younger Members, but I am sure he will be remembered by the older Members of the House on account of his ready wit and genial personality. Judge McCredie moved to and lived in my home city of Portland for a number of years prior to his death, which occurred in that city on May 10, 1935.

Judge McCredie was president of the Portland Club of the Pacific Coast Baseball League for about 17 years and was an ardent baseball fan until his death. He was very favorably known in my city and in that entire section of the country, where he was active in a professional and civic way from the time he moved from the East. He was a good lawyer, a just judge, a splendid statesman, and a warm friend. America has lost a real patriot and I am sure his former colleagues of the House will hear of his passing with deep and genuine sorrow.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. WITHROW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks and to include therein several brief tables compiled by the Wisconsin State Chamber of Commerce.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, are they compiled by former public officials?

Mr. WITHROW. No; these were not.

Mr. KNUTSON. I shall not object, even though they were not.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, how much space will this extension take in the Record?

Mr. WITHROW. The entire extension will not go over two pages, in my opinion; that is, my own remarks and the three brief tables I wish to insert with my remarks.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, a week ago similar permission was given to another Member of the House, with the result that 22 pages of the Record were taken in the extension. We do not want any more extensions like that.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin to extend his remarks in the Record and to include therein certain tables prepared by the State Chamber of Commerce of Wisconsin?

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, who did the gentleman say the matter was from?

Mr. WITHROW. The matter I wish to include in my remarks is several brief tables taken from the report of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of Wisconsin. I doubt whether the entire extension, including my own remarks and these brief tables, will take over two pages.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Speaker, I dislike to object, but I must.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL, 1936

Mr. LUDLOW, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported the bill (H. R. 8021) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and for other purposes, which was read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying papers, was committed to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered to be printed.

Mr. POWERS reserved all points of order.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8021) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and for other purposes; and, pending that, I ask unanimous consent that general debate on the bill may continue during today, the time to be equally divided and controlled by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. POWERS] and myself.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 8021, the legislative appropriation bill, 1936, with Mr. BULWINKLE in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill may be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 33 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, in preparing the bill making appropriations for the legislative establishment for the next fiscal year the subcommittee of which I have the honor to be chairman has been actuated by a sincere desire to make the burden rest as lightly as possible on the taxpayers while at the same time providing in sufficient measure the funds required to carry on all necessary activities. We believe we have produced a good bill that meets all essential requirements without wasting a dollar of the taxpayers' money. We have been faced with the duty of deciding some questions of policy in reference to personnel and promotions and we believe that our decisions, while they may prove temporarily disappointing to some, are based on correct principles and that the future will justify them as being sound and constructive.

I do not believe that the members of any subcommittee ever worked together more happily and more harmoniously in the public interest than our subcommittee has in framing this bill, and I wish to pay my humble tribute of gratitude and appreciation to my coworkers, Mr. SNYDER, of Pennsylvania, Mr. ZIONCHECK, of Washington, Mr. DOCKWEILER, of California, Mr. MORAN, of Maine, and Mr. POWERS, of New Jersey, who have been most faithful and diligent in seeking to find the best solution of every one of the many problems presented and who, I may add, by way of personal acknowledgment, have been most generous in overlooking the shortcomings of their chairman. Our task has been large, and the objects of our attention have been widely diversified, with the result that our Members have been led more or less into fields of specialization, and in the course of general debate the gentlemen of our subcommittee will pay considerable attention to their several specialties. At this point I would like to inject into my remarks what appears from frequent repetition to be a bromide but which bears the hall mark of eternal truth, when I say that we had the benefit of the best adviser that ever kept an appropriations committee in the safe, open channel and off of the rocks—Marcellus C. Sheild. From the beginning until the end of our deliberations politics stood adjourned. We had but one aim and that was to do what seemed to be best for our country. We may have made mistakes, but, if so, they are the honest mistakes of all six of your servants on the subcommittee. The report we bring to you is unanimous.

Our respectful regard for economy is borne out by an analysis of the bill we are placing before you for your consideration. The total carried by this bill is $2,590,140 under Budget estimates. The amount appropriated is $20,355,965, as against Budget estimates totaling $22,946,105. The amount carried in the bill is $1,884,934 more than the total of the appropriations of the legislative establishment for 1935, but this increase is more apparent than real, as $1,000,000 of it, while appearing as an appropriation, is in fact a loan to the working capital of the Government Printing Office and is to be repaid in its entirety to the United States Treasury within 6 months after the close of the next fiscal year. Then, too, the amount required to restore salaries to the 100-percent level, as heretofore provided by act of Congress, adds approximately $1,380,000 to the 1935 appropriations, so that if we eliminate from consideration the loan to the working fund of the Government Printing Office and the increase of salaries to normal the total appropriations for the legislative establishment for 1936 show an actual net decrease of $495,066 below the total appropriations for 1935. [Applause.]

Early in our deliberations we were faced with the necessity of reaching a decision in regard to certain salary and personnel increases.

The number of positions and the rates of pay for the Senate and House employees are specifically fixed by the Legislative Pay Act of 1929, when a general salary increase was provided. Since those salaries were fixed they were reduced by as much as 15 percent temporarily, and since that reduction restorations have gradually been made until commencing April 1 of this year they were placed again on a 100-percent basis.

Living costs, which at the time these salaries were fixed in 1929, were abnormally high, have decreased considerably since that time and have not yet gone back to the 1929 high levels.

There are some elements of incongruity of pay for similar employments under the Senate and House. Some positions on the House side are not as favorably compensated in comparison with similar employments on the Senate side and vice versa. That situation invariably will exist with each body supreme in the management of its own affairs. Particularly is this so when personnel is selected on a purely patronage basis. Uniformity in the very nature of things cannot be wholly brought about. It was sought on two different occasions by a joint committee of the Senate and House considering the subject of legislative pay, but disparity still exists, and probably will always continue to exist.

In the matter of additional employments in the House some increases may be justified, perhaps not on the permanent roll but for temporary service to relieve present conditions. Good presentations were made in behalf of more telephone operators, more mail messengers, and more pages. The necessity for most of this personnel results from conditions growing out of the present emergency and the pressure is lifted when Congress adjourns. Whatever relief in these directions may be necessary should be considered of temporary nature only, at least for the present.

Experience has shown that whenever additions are made to the statutory roll, even to serve a temporary need, they seldom are severed when the emergency has passed.

Much fine service is rendered about the Senate and House of Representatives by the employees. Many of them are hard-working, faithful, and exceedingly competent, rendering a full measure of service, and some of them undoubtedly are underpaid. However, a large group of those employees work only when the House is in session, and when a sine die adjournment has been taken are free to go their ways until a new session starts.

The way to correct these obvious disparities and injustices is not through a committee whose sole duty it is to make appropriations, and it should not be done in a popgun fashion, which has the demerit of increasing the salaries of some employees and overlooking others who are equally meritorious, but to reach a just determination the subject should be gone into thoroughly and in all of its phases by a legislative committee, acting in conformity with a resolution of the House directing a general investigation and overhauling of all salaries. Only in that way can a result be reached that will be just to all employees as well as to the taxpayers. Gentlemen came before our subcommittee urging an increase of salary for this, that, and the other employee. The list of these proposed increases grew by leaps and bounds, and, while we recognized merit in some of the claims, we could not, as a subcommittee, wholly lacking in legislative authority, do otherwise than advise the interested parties to direct their efforts toward promoting a resolution through regular legislative channels providing for a general readjustment of salaries.

We had before us an estimate providing for an increase of the Capitol Police force. It was proposed to add 24 men to the force, and the estimate submitted to cover salaries and uniforms for these 24 additional privates was $41,518. This addition would increase the force from 132 to 156 men to guard the Capitol Building, the House and Senate Office Buildings, and the Capitol Grounds.

Our subcommittee gave the most careful consideration to this estimate after hearing testimony from Kenneth Romney, Sergeant at Arms of the House, and William S. Orthman, captain of the Capitol Police. We were not unmindful of the peculiar police problems presented by Capitol Hill and its unusual surroundings, and we entered into the subject with a desire to establish a sound permanent policy that would bring about improved conditions as rapidly as possible. It was our conclusion after hearing all of the evidence that a strengthening of the Capitol Police force is obviously needed, but that it can best be strengthened not by additional numbers but by an improvement of the standard of the force. We were aided in reaching that conclusion by the testimony of Mr. Romney, Sergeant at Arms of the House, who said that he did not want any additional men unless they measure up to the standard of the Metropolitan Police force.

We decided not to grant any additional policemen, but to tackle the problem from another angle by giving the Capitol Police Board authority to establish a standard of qualifications for policemen that will insure the gradual building up of a force of increased usefulness and efficiency. There are 126 acres in the enlarged Capitol reservation with 132 policemen now assigned to guard the buildings and grounds, while in the Park Police force of the District of Columbia there is a force of 70 men to patrol 5,553 acres, or approximately 80 acres per man.

It might be said of the existing Capitol Police force that, like Topsy, it just "grewed up." Neither political party is to be held exclusively responsible for its lack of perfection. Capitol policemen under both parties have come under the head of "patronage." Members of Congress are not to blame for appointing unsuitable men, because no standard of qualifications has ever been set or even hinted as being necessary. Nobody has ever told Members of Congress that a constituent in order to be a policeman must be so many feet high, weigh so many pounds, and be sound in body and limb.

Captain Orthman gave a stirring admonition that something tragic may happen unless a standard for police timber is provided, and Sergeant at Arms Romney—see page 65 of the hearings—said:

Unless you write into the permanent law a provision that all policemen shall conform to the standards provided for service in the Metropolitan force, I do not want any policemen.

It seemed to us to be the part of wisdom to take cognizance of the facts and circumstances above set forth, and we have written into the legislative appropriation bill the following provision in the form of a limitation:

Provided, That no part of any appropriation contained in this act shall be paid as compensation to any person appointed after June 30, 1935, as an officer or member of the Capitol Police (including those for the Senate and House Office Buildings) who does not meet the standards to be prescribed for such appointees by the Capitol Police Board.

Under this provision the Capitol Police Board will set up certain standards that must be observed in making future appointments to the Capitol Police force. The Capitol Police Board is composed of the Sergeant at Arms of the House, the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate, and the Architect of the Capitol. They can be depended upon to prescribe qualifications that will best serve the public interest. In writing this limitation we have intended no reflection whatever on any Member of Congress or on any of the men on the force who are worthy men and citizens. We believed, and still believe, that Members of Congress will gladly cooperate in choosing men as policemen who measure up to required qualifications when they learn what those qualifications are. As the turn-over in these positions is fairly rapid, we believe that the effect of this legislative provision will be to so improve the force that accretions will not be necessary.

I repeat that the blame—if there is blame—for the weakness of the Capitol Police force cannot be placed on individual Members of Congress or the many fine men who serve on the force, but it is due to the system, and the system has been the same under the rule of both political parties. The limitation we have written into the bill will not remove policemen from the patronage group, but it will enable Members of Congress to say to applicants for policemen's jobs that it will be useless for them to apply unless they measure up to a certain standard of qualifications. Thus the unfit will be eliminated automatically. On page 183 of the hearings you will find the opinion of Captain Orthman, chief of Capitol Police, as to what these qualifications should be—age not less than 21 nor more than 50; height not less than 5 feet 7 inches; weight not less than 145 pounds, with preference to those who have had service in the military or armed forces. We believe the limitation in this bill is a wise provision; that it undoubtedly is in the public interest, and that it should be adopted to the end that we may have a police force that will be entirely satisfactory and above reproach.

It is not my purpose to review in boresome detail the provisions of the bill we are bringing before you. The report is thorough and we believe is illuminating as to all essential items. Salaries of Members and their clerks and other employees affected by the act, having already gone back to normal, are provided for on 100-percent basis. The expiration of the Economy Act on June 30 lifts the cut in Members' mileage, which also is provided for on 100-percent or normal basis. We include an item of $28,000 to pay for painting the Capitol dome and the middle part of the Capitol Building. Unless the dome is painted approximately every 4 years it begins to show signs of weather deterioration, and it would seem to be good business to paint it according to the usual schedule. We have made provision for new awnings for the old House Office Building and have allowed $14,000 for steel file cases for the House document room, where numbers of documents are now piled on the floor on account of the congestion.

The House restaurant, I am pleased to report, continues on a self-sustaining basis under the able direction of Hon. LINDSAY WARREN, Chairman of the Committee on Accounts, but we have allowed $5,000 for long overdue restaurant equipment to take the place of worn-out ranges, utensils, and so forth. In view of the fact that the restaurant was for so long a financial white elephant, I do not believe that anyone will begrudge this modest replacement outlay. We have allowed two necessary improvements at the Capitol power plant—$25,000 for the installation of a parallel coal conveyor and $77,000 for the installation of rear water walls in 16 boilers in place of the present worn-out bridge walls—but we deferred for future consideration an estimate of $1,507,537 for the construction of a new building and the installation of equipment to increase the capacity of the existing plant. With the improvements authorized last year and with the two improvements carried in this bill, the Capitol power plant will carry the Capitol Hill load pending the construction of the proposed addition to the Government Printing Office. When that building is added to the Capitol Hill group, some additional provision will have to be made to carry the increased load. Otherwise, it will be necessary to turn loose at least one building of the group to be serviced by the Potomac Electric Power Co.

The Botanic Garden, under the new management of David Lynn, the Architect of the Capitol, is showing a gratifying improvement, and it is believed that within 4 or 5 years Poplar Point nursery, an adjunct of that establishment, will be able to supply, free of charge, to other Government agencies nearly all of the plant material required to embellish the open spaces surrounding the various Government departments and activities, thus effecting quite a saving.

Among the few major improvements allowed for is an item of $116,900 to reconstruct and recondition the elevators in the Library of Congress. A committee composed of a representative of the Bureau of Standards and a representative of the Office of Architect of the Capitol pronounced several of the elevators unsafe and a positive menace to the lives of visitors and attendants. With the completion of this elevator job all of the elevators in the buildings on Capitol Hill will be safe and in prime condition, the elevators in the Capitol and old House Office and Senate Office Buildings having been reconstructed under authority of the legislative and deficiency appropriation bills of the last Congress.

The bill inaugurates a new feature of the legislative reference service of the Library of Congress, which, it is believed, will be distinctly useful to Members of both branches of the Congress. Once a week a brief digest will be made of all public bills introduced, and this digest or syllabus will be sent to every Member for his information. When a public bill is reported out of committee a somewhat more extended digest will be made. When the service is in operation these digests or syllabi will come to the offices of the Members automatically. The need for this service was suggested by Representative ARNOLD, of Illinois, whose illuminating testimony on the subject is an interesting contribution to the hearings of our subcommittee, beginning on page 171. It is believed this service will be very helpful to Members in enabling them to obtain a comprehensive knowledge of legislative proposals, which ordinarily come so thick and fast and are so numerous that no Member can take the time necessary to undertake a personal study and digest of all the introduced and reported measures. It also is believed that this new service will be of great value to Members in making it possible for them to answer their correspondence promptly.

We have added $1,000,000 to the working capital of the Government Printing Office, but this is more of a paper transaction than it is an actual appropriation, as every cent of it is to be returned to the United States Treasury within 6 months after the close of the next fiscal year. It is, in fact, nothing more than a loan to the working-capital fund until the Public Printer can collect from the various departments and governmental activities the amounts they will owe the Government Printing Office on their printing accounts.

It seemed to us it was good business that this be done. In its financial transactions, the Government Printing Office has got into a rut that is anything but businesslike and that reflects no credit on the Government of the United States. Its income on departmental printing accounts is so slow that it is continually holding up its creditors and depriving them of the money due them. In some instances it is 120 days late in the payment of its bills, which means that to a certain extent it is running on the money of its creditors. By this addition of a million dollars to its working capital the Government Printing Office can pay its bills promptly, and the money will be returned to the Treasury when the Government Printing Office is reimbursed by the departments and other governmental activities on their printing accounts. It also is hoped that the prospect of prompt settlements will enable the Government Printing Office to secure more favorable discounts on its printing bills. A. E. Giegengack, the new Public Printer, is a practical printer of long experience who appears to your subcommittee to be thoroughly devoted to his job, and we were inclined to encourage and assist him in his efforts to install business methods in the great printing establishment. The working capital of the Government Printing Office for years was $2,500,000, which also is the congressional-printing fund and is drawn upon continually after the beginning of the fiscal year. To this it was necessary to add $200,000 to meet the increased cost of the 40-hour week, and the addition of the $1,000,000 referred to as an increment to working capital will increase the working capital to $3,700,000 in the fiscal year 1936.

Further, in the interest of businesslike methods and a simplification of bookkeeping, leaves of absence will hereafter be granted at the Government Printing Office on the basis of the rate of pay received by the employee at the time the leave is taken instead of at the rate of pay when the leave was earned. It is apparent that in some instances this general formula cannot be applied without slight injustice in individual cases, as, for instance, when the employee earns his leave at nightwork and is transferred to daywork before the leave is taken. In a case like that the employee will lose the benefit of the night differential. On the other hand, when the employee earns his leave at daywork and is transferred to nightwork before leave is taken the differential in that instance will operate against the Government and give the employee an undue advantage. All in all, it is about as broad as it is long; and when we consider that the new method does away with an enormous amount of involved computation and reduces cost by simplifying bookkeeping, the argument in favor of the change as presented by the Public Printer was impelling and forceful. Our subcommittee was especially impressed by the disclosure that a vote was taken on this subject at the Government Printing Office last September, when the men held their own election, making up their own ballots, and selecting their own tellers; and two-thirds of the employees voted in favor of the change that is embodied in the bill. To be doubly certain that no injustice would be done, I took the matter up by correspondence with Charles P. Howard, president of the International Typographical Union, to get his opinion of the proposed change in the method of computing leave, and I have his reply, in which he says:

I conferred with some of our members who are employed in the Government Printing Office, and I did not find any considerable opposition to the legislation to which you refer. It appears to me the change would simplify bookkeeping to a considerable extent, and I do not know that it would do any injustice if fairly applied.

Mr. Howard, whose headquarters is in Indianapolis, was in Washington the other day, and while here he called at my office to state that he had no objection to the proposed change. The installation of the new method of computing leave will have the merit of doing away with a lot of redtape and will assist the Public Printer in his efforts to make the largest printery in the world an up-to-date establishment, conducted on business principles.

That, I believe, concludes my presentation of the bill, and I thank you, ladies and gentlemen of the House, for your patience. [Applause.]

Mr. COLDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. COLDEN. On page 25 of the bill, under the title "Architect of the Capitol", the salaries are shown as $47,500, apparently for the Architect, the Assistant Architect, and other personal services at rates of pay provided by law. Will the gentleman explain what that includes besides the Architect and Assistant Architect?

Mr. LUDLOW. Well, it is the regular provision that has been carried in the bill for years.

Mr. COLDEN. Will the gentleman state what the salaries of the Architect and his assistant are? This does not break down the total amount appropriated for those salaries.

Mr. LUDLOW. The Architect's Office, I may say, has a very considerable personnel attached to it, and the detailed information in reference thereto I will be glad to furnish the gentleman under the 5-minute rule if the gentleman will renew his request at that time. The Architect's salary is $9,000 a year.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] 47 minutes.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, it has been repeatedly charged that the new deal was deliberately attempting to prolong the depression in order that the people, driven to desperation, might adopt the socialistic theories which have been persistently advanced by various new-deal spokesmen, and destroy our economic system and overthrow our present form of representative government. This charge has been denied in some quarters of the new deal, but the denial has by no means been unanimous nor, in many cases, very vehement.

Whether or not the charge is true, there can be no doubt of the fact that if it were true and the administration were attempting to wreck our present economic system and set up a socialistic form of government, its policies and practices would not materially differ from those which it has followed during the past 2 years.

The Roosevelt administration launched its so-called "recovery program" along four lines, three of which were unsound and uneconomic, foredoomed to failure because of their inherent defects. These three major new-deal policies were the Agricultural Adjustment Act, the National Industrial Recovery Act, in which was included the Public Works Administration, and the abandonment of the gold standard and the substitution of the commodity dollar.

The fourth policy called for the reduction of public expenditures and the honest balancing of the Budget. That was the one sound economic policy originally attempted by the new deal. Had it been pursued with a single purpose and constant courage, it would have brought us a long way toward actual recovery, but it was early scuttled by the President in favor of the "pump priming" theory of public economy. It was abandoned largely, if not solely, because it ran counter to the theories of those extravagant experimenters, whose influence has dominated the new deal from the day of its inauguration.

I discussed the failure of the Agricultural Adjustment Act a short time ago.

The second major new-deal policy was embodied in the National Industrial Recovery Act, which was enacted for the stated purpose of relieving unemployment, increasing wages and the purchasing power of the wage earner, fostering fair competition, which carried with it the promise of a fair deal to the small business man and manufacturer, and, under title II, which created the Public Works Administration, it provided for the construction of useful public works.

That program, which was to put private industry on its feet, idle wage earners back to work, and increase domestic markets for agricultural products, became operative August 1, 1933, under terms of the President's unemployment agreement which, according to the statements made at the time by the N. R. A., was signed by approximately 3,000,000 employers.

That policy has failed as completely and miserably as has the agricultural-adjustment program.

It has not increased employment in private industry. According to the reports on unemployment issued monthly by the American Federation of Labor, over 11,000,000 industrial wage earners are out of work, insofar as their employment by private industry is concerned. There are over a half a million less individuals on the pay rolls of private industry than on August 1, 1933, when the N. I. R. A. went into effect.

It has not increased real wages, according to the same authority. The average yearly income of industrial wage earners in 1934 was only $70 greater than during the year 1933. Meantime, the price of food has increased 34 percent and the price of clothing and household furnishings over 15 percent. Obviously, the average wage earner's living standards are of necessity lower now than they were when this new-deal experiment was inaugurated.

It has been charged in some quarters that employment and wage statistics issued by the American Federation of Labor are not reliable. However, the statistics issued by the United States Department of Commerce in its monthly publication known as the "Survey of Current Business" prove the accuracy of the figures issued by the American Federation of Labor. That publication shows the average weekly wage of factory employees in August 1933 was $19.25 and the average in December was $20.71, or an increase under the new deal and the N. R. A. of $1.46 a week in the average wages of industrial employees. This corresponds almost exactly on a yearly basis to the figures given by the American Federation of Labor, that the yearly wage for 1934 was only $70 greater than the yearly income of the industrial wage earner in 1933.

Moreover, other figures given in the monthly Survey of Current Business issued by the United States Department of Commerce, clearly prove that since the N. I. R. A. went into effect, industrial and business activities have suffered a decline. The following table contains data taken from the Survey of Current Business for the months indicated:

President Roosevelt, in his annual message to the Congress, January 4 of this year said:

The stark fact before us is that great numbers still remain unemployed. A large proportion of these unemployed and their dependents have been forced upon the relief rolls. The burden of the Federal Government has grown with great rapidity.

Those words, together with the figures furnished by the United States Department of Commerce, constitute the most devastating indictment of the so-called "recovery program" of the new deal that can possibly be made.

The figures in the above table show that between March and August 1933 there was consistent and continuous improvement in practically every field of private enterprise, and that this improvement was greater than has taken place in any similar period of American history. They show that following the reopening of the banks 10 days after Roosevelt's inauguration, industrial activity increased, industrial employment and wages increased, freight-car loadings increased, department-store sales increased, exports and imports increased. The complete tables furnished by the Government show this increase to have been without recession or intermission week after week from March 1933 to August 1933.

Prior to August 1933 none of the new deal's so-called "recovery measures" were in effect. The Agricultural Adjustment Act had been signed in the middle of May, but it was a revolutionary measure calling for the establishment of entirely new machinery to carry out its provisions. That machinery was not in operation until well toward the latter part of July. Therefore, any recovery in agricultural prices or the purchasing power of the farmer's dollar which took place prior to August 1933 cannot be credited either to the Agricultural Adjustment Act or any other legislation by the Democratic Congress or any act by the Democratic administration.

As stated above, the National Industrial Recovery Act became operative as of August 1. Therefore, none of the increase in industrial and business activity prior to August 1 can by any stretch of the imagination be attributed to the operations of that act.

In his special message to Congress of February 20, 1935, asking that the National Industrial Recovery Act be extended for 2 years, the President said:

The immediate objective (of the National Industrial Recovery Act) was to check the downward spiral of the great depression and it met this objective and started us on our forward path.

Now, in point of fact, that statement in the President's message was based on misinformation. There was no downward spiral at the time the Industrial Recovery Act was enacted. The spiral had been consistently upward ever since the President was inaugurated.

Moreover, and this is of the greatest importance, the Government's own figures as quoted above show that instantly the National Industrial Recovery Act became a law, the spiral of business and industry turned downward and has been downward ever since. Industrial production has never recovered the point it reached in July and August 1933, before the National Industrial Recovery Act became a law.

The textile industry was the first to submit a code and have it approved. On July 24, 1933, in one of his so-called "fireside talks", President Roosevelt called attention to the textile code and praised it as a model charter for industry, which would give labor improved working conditions and would bring prosperity to the textile industry. The Department of Commerce figures given above show that it had quite the opposite effect. In July 1933 the number of spindle-hours the textile industry operated was 8,128,000,000. It has never reached that point since. There has been a downward spiral of activity in the textile industry ever since the National Industrial Recovery Act became a law and the textile code became operative. In February 1935 the number of spindle-hours operated was over 1,553,000,000 less than in July 1933. If it be claimed that the cause of this is the different months of the year the following figures will prove very illuminating. In July 1933 the textile industry operated 8,128,000,000 spindle-hours. In July 1934 the same month but a year later, all of which year had been under the complete domination of the Textile Code, the textile industry operated 5,152,000,000 spindle-hours.

To show the failure of the N. I. R. A. insofar as it affects the textile industry, let another example be given. In July 1933 the textile industry consumed 600,641 bales of raw cotton. At no time since has that much raw cotton been consumed in any one month by the textile industry. The amount consumed in February 1935, the last month for which there are complete figures, was only 478,200 bales. In July 1934 there were only 359,951 bales consumed.

An infallible index of industrial activity is freight-car loadings. Freight-car loadings of merchandise, as distinguished from grain, livestock, ore, coal, and other unmanufactured commodities, were represented in July 1933 by the index number 70, in August by the index number 69. At no time since the National Industrial Recovery Act has been a law have the freight-car loadings of manufactured merchandise been as great as they were the month it became a law.

What is true of freight-car loadings of manufactured goods is also true of the loadings of all classes of freight. In August 1933 there were 625,700 car loadings of freight of all kinds. That peak has never been equaled since.

The National Recovery Act has not benefited our foreign trade. The report issued by the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce April 27 last, for the month of March and for the 3 months ending March 31, shows a decided swing against us in foreign-trade balances. Our exports decreased not only as compared with March 1934, but our exports for the first 3 months of this year decreased when compared with the first 3 months of 1934. On the other hand, our imports increased in March this year over March 1934; and for the 3 months ending March 31 this year, our imports increased over the corresponding months last year. The exact balance of trade is as follows:

For March this year our exports were in excess of our imports in the sum of $7,722,000, while March a year ago they were in excess of our imports in the amount of $32,785,000.

For the first 3 months of this year our favorable balance of trade was only $27,464,000, as against $99,275,000 for the first 3 months of 1934.

To put it another way, our exports for the first 3 months this year were $1,625,000 less than for the first 3 months last year, while our imports were $70,186,000 more.

While upon this subject, it might be argued that increase of imports indicates a return of industrial activity. That is true when the country is normal. Under those conditions the increase of imports consists largely of raw material or semimanufactured articles which enter into further fabrication by American industries. This is not true of the increase in imports this year over last. The increased imports this year are largely agricultural products, namely, meats, butter, vegetable oil, grain, foodstuffs, sugar, and manufactured articles, particularly textile goods.

Figures issued by the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce furnish some other interesting facts bearing upon the N. I. R. A. Our exports for March this year were $185,000,000. The N. I. R. A. went into effect August 1933. Our exports in September of that year were $160,000,000; in October, $193,000,000; November, $184,000,000; December, $193,000,000. In March a year ago they were $191,000,000. So that in point of fact the trend of exports has been downward since the N. I. R. A. went into effect.

The reverse is true of imports. In September 1933 they were $147,000,000; in October, $151,000,000; in November, $128,000,000; in December, $133,000,000. A year ago in March they were $158,000,000. In March this year they were $171,000,000.

There is no consolation in these figures to that school of thought which, at the time the N. R. A. was established, predicted it would result in the stimulation of American industry and a rapid expansion of American trade.

Department-store sales are not as great now as they were the month the National Industrial Recovery Act became a law.

In other words, every industrial index shows that, contrary to the statement of President Roosevelt in his special message asking for an extension of the National Industrial Recovery Act, that act has not checked the downward spiral of depression, but, to the contrary, has increased it and continued it.

As to the increase in unemployment, which the President in his annual message stated was a stark fact, irrefutable figures show there is more unemployment today than there was when the National Industrial Recovery Act became operative. Even the President admitted that fact in his special message, in the following words:

It is now clear that in the spring and summer of 1933 many estimates of unemployment in the United States were far too low, and we are therefore apt to forget that the National Industrial Recovery Act was the biggest factor in giving reemployment to approximately 4,000,000 people.

In other words, in a futile endeavor to explain away the vast millions of unemployed today the President charges that the Government's estimates of unemployment in 1933 were too low. But there is no reason to assume that the President's guess today is any better than his guess in 1933.

The administration guessed at the number of unemployed in 1933 and is still guessing at it. The President states the National Industrial Recovery Act gave reemployment to approximately 4,000,000 people. On March 4 last Secretary of Labor Perkins stated that since March 1933, 2,550,000 have been put back to work in private industry. General Johnson on the same date, in a radio address, stated that 3,000,000 had been put back to work. How are you going to reconcile these various statements?

In one of his fireside talks over a radio network October 22, 1933, the President stated that there had been approximately 10,000,000 unemployed in March of that year. He stated that the new-deal policy had put 4,000,000 back to work as of that date, which would have left only 6,000,000 unemployed in October 1933. But the President stated February 20, 1935, that there were still only 4,000,000 people back to work by reason of the National Industrial Recovery Act. So by his two statements he admits there has been no gain made in the way of reemployment since October 1933.

Again, Mr. Richberg, in his report to the President September 7, 1934, stated that 4,000,000 had been given reemployment in private enterprise during the previous year and 4,000,000 more had been given employment on public enterprises, making a total of 8,000,000 who had been put back to work under the new deal. Taking the President's figures as of October 1933, that 10,000,000 were unemployed when the new deal came into power, that would then have left only 2,000,000 unemployed at present, according to Mr. Richberg.

In other words, it is impossible to reconcile any of the figures of any two members of the President's Cabinet or his official family, or to reconcile any of their figures with the President's figures. The reason for this is set forth by Gen. Hugh Johnson in a statement appearing under his signature March 15. In that statement he said:

We have some millions of men out of work. We have talked about the number being 10,000,000. There isn't anybody in the United States who knows whether that figure is within gunshot of the facts. This moves me to say that the outstanding feature of this depression is our almost complete ignorance of it. We are disbursing millions of dollars to take care of the unemployed and their families, and yet we have not the simplest fact regarding it. . . . We do not know—but it ought to be our business to find out—just exactly how many of our people are out of jobs. Of course, this raises in the minds of most people an idea of months of preparation and the expenditure of more millions to count the unemployed. That is a piece of nonsense.

During the war, when we were putting over the draft, we needed an accurate census of man power. We took two censuses, registering 40,000,000 men of arms-bearing age. Each of these two censuses took just 24 hours to accomplish, and the cost in each case (except for printed matter) was about $50,000. The same process would give us a real chart of the unemployment situation.

In other words, the new deal, which is supposed to be the last word in economic planning, has, after 2 years of administration, the major problem of which was dealing with unemployment, no accurate knowledge of the number of unemployed and no system whereby such knowledge can be obtained.

The public must rely, as it does, upon the American Federation of Labor and other statistical organizations for its information in this regard.

But the public does not have to rely upon private organizations for information regarding the number of individuals on public relief. There are over 20,000,000. The President stated it accurately in his annual message that "the burden of the Federal Government has grown with great rapidity." Federal expenditures for public relief show an increase of over 200 percent since July 1933—the month before the so-called "recovery program" was set in motion. There are between 5,000,000 and 6,000,000 more individuals on public relief rolls than there were in July 1933, the month before the so-called "recovery program" was set in motion.

As the President stated in his annual message, this is a "stark fact." However, the tragedy of it is that it was so unnecessary. Had this administration not attempted foolishly to fly in the face of economic laws and discarded sound policies in order to set up a haphazard system of experimentation, we would not now be compelled to admit that, insofar as material recovery is concerned, the rank and file of the American people are in far worse shape than they were when the new deal began its experiments.

That private industry in this country has failed to recover to the degree expected during the last year is largely due to the fact that it is no longer master in its own house.

The N. R. A. has developed into a machine of industrial disorganization and confusion, despite the fact that it was offered to industry as merely "a voluntary program to fight depression" which would give industry "an opportunity of democratic self-discipline."

The Government seeks to take away from the management of private industry control over the wages and hours of labor, the production, distribution, and prices of the products, and the issuance of new securities. Manufacturers are prohibited the right to improve their plants by the replacement of obsolete machinery with modern equipment. New plants or extensions of old ones may not be built without the Government's consent. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is directed to withhold financial credit from any manufacturer who does not bow to the dictates of the N. R. A.

To add to the irony of the claim that the N. R. A. was set up to promote industrial self-government, when an industry or group of industries, acting in good faith, accept a code, they find in it a proviso that the President may, without notice or hearing, or assignment even of a cause, cancel or modify any or all of the provisions of the code. Furthermore, this has been consistently done, to the injury and sometimes to the ruin of those affected by the change. In other words, the sanctity of contractual rights and agreements has no place whatever in the administration of this organization improvised by the new deal in the pretense that it was to aid industry in its fight to recover from the depression.

Furthermore, during the recent arguments of the Oil Code before the United States Supreme Court, it developed the Government had indicted and prosecuted individuals for violations of Executive orders which had never been promulgated and which, of course, those so prosecuted had never heard of.

Following the caustic criticism of this episode from the bench of the Supreme Court, it developed that since the N. R. A. was established it has issued 10,269 Executive orders, ostensibly by the authority of the President of the United States—orders which had the full force and effect of law, their violation being a criminal offense punishable in the Federal courts. It further developed that hundreds of these orders the President never read. They were never printed and circulated among the individuals or the industry to which they were directed. In a great many cases, copies of these orders were not even filed with the proper officials of the Federal Government.

How could industry recover under such conditions? How could a manufacturer or business man plan for the future, arrange to expand his activities, and add to his pay roll and expenses when he had no voice in the management of his own enterprise, and when he might be laying himself liable to criminal prosecution for violation of orders affecting his industry or business, copies of which had never been furnished him by the administration issuing them, and the very existence of which he had no knowledge?

A striking example of how the policies of the new deal are operating to prevent recovery is furnished by the durable-goods industries. A survey of the durable- or heavy-goods industries conducted by the Machinery and Allied Products Institute was completed in February and the findings published February 27, 1935. Those findings were:

First. A pent-up demand for machinery, accumulated during the depression years since 1929, amounting to an indicated total of $18,574,000,000.

Second. A prospective pay roll to labor employed in the manufacture of these machinery requirements amounting to approximately $12,073,600,000.

Third. A prospective total of 20,123,000,000 man-hours of labor in producing the machinery required to meet the accumulated requirements.

Fourth. Potential employment for 2 years of a force equal to 4,000,000 workmen—more than four times the present number of workmen in the machinery industries—a several-year task for machinery plant capacity to handle—in the production of machinery needed to meet the accumulated demand.

What is holding up the durable-goods industries? A committee representing those industries was selected March 7, 1934, at the request of General Johnson, Director of the N. R. A., for the purpose of making an investigation and a report regarding the situation in the durable-goods industry. That committee made its report as of May 14, 1934. Here are some of the things it stated:

Business cannot make long-range plans without assurance that our monetary policies will not be subject to sudden and arbitrary changes. Such changes destroy confidence and work against economic recovery. * * * A stabilized dollar is needed in order that business may again plan for the future.

Here is another one of its conclusions:

Government can do no one thing as important as to encourage a wide-spread public confidence by exhibiting its own firm faith in recovery and by refusing to countenance measures that are inconsistent with our existing economic system.

And here is another of its conclusions:

Measures for coercive Government control of industry are inconsistent with American principles, and such measures can have no other effect than to kill confidence and indefinitely delay recovery.

In another statement issued by this committee, under date of April 12, 1934, and addressed to the N. R. A. code authorities and code committees, it pointed out that in the durable-goods industries, directly and indirectly, there were then 5,000,000 unemployed, and that the first requirement "for even partial recovery in these industries" is "the restoration of confidence in the Government's future policies."

In that same statement the committee said:

The conclusion is clear that we are gradually enforcing the nationalization of productive wealth. Increasing amounts of Government money in productive enterprises must inevitably result in an increasing degree of direction, regulation control, and operation by Federal agencies.

The new-deal administration has continually appointed commissions to investigate and advise, but up to the present moment it has never followed that advice.

Industry testifies the failure of the so-called "recovery program" is due to the fact it has destroyed confidence among those who would employ 4,000,000 men now idle, that it has destroyed this confidence by giving support to measures that are inconsistent with our existing economic system, and that these elements are foreign and obnoxious to the American individual.

Perhaps the most damaging feature of the N. R. A. has been its creation of monopolies, which have operated to drive the small business man and small manufacturer out of business. Instead of "fostering fair competition" it has not only fostered but compelled unfair competition, whereby the big fellow was permitted to eat the little fellow up. The last report of income-tax returns substantiates this statement. It showed that during the year ending June 30, last, 11 months of which the N. I. R. A. was operative, the number of individuals having incomes in excess of $1,000,000 more than doubled, while the number of individuals with incomes between $5,000 and $25,000, obviously embracing the small business man and manufacturer, declined over 101,000.

During the first year of the National Industrial Recovery Act, General Johnson upon two occasions made the statement in the course of public speeches that if the small manufacturer or small business man could not operate profitably under the codes, they would have to go out of business. Only a few days ago—early in March of this year—in the course of his testimony before the Senate Finance Committee investigating the operations of the National Industrial Recovery Administration, Mr. Clay Williams, chairman of the executive board of that Administration, frankly stated that if the National Industrial Recovery Act was to be effective, it would undoubtedly drive out of existence the small business and the small industry.

In view of these two facts, there can be no successful challenge of the assertion that this major policy of the new deal has operated to the economic death of hundreds of small business and industrial concerns, bankrupted their owners, and driven their employees onto the streets into the ranks of the idle and, most likely, into the bread lines and on the public relief rolls.

Title II of the National Industrial Recovery Act provided for the Public Works Administration and made a specific appropriation of $3,300,000,000 to carry on its work.

President Roosevelt, in asking for this set-up in a special message to Congress May 17, 1933, stated:

A careful survey convinces me that approximately $3,300,000,000 can be invested in useful and necessary public construction and at the same time put the largest possible number of people to work.

At the time the President signed the National Recovery Act, June 16, 1933, he predicted that by the 1st of October that year 1,000,000 men would have been given jobs because of the Public Works projects. October 1, 1933, found less than one-fourth of that number at work on P. W. A. projects.

By November 1933 the President realized that the "careful" survey, to which he referred in his special message to Congress in May had evidently not been as careful as he had indicated. On November 15 he made a public admission of the failure of the P. W. A. in the following language:

We might as well be perfectly frank. It has been exceedingly difficult honestly to allot the entire sum of $3,300,000,000 to worthwhile projects.

That was the occasion of the launching of the C. W. A., a step taken in order to distract public attention from the fact that both the N. R. A. and P. W. A. had failed to make more than a mere dent in the ranks of the unemployed.

The C. W. A. embodied none of the virtues and magnified all of the shortcomings of the P. W. A. It was a makeshift at the best. It was a cesspool of political graft and favoritism, by the public admission of its own Director. It not only failed to prime the pump of economic recovery, but, in the words of President Roosevelt himself in his last annual message to Congress, January 4, 1935, its program of furnishing "a few hours of weekly work cutting grass, raking leaves, or picking papers out in the public parks" destroyed the self-respect, the self-reliance, the courage, and the determination of those who were on its rolls. Outraged public opinion, voiced in practically every State of the Union, compelled the administration to abandon that agency, after it had expended over $800,000,000 of the taxpayers' money in less than 5 months.

As for the P. W. A., it has been the greatest failure of any permanent agency set up by the new deal. It is impossible to tell how many men have been given work at any given time under its agency, because the Public Works Administration has studiously avoided making any statement of a specific and definite character as to the number of men furnished employment on the projects financed by it.

Instead of being what President Roosevelt promised "a bridge by which people can pass from relief status over to normal self-support", the P. W. A. in reality has constituted the greatest existing obstacle to industrial recovery. It has, under the laws of Delaware, set up a series of corporations, financed with Government funds, for the sole and express purpose of invading practically every field of private enterprise as competitor to legitimate and honestly conducted industry and business. Nothing has exercised such a malign influence against the revival of industrial activity and the placing of idle men upon the pay rolls of private industry as these activities.

Moreover, despite the high assurances of the President when this emergency agency was initiated that in its allocations of public funds there would not be the "smell of the 'pork barrel'", no agency in the Government has been so influenced by political motives and allocated and disbursed public funds from so partisan a standpoint, without regard to the value or need of the projects financed, as has the P. W. A.

Despite this and in the face of the President's candid admission that it was exceedingly difficult "honestly" to find worth-while projects upon which to spend $3,000,000,000, it is now proposed to continue the Public Works program and finance it by an additional appropriation of $4,000,000,000, made in a lump sum, without any restrictions as to the manner of its expenditure.

A "managed currency" or a "commodity dollar" is the third major experiment of the new-deal recovery program. The objective of the policy is to raise the general price level to the level of 1926.

The announcement of this policy, contained in President Roosevelt's cable message to the London Conference, July 3, came as a surprise and a shock to the United States and to the world.

In his fireside talk of October 22, 1933, the President stated "managed currency" was to be a fixed policy of this administration until the restoration of the price level of 1926. He stated the administration would not attempt any stabilization or permanent revaluation of the dollar until after the restoration of the price level of 1926.

In his last annual Budget message, January 7 this year, the President shows how far short of accomplishment has fallen his "managed currency" policy. In that message he stated that the price level at the close of the last fiscal year stood at 74.8 percent of its 1926 average, as compared with 66.3 percent on June 30, 1933, when the "commodity dollar" policy was announced.

Eighteen months of tinkering with the value of the dollar in order to restore the 1926 commodity price level has resulted in an increase of 8 points in that level, with 25 points yet to go.

The fourth major policy of the new-deal recovery program, as announced early in his administration by the President, was rigid public economy, honest balancing of the Budget by reducing Federal expenditures to a point where the income of the Government would be sufficient to cover all expenditures of the Government.

ROOSEVELT'S PRINCIPAL CAMPAIGN PLEDGE REPUDIATED AND THE POLICY OF PUBLIC ECONOMY ABANDONED BY THE NEW DEAL

In his Pittsburgh, Pa., speech of October 19, 1932, as well as in numerous other campaign speeches, Governor Roosevelt stated the most important issue of the campaign was that of public economy. In a special message to Congress, March 10, 1933, the day after it was convened in special session, President Roosevelt emphatically stated that the then existing deficit of $5,000,000,000, which had been accumulated over a period of 4 years, had been the largest contributing factor to the collapse of the banking structure of the Nation, the stagnation of the economic life of our people, and industrial depression and unemployment. He asserted it was a threat to the credit of the United States Government, which, in turn, threatened credit of all private business and the security of all investments, such as savings and insurance policies. He asserted national recovery depended upon ending the practice of creating deficits and the borrowing of more money in order to meet the expenditures of the Government.

The President pledged himself, his administration, and the Democratic Congress to a program of rigid economy and a reversal of what he styled the "loose fiscal policy" of creating Federal deficits and continued Government borrowings.

The pledge was broken almost with its making. That session of Congress appropriated more money than any other peace-time Congress in the history of the United States up to that time. (Note: The present session of Congress already has broken all previous records, and administration bills calling for billions more are yet to be passed.) It did this at the President's request, often in bills written in the executive offices of the Government and sent to Congress with the mandate that they be passed as written, without change.

Nevertheless, the President in his first annual Budget message, January 1934, while admitting the Federal expenditures were beyond all precedent except in period of war, asserted that the Government had come to the turn in the road and from then on there would be a diminution of expenditures, so that by the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, there would be a balanced Budget.

That session of Congress broke the record of the previous session in the matter of appropriations. All told, both sessions of that Congress made specific appropriations in the aggregate sum of $22,000,000,000 to cover definite expenditures authorized by the Congress. In addition, it placed at the disposal of the Roosevelt administration Government credit in excess of $7,700,000,000, to be drawn on by the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, the Farm Mortgage Corporation, the Federal Housing Administration, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and other Government agencies.

In his Budget message sent to Congress January 7 this year the President abandoned all pretense of economy, asked for greater appropriations than he asked a year ago, gave up all hope of fixing any date as to when the Budget may be balanced, and contented himself with the statement that the strain upon the Government credit by reason of the unprecedented expenditures of the new deal during the last 18 months had not yet reached the breaking point. This was a fine assurance for the American people.

Just when will the breaking point be reached? The experience of every nation which has during any period indulged in riotous expenditures and costly experiments, violated the practices of public economy, and flouted the fundamental fact that a nation, no more than an individual, can continually spend more than it earns and remain solvent warns us that we are within sight of the breaking point of our national credit.

The failure of our national credit now would mean greater disaster than at any other time in our history due to the fact that the policies of the new deal have compelled our banks to finance the Government. Over 50 percent of the so-called "assets" of our national banks consist of Government securities. If those securities, due to the riotous expenditure of this administration, become questionable, if their marketable value should decline as much as 10 to 15 points, it would mean bankruptcy for our national banking system, with the incredible loss of their deposits and savings to the American people.

Nothing is to be gained by concealing the facts. In the 2 years of the new deal the interest-bearing public debt of this Nation has been increased over $9,500,000,000. Of that amount $7,384,732,000 is evidenced by loans made directly by the United States Treasury, while $3,345,509,250 is evidenced by bonds issued by the Farm Mortgage Corporation and the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, the payment of the principal of which is guaranteed by the Government, which, at the same time, is now meeting the interest. This figure is carried in the United States Treasury statement of March 30, 1935, under the caption "Liabilities—obligations guaranteed by the United States"—Farm Mortgage Corporation—$1,089,410,100; H. O. L. C., $2,256,099,150.

The report of the United States Treasury as of March 30, 1935, shows that for the first 9 months of the current fiscal year our public debt charges, consisting of increased interest and sinking-fund allocation, was $207,244,370 greater than it was for the corresponding period of the last fiscal year.

The routine expenditures of the Government, classified in the United States Treasury statement as "general expenditures", were on March 30 last $461,254,299 in excess of the routine operating expenses of the Government for a like period in the previous fiscal year. At this rate—and it is safe to say it will be increased between now and June 30—even the ordinary or routine operating expenses of the Government this fiscal year will be over $600,000,000 greater than last year.

On February 28, 1933, there were upon the pay rolls of the Federal Government 563,487 civilian employees, classified and unclassified. This does not include any of the enlisted men and commissioned or noncommissioned officers of the military and naval service. February 28, 1935, after 2 years of the new deal, there were upon the pay rolls of the Federal Government 680,546 civilian employees, an increase of 117,059, or over 20 percent. This shows how the present administration is economizing.

The bulk of this increase is accounted for by the creation of over 60 different alphabetical set-ups, to carry out the experiments of the new deal. In every instance where Congress authorized the establishment of emergency set-ups, it was specifically stated that all employees in those set-ups might be selected without regard to the rules of Civil Service. In other words, the increase of over 100,000 individuals on the Federal pay rolls represents the amount of political patronage in that field which has been created by the new deal. The increase in the annual Federal pay roll alone, by reason of this increase in Democratic patronage, amounts to about $250,000,000 a year.

Since June 1, 1933, the new deal has expended $6,500,000,000 for emergency purposes to finance its so-called "recovery program."

It has, within that period, accumulated a deficit of $6,300,721,000. It has pushed our public debt above the $30,000,000,000 mark. It has obtained an additional $5,000,000,000 for emergency purposes, which will be added to the deficit, making it over $11,000,000,000, and will eventually be added to the interest-bearing public debt, making it in excess of $36,000,000,000.

The new deal, from July 1, 1933, up to the present minute, has been expending $2 for every $1 it collected.

Yet, with all of this vast expenditure of money, it has not brought recovery. It has not relieved unemployment. It has not decreased the number of individuals on public relief. It has not increased our foreign trade. It has not reduced the mortgage indebtedness of our agricultural classes. It has not raised the wages of our industrial employees. In fact, at this very time, after 2 years of uninterrupted rule in which the President has had his own way about every thing and has been permitted to indulge in every experiment that occurred to him, expending on public relief the incredible amount of $58 a second, $3,400 every minute, $208,000 every hour, or $5,000,000 a day, the administration admits that even this incredible sum is insufficient to meet the relief needs and has asked for $5,000,000,000 more.

Briefly, then, the net result of the new deal, after 2 years, is an increase of $9,000,000,000 in our public debt, over $200,000,000 in debt charges every year, over $6,000,000,000 in our deficit, all of which must be added either in the immediate future to the burdens of our taxpayers, either directly or indirectly in the form of increased costs of living, or in national bankruptcy.

There has been an increase of over 60 Federal agencies, all of them clothed with dictatorial and extraordinary power, all of them exempt from the provisions of civil service, which has added 117,000 individuals to the Federal pay roll at an increase of $250,000,000 a year in the Federal pay roll.

In addition, the new deal has driven hundreds of small, honest business and industrial concerns into bankruptcy and their employees into the ranks of the idle. It has decreased the number of wage earners in private industry. It has lost our foreign markets, and it has increased by at least 6,000,000 the number of individuals who have become objects of public charity and depend upon some form of public relief for their food, clothing, and shelter.

These are some more stark facts showing the results of the new-deal experiments for the last 2 years, and I hope you will give them the thought and consideration to which their importance entitles them. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ARNOLD].

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Chairman, I did not take the floor at this time to answer the very carefully prepared and well-read statistical speech of my good friend from New York, but before saying what I had intended to say in connection with the bill before us I want to spend a few moments, in a general way, on the speech of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL].

I presume, coming from the source it does, this is the opening shot in the 1936 campaign. I listened with a great deal of interest to the speech. I thought perhaps somewhere the gentleman from New York would give us some constructive suggestions about the evils he says are being perpetrated and perpetuated upon the American people by the present administration, but not a single, solitary constructive suggestion was made by the gentleman in his labored speech.

Now, what is the situation? Let us see for just a moment. When the gentleman's party was in power, during the last 2 years of that administration, the Government in its ordinary expenses was going in the red at the rate of $2,000,000,000 a year, and they were meeting this deficiency by issuing bonds to take care of it. Business was on a downward spiral; bankruptcies mounting daily. The Government was going in the red day after day, and inevitable calamity was in the offing. The banks throughout the country were failing, hundreds already had closed their doors, and failures were spreading like wildfire. In a very short time, had it not been for the strenuous and aggressive action of the present Chief Executive of the United States, within a short time there would not have been a bank open in this country, and chaos and demoralization would have been the result, not only in business but in government itself. We were going headlong over the precipice. Resolute action was taken by the gentleman who now occupies the White House. His courageous action averted a general catastrophe. He came in at a time, perhaps, the most trying in peace times in the Nation's history. This old ship of state of ours was righted, he brought it out of its nose dive, business was started on the upgrade, the financial integrity of the Government itself was saved, and a calamity was averted. [Applause.]

Now, you would think that the distinguished gentleman from New York, representing his party, as he does, in this House, would have given us some constructive suggestions, but nothing but criticism is to be found in his speech from beginning to end, so far as I was able to get it.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ARNOLD. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SNELL. I gave you credit as long as you followed an economic program and say that things in this country were better, but when you put the N. R. A. into effect, then things began to go the other way; and I also said in my statement that if you had followed the original program of industry and economy in Budget expenditures, you would have come out a great deal better than you have. I think it is constructive when you tell the administration the things it has done that ought not to have been done that have caused us all this trouble.

Mr. ARNOLD. And that suggestion of the gentleman brings us right back to the program that was pursued under the Hoover administration, the do-nothing policy, which brought us to the brink of destruction.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. ARNOLD. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. Your own President said that the reason we were in that trouble was on account of the $5,000,000,000 deficit in the past 4 years and also stated that the loose fiscal policies of the last administration had caused the trouble. If we were in trouble with a $5,000,000,000 deficit, how much more trouble are we in with a deficit of $9,000,000,000 in 2 years? If the gentleman would answer that I would be pleased to have him do it.

Mr. ARNOLD. Let me say to the gentleman that we cannot follow the same policies that were followed and put this Government in the hole at the rate of $2,000,000,000 a year under the Hoover administration, with the purpose of bringing our people out on the highway of prosperity and preserving the financial stability to the Federal Government.

Mr. SNELL. But you are following something worse when you go $5,000,000,000 in the hole per year.

Mr. ARNOLD. May I say to the gentleman that so far as the ordinary expenses of Government are concerned this administration has balanced the Budget.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. ARNOLD. In just a moment.

Of course, the gentleman's party brought us into such an unfortunate condition in this country that it did become necessary to provide certain recovery and relief measures which cost money and these recovery and relief measures, of course, are costing a lot of money. May I say to my good friend from New York that these recovery and relief measures which have added to the charge on the Government Treasury were necessitated by conditions for which the Democratic Party is in no way responsible. These measures have preserved the financial stability of this Government of ours, and in the end will preserve the financial stability of the industrial interests of this country.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ARNOLD. I yield to my colleague from Illinois.

Mr. PARSONS. And the gentleman also knows that the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] voted for most of those measures.

Mr. SNELL. Oh, no; do not put that in the Record. The gentleman from New York did not vote for them and please take that out of the Record.

Mr. ARNOLD. May I say that if the gentleman from New York did not vote for most of them, a great many of those on his side did vote for them because of their merits and did not follow his leadership on that score. I do not know how the gentleman from New York voted on those matters and I am not making such charges, the gentleman understands.

Mr. SNELL. But please put in the Record the fact that the gentleman from New York did not vote for a majority of them and does not intend to do so in the future.

Mr. ARNOLD. I do not know how the gentleman voted on those matters. I did not inject that matter into my discussion.

Mr. SNELL. I appreciate that, but I wanted the Record to be clear about it.

Mr. MORITZ. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ARNOLD. I yield.

Mr. MORITZ. The distinguished gentleman from New York, the leader of the minority, spoke about so many commissions. Did he forget how President Hoover had the foolish and wasteful Wickersham Commission established that cost one-half million dollars and did no good at all?

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. ARNOLD. In just a moment. I am not yielding for all this discussion, and may I say that the memory of the gentleman from New York on these matters is rather short, indeed; but it was not my purpose when I took the floor, as I stated in the beginning, to answer the labored and thoughtful and statistical address of our good friend from New York.

But, preceding what I wanted to say, I wished to drop a few suggestions in answer to the gentleman from New York. May I say to my good friend from New York, and to those who represent his party in this House, that if you expect to get any place in the 1936 campaign you will have to change your policy; you will have to go to the American people and tell them what you would have done under these circumstances. [Applause.] You cannot get by by going to the American people on a program of criticism alone. That will not save you.

Mr. COLDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ARNOLD. I yield.

Mr. COLDEN. Is it not a fact that the large deficit in the Hoover administration was due to the great expenses of the Government—largely not on a program of recovery?

Mr. ARNOLD. It was the ordinary expenses of the Government, not a recovery program, which put us $2,000,000,000 in the red under the Hoover administration.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ARNOLD. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. I want to say that under the last administration we fought and tried to have it exercise influences for relief of suffering and distress. The difference between the last administration and the present administration is that this administration has been devoted to the welfare of the people as a whole and not to some vested interests.

Mr. ARNOLD. The gentleman is right about it. I presume the gentleman from New York would have made no effort to relieve distress and suffering throughout the country. This administration has undertaken to put into operation these things to relieve distress and suffering of all the people throughout the country.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman is very unfair in making any such statement, when he says we never did anything for relief. Mr. Hoover made more definite recommendations along those lines but the Democratic-controlled Congress threw every one of them out of the window; they would not let him have a single one. Furthermore, the relief program, the home owners' bill and the R. F. C.—the three best parts of your program—every one of them were suggested originally by Herbert Hoover. [Applause.]

Mr. ARNOLD. Did the gentleman from New York in his prepared speech say anything whatever in regard to the relief program that he now commends?

Mr. SNELL. I was not discussing the relief situation, I was discussing the result of the N. R. A., and the figures I gave were all taken from President Roosevelt's speeches and the men representing the administration.

Mr. ARNOLD. The gentleman was discussing other features, and in not a single instance did he refer to the unfortunate plight of the American people and offer any suggestion for their relief. Gentlemen, I did not rise to make a political speech or to answer my good friend from New York. What I wanted to do was to say a little about one provision in this bill, and with your permission I will now do so.

It has occurred to me that one of the things that could be of great assistance to the Members of the House in our multitudinous duties would be to have some agency here in the Government that would make a short analysis and study of public bills and resolutions that are introduced in the House and are reported from the committees and have that information available to each and every Member of the House and the Senate. I am very glad to know that the Committee on Appropriations is carrying in this bill $10,000 to enable the legislative reference bureau of the Library of Congress to put some men at work who are especially skilled and equipped for that kind of work, to make an analysis of these public bills when introduced and in greater detail when reported from the committees.

Constituents write us inquiring about certain bills. We have to send to the document room to get the bills and spend probably an hour or two hours in studying it to get the substance of it before we can answer the letter. If these bills are taken up and a very short analysis or digest furnished us when they are introduced—and it is not necessary that they should go into details—and we are told in an informative way the substance of the bills, it would save the Members of Congress an enormous amount of work and time that could be better spent on our legislative duties on bills up for consideration on the floor of the House.

The legislative counsel was suggested to do this work and the Subcommittee on Appropriations decided that the best place would be in the legislative reference bureau of the Library of Congress. They have skilled employees there engaged in similar work in making a digest of all the laws of the various legislatures throughout the Nation. No additional legislation is necessary, but an increase of appropriation is necessary to enable them to employ some additional help to carry this on, and I cannot conceive of anything that would be more beneficial to the Members of the House and the Members of the Senate than to have laid down on our desks probably once a week a printed summary or digest of the various bills that have been introduced in the House. My idea is to have a digest of the public bills and resolutions introduced, showing by whom introduced, the date they are introduced, and the committee to which they have been referred. When a committee reports a bill out the legislative reference bureau will go into greater detail in an informative way and make a digest of the bill so that we, as Members of Congress, will have the whole matter before us.

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ARNOLD. Yes.

Mr. BOYLAN. I might say to the gentleman that in the State of New York we have published for the benefit of the legislature a publication known as the "Legislative Index." This index covers the suggestions of the gentleman. It gives the number of the bills in numerical sequence, the name of the introducer, the date introduced, the title, and in a paragraph something about the bill. If we had something similar to that here it would be very helpful.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. ARNOLD. That is true. I think probably in most of the States they have similar services. They also have in my State. There are something like 9,000 or 10,000 bills introduced in each Congress. Probably a third of those bills are public bills and resolutions. Of course, we are not interested particularly in an analysis of private bills. What we want are those public bills that affect us all alike, and affect the country generally. There will be something like 3,000 public bills and resolutions that will have to be digested. This is more or less of an experiment. I cannot conceive of anything that would be more advantageous to us and a greater time saver and give us a better insight into pending bills than some plan of this kind.

Many of our constituents expect us to know when a bill is introduced in the House just what that bill is. They learn of these bills through their trade journals and through their newspapers and write us about them. With the enormous number of bills that are introduced it is, of course, absolutely impossible for Members of Congress to be informed or to take their time personally to read those bills and analyze them. If we could have some central agency to do this work for us in an informative way it will add very materially to our efficiency and will be a great time saver.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ARNOLD. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. It would be fine if we could absolutely depend on the accuracy of the syllabus, but I have received many letters from my constituents, for instance, condemning the holding-company bill. Then when I would send them a copy of the bill, together with the President's message on it, they would write me back and tell me that they had had a very erroneous impression of the bill when they first wrote me. Much would depend upon the accuracy of the syllabus furnished with each bill.

Mr. ARNOLD. The gentleman knows that one cannot depend on the accuracy of a syllabus or digest; it is not intended to be absolutely accurate; one cannot depend upon the syllabus of an opinion in the reported cases, but it does give general information about the substance of the case. When there have been hearings on a bill a study can be made of the hearings; and if the bill has been considered by a committee and reported out favorably, a further study made of the report.

One of the most difficult things, it seems to me, in starting now is the vast number of bills already introduced. The appropriation will not become available until the 1st of July. I presume by that time Congress will have adjourned. The next session of Congress will be the second session of the Seventy-fourth Congress, with all the bills introduced this session still pending. I do not know how far those who would be charged with the duty of making the digests can get during the summer months in making an analysis of the bills that have already been introduced. Many of the bills, of course, are duplicates. For instance, different Members will introduce identical bills, and in a great many cases the same bill will be introduced both in the Senate and in the House. It is not necessary to make a separate analysis of the duplicate bills; reference can be made to the similar bill which was digested. When a bill is reported out by a committee, the legislative reference bureau of the Library of Congress should go into greater details and perhaps analyze the bill by sections or by titles, so that we can have fuller and more accurate information than we have of the bill as it was first digested.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ARNOLD. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. Until a bill is reported, it does not become very important or dangerous. Would it not be better, in order not to waste time, that no digest be made until the bill has been reported by a committee?

Mr. ARNOLD. I do not think so for the reason that, as I stated a moment ago, our constituents frequently are advised of these bills through their trade journals and their newspapers, will write to us and want to know what the bill contains. At the present time we have to come over here to the document room, get a copy of the bill and study it ourselves before we can reply. I think it would prove to be a valuable time saver to have a short summary made of these public bills and resolutions as they are introduced. Then we can begin to see how it will work and can change and revise the plan as the Membership of the House may wish.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ARNOLD. I yield.

Mr. LUDLOW. I think the gentleman from Illinois has made a very valuable suggestion, one that would prove especially valuable in the case of those measures in which there is wide-spread national interest. I am wondering if the gentleman has investigated the possibility of extending this service to individuals and chambers of commerce who may be interested in pending legislation and who would be willing to pay for this digest service if we made it available in a form whereby it could be furnished for a consideration to people who want the information and who are willing to pay for it?

Mr. ARNOLD. That matter was suggested. Some think it will be a very valuable source of information to the public generally, and if a proper charge is made for this service that is furnished to private individuals, private concerns, and chambers of commerce it will be more than self-sustaining. I know there are private agencies here in Washington whose sole duty it is to keep tab on legislation of a certain kind and report to their subscribers. Some of these agencies charge as high as $150 to $200 a year for a service of this kind.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH].

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, I would like to address my first remarks to the Chairman of the Subcommittee on Appropriations, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW]. On page 5 of the report the statement is made in the last paragraph:

A decrease of $43,000 is reflected in the amounts granted to the Committee on Revision of the Laws due to a special nonrecurring appropriation for revision of the United States Code and temporary personnel in connection with the work of the committee.

May I ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW] if he can give the House some information as to the amount of money that has already been expended in the revision of the Code up to this time?

Mr. LUDLOW. I may say to the gentleman that my attention was diverted when he first asked his question, and I did not catch all of it.

Mr. RICH. I call the attention of the gentleman to the decrease of $43,000 as reflected in the amount asked for in previous years for the revision of the United States Code. I would like to know from the gentleman what the total amount of the expenditures by the Congress has been up to this time for the revision of the United States Code?

Mr. LUDLOW. I do not have that information before me, but I have sent for it and will furnish it to the gentleman later.

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman secure this information and give it to me so that I may present it as a part of the record?

Mr. LUDLOW. I will have it in a few minutes.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, I call the Members' attention to the fact that we are going to soon consider H. R. 7347, presented by the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR], for the publication of the new House Code. Section 4 of this bill reads as follows:

SEC. 4. That such sum as may be deemed adequate is hereby authorized to be appropriated to provide reimbursement for expenses incurred and to make payment for services rendered in connection with the publication of the precedents.

Mr. Chairman, I have tried quite diligently to find out from the House Committee on Printing what the cost of printing of that code is going to be, and I have learned the amount so far as the Printing Office is concerned. Then I have endeavored to find out what the amount will be in reference to the act authorizing a revision of these codes, but no one seems to be able to give me the figure or no one seems to know anything definitely in reference to this cost. I am told the amount will have to be determined later by the Speaker of the House and the majority and minority leaders. I have gone to them and asked if they know what the amount would be, and they told me they did not care to assume the responsibility for determining what amount of money shall be paid for this work.

Mr. Chairman, I am not here to try to delve into anybody's business, but I cannot give my approval to the authorization of a sum of money to be paid out by this Congress for the printing of any document unless I know something about the cost, because, as a matter of business, when a man authorizes a certain thing to be transacted he ought to know about what it is going to cost. I have always tried to inculcate that thought in my business, and I believe it is my duty to inculcate the same thought in the work in which I am interested here so far as this Congress is concerned.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I yield to my friend the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. I may say to my friend the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania that the rules and precedents of the House, as he knows, are to the Congressman just what the saw and hammer are to a carpenter. They are his working tools. Without them we could not proceed here at all.

I consider our good friend and colleague the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] one of the most valuable and able men of this House. He has been here in this Chamber altogether about 23 years in and about the business of the House. The complete publication of Hinds' Precedents brought up to date in a number of big volumes is his important life work. It is absolutely invaluable, and you could not put a sum of money on it 20 times what it costs that would be too high to pay for this completed work if we could not get it otherwise. It is a tremendously important and valuable work. The minority Member reads it every day. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] is one of the finest parliamentarians in the United States.

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman get me some more time?

Mr. BLANTON. I will give the gentleman some of mine, but I am sure so distinguished a gentleman as is the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] can always get all the time he wants. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is an important, influential member of the Printing Committee, and I hope he will do everything he can to push the completion of the printing of this great work by our good friend, the gentleman from Missouri. He will find the minority leader, the majority leader, the Speaker, and every other parliamentarian of this House will back him to the limit, no matter what it may cost, to complete the printing of this very valuable work.

Mr. RICH. I may say to the gentleman from Texas, for whom I have the highest regard, and who is always trying to keep down Government expenses, until it comes to an administration measure and then he votes for $5,000,000,000, that he goes in for those great big sums, but outside of that he is one of the most valuable men we have in Congress.

Mr. BLANTON. I thank the gentleman. I voted for such a measure because it was our President's program to meet the terrible emergency existing and to get us out of a depression that is unprecedented.

Mr. RICH. If the gentleman will get me some more time I will show him that some of the promises heretofore made by President Roosevelt and the Democratic Party platform have never been fulfilled. However, we are getting off the subject.

Mr. Chairman, I do not question at all the value of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] and his work in revising these laws, but I would like to know what it is going to cost to complete the job. They say, in the appropriation bill, that the work is completed, but we do not have the total sum involved, and it is for this reason that I brought up the subject. So far as the work is concerned, I believe it is a very valuable work, and I think the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] has done this country and this House a great deal of good, but the point is: What is it going to cost? Where will we get the money? Where will we get the money this Congress is spending?

Mr. BLANTON. It is going to cost about $80,000. If it cost 15 times that sum, as an economist of this House, I would vote for it without blinking an eyelid, because it would be well worth the money.

Mr. LUDLOW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. LUDLOW. There have been five annual appropriations under statutes for supplements to this code. These have been in the amount of $45,500 and in addition to that for the current fiscal year, there was an appropriation of $37,000 to revise the code. Therefore, the total is about $82,500.

Mr. RICH. Do I understand then the $82,500 is the sum total involved for the work in bringing these volumes up to the point where it is now ready for the Printer?

Mr. LUDLOW. That is my understanding. That is the total cost of getting it ready up to date.

Mr. RICH. If that is the case, the 4th section of the bill to which I have just referred can be eliminated, and there will be no further use for a clause of that kind in the bill?

Mr. LUDLOW. This is not a completed matter. As time goes on supplemental appropriations will be necessary to bring the work up to date.

Mr. BLANTON. This is the work of bringing up to date Hinds' Precedents, the rules by which this House is governed.

Mr. RICH. I appreciate that, but as I told the distinguished gentleman a moment ago, I want to know what the cost is going to be. The chairman of the committee has stated the cost will be $82,500. I would like to know whether that will end the cost so far as gathering the data together is concerned and bring the work up to the point of printing the precedents.

Mr. BLANTON. I said the cost would be about $80,000 in round figures. Of course, it may cost a little more, because these precedents have to be added to continually, but this will be an up-to-date revision when it comes from the printing presses.

Mr. RICH. I shall now continue with some other things that are of great interest to the House of Representatives and to the country at large at this particular time and I am going to refer to some of the promises made by the President of the United States, Mr. Roosevelt, and also to the fact that the promises made by Mr. Roosevelt and the performances are entirely different. The promises made by Mr. Roosevelt have not been carried out and the performances are going to be to the detriment of the American people and not for their welfare.

In referring to his personal appearance before the national convention in 1932 to receive formal notification of his selection as the Democratic Presidential candidate, as being unprecedented and unusual, Mr. Roosevelt said:

But these are unprecedented times.

He said further:

Let it be symbolic that in so doing I broke traditions. Let it be from now on the task of our party to break foolish traditions. We will break foolish traditions and leave it to the Republican leadership, far more skilled in that art, to break promises.

He stated further:

Let us now and here highly resolve to resume the country's interrupted march along the path of real progress, of real justice, of real equality for all of our citizens, great and small.

The President said:

I have many things on which I want to make my position clear at the earliest possible moment in this campaign. That admirable document, the platform which you have adopted, is clear. I accept it 100 percent.

Let us examine the Democratic platform of 1932 briefly. I quote from that platform:

The only hope for improving present conditions, restoring employment, affording permanent relief to the people, and bringing the Nation back to the proud position of domestic happiness and of financial, industrial, agricultural, and commercial leadership in the world lies in a drastic change in economic governmental policies.

We advocate an immediate and drastic reduction of governmental expenditures by abolishing useless commissions and offices, consolidating departments and bureaus, and eliminating extravagance, to accomplish a saving of not less than 25 percent in the cost of Federal Government.

Never in the history of this country have we experienced such ruthless expenditure by the Federal Government as we have witnessed during the past 2 years. Instead of abolishing bureaus he has set up more organizations and bureaus than any five Presidents in the history of this country, and that he did in 2 years' time. Has his promise been carried out? No! No! No!

The platform further states:

We favor maintenance of the national credit by a Federal Budget annually balanced on the basis of accurate executive estimates within revenues, raised by a system of taxation levied on principle of ability to pay.

Now, I would like to say to the Membership of the House that if there was ever a promise made to the American people that has been broken, this is it. Instead of balancing the Budget, he has opened the gap between expenditures and income more than any President ever thought of doing. He is sinking us into the greatest debt we ever dreamed of, and is he helping the country? You will find out, and it will not be long until you do, that his policy of spending is wrong. It is extravagant, it is unbusinesslike, and it is not in accordance with and for the best interest of our country. Our children, who have to pay this debt of extravagance, will rise up to damn the President and this Congress.

You will all recall when the President appointed Mr. Douglas as Director of the Budget. Mr. Douglas is a man for whom we all have respect and honor, a man who tried his level best every day and every hour of the day to balance the Federal Budget, but when he saw the heads of the various departments of this Government ruthlessly expending the funds of this country, he had no heart to go ahead and try to balance the Budget. He had in mind the promises made by the President of the United States that he would do that very thing. He knew the President was not living up to his promises, and I do not believe there was any cause for the resigning of Director of the Budget Douglas except the fact the President would not carry out the promises he had made to the American people.

I quote further from the President's address:

We advocate a sound currency to be preserved at all hazards.

You men know what the President of the United States is doing and has done in the past year so far as sound currency is concerned, but neither you nor I nor the American people know what he is going to do. You have given him the power to determine what sound currency shall be. [Applause in the gallery.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair wishes to admonish those in the galleries that there must be no applause from the galleries, and no evidence of approval or disapproval of anything stated on the floor.

Mr. RICH. They want sound money.

We advocate a competitive tariff for revenue with a fact-finding Tariff Commission free from Executive interference.

The Members of Congress know that there is not going to be any interference of any kind with the President in trying to fix up his reciprocal-trade agreements. When we had a request here from the minority side a few days ago asking Congress to request the Tariff Commission and the President of the United States to give us a list of all commodities wherein the tariff would be reduced—

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 15 additional minutes.

Mr. RICH. When we asked for this information, the majority side of the House said, "We do not want to know anything about that." The way they stated this to the minority was by not permitting the passage of a resolution asking for such information.

Now, the fact of the matter is we are receiving so many imports into this country that the American manufacturers and the American laborers are being put out of business. This is entirely due to the fact that we are importing so many commodities into this country manufactured by cheap labor that competition by our people with foreigners is impossible. Therefore the American laborer is being put out of work, the American manufacturer is being bankrupt, and the industries of Japan, China, Germany, Austria, France, and other countries are reaping the benefits that our people should receive. Why does not the President do as he promised?

Mr. HOEPEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I yield.

Mr. HOEPEL. I am quite in accord with the gentleman, but is it not true that the depression is being continued on account of the great importation of goods that are coming in from Japan under the tariff walls.

Mr. RICH. I think the gentleman is right, and the only way we can today, or in the near future, help American business is to regulate or build up a tariff wall higher and higher—American markets for Americans. I want to say to the membership of the Democratic Party that nothing is going to do the labor of this country more good than to have a higher tariff wall that will prohibit the importation of products which we manufacture into this country.

Mr. BOYLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. No; I cannot yield at this time. I want to give you some more promises made by the President and the Democratic Party that have not been fulfilled.

The President of the United States says further in his speech:

Just one word or two on taxes, the taxes that all of us pay toward the cost of government of all kinds.

Well, I know something of taxes. For 3 long years I have been going up and down the country preaching that government—Federal and State and local—costs too much. I shall not stop that preaching. As an immediate program of action we must abolish useless offices. We must eliminate actual functions of government—functions, in fact, that are not definitely essential to the continuance of government. We must merge, we must consolidate, subdivisions of government, and, like the private citizen, give up luxuries which we can no longer afford.

By our example at Washington itself we shall have the opportunity of pointing the way of economy to local government, for let us remember well that out of every tax dollar in the average State in this Nation 40 cents enters the Treasury at Washington, D. C., 10 or 12 cents only go to the State capitals, and 48 cents out of every dollar are consumed by the cost of local government in counties and cities and towns.

I propose to you, my friends, and through you, that government of all kinds, big and little, be made solvent and that the example be set by the President of the United States and his Cabinet.

If there was ever a statement in all the history of this country that was a bigger bugaboo or a bigger hullabaloo than that, I would like to know what it is. If in all the history of this country any man ever made a promise to the American people and then betrayed the American people, that statement is it. He is not doing what he said he would do. He is doing just the opposite. We have lost confidence in his statements and in his promises.

Now, I do not have any grudge or any pique against Mr. Roosevelt personally, but I do condemn the things that Mr. Roosevelt is doing after the promises he made to the American people.

He promised that he would consolidate the offices of Government, and yet never in the history of the country have we branched out more in establishing offices. Never in the history of the country have we established more bureaus. Never in the history of the country have we put more people on the Government pay roll than we are doing right now.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RICH. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Has the gentleman any farmers in his district?

Mr. RICH. Yes; I have farmers in my district in Pennsylvania.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman will go to the farmers' national meeting at Constitution Hall tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock, he will find that the farmers of the United States do not agree with him. They meet tomorrow in Washington to thank the President for all he has done for them.

Mr. RICH. In my district we have the most intelligent and common-sense farmers in the country. But the farmers of my district are not getting the free money that farmers in other parts of the country are getting. Why? I suppose because I am a Republican and they do not want any money to go into my district. And yet if there are any farmers who need consideration they are the farmers in my district. But the administration will not give consideration to farmers of Pennsylvania, who pay more Federal taxes than the farmers in the Southern States where they are practically turning over the Federal Treasury to them, and why that is I cannot understand. It is not right that we should give it all to the farmers of the South and let the farmers of the North go by without giving them any money at all. That is unjustifiable. Our Pennsylvania farmers are human, they are Americans. They believe in supporting the Constitution—not tearing it down by passing unconstitutional laws such as the Democratic Party have enacted into law the past 2 years. The Supreme Court is our only salvation against this administration. May it long live. That is what I condemn in this administration. It is class legislation that they are advocating, and when the President of the United States gets up and makes these grand speeches and says how we are going to help the forgotten man, how we are going to do those things that will make life more abundant, there are only two people in the United States who have anything on President Roosevelt in the general statements that he makes and which he knows he cannot fulfill. The first one I give credit to is Senator HUEY LONG in the promises he is making now to the people of this country. He has a great line of talk, and some of the things I agree with, as for instance when he says that a man who goes out of life should not leave an inheritance of more than $5,000,000. I think there is merit in that suggestion, and we could regulate that if we would properly adjust our inheritance taxes. Then he says that the income of a man should be regulated so that the more he makes the more he pays. In this I agree. His other promises I do not think would tend to any good. They are all Huey. Then there is another man who is making promises today, and that is Father Coughlin. Father Coughlin is now trying to beat Senator Long and President Roosevelt, and I think he is going to do a good job. When we get through with these three men and the promises they are making, either one of two things will happen. Either we are going to wreck the country or we will see the millenium. [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. Yes.

Mr. BOYLAN. The gentleman knows that his party did wreck the country under the leadership of President Hoover; and, furthermore, I think if the gentleman is representing the farmers in Pennsylvania he is recreant in his duty if he is not looking after them. Is the gentleman asleep?

Mr. RICH. I want to say that the farmers of my district are the best people in this country, and if you had a few farmers like that to deal with in New York instead of a lot of people there who are trying to get the Government to take care of them you would not be trying to wreck this country as you are doing. Pennsylvania people believe in supporting the country, not wrecking it. In the 124 years of mostly Republican administration we have built this country up to be the greatest country on the face of the earth. Most of it came through Republican administrations. In that time we spent up to the present administration $24,000,000,000, and in the last 3 years of President Roosevelt's administration he is asking for an expenditure of $24,000,000,000. Contrast that ruthless expenditure. It is appalling. It is astounding.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. Oh, I cannot yield to everyone. I can answer only one at a time.

Mr. McFARLANE. I am asking the gentleman to yield to me.

Mr. RICH. I am answering the gentleman's colleague from New York [Mr. BOYLAN], and I have not finished yet. I say to you that from George Washington's administration to the end of President Taft's administration, most of it being Republican administrations, the cost of government was $24,000,000,000.

Mr. BOYLAN. Why stop at Mr. Taft's administration? What about Mr. Hoover's administration?

Mr. RICH. During that time we spent $24,000,000,000, and with President Roosevelt asking for five and six billion dollars in 1934 you can see what kind of a record he will make. He has all of the other Presidents beaten. They are only pikers alongside of what he is trying to do in wrecking this country by creating an unprecedented debt to be paid by our children's children.

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. Yes.

Mr. ARNOLD. Referring to this building up process of the Republican Party, is the gentleman especially referring to the last 2 years of the Hoover administration?

Mr. RICH. If the Democratic Party, since I came into the Congress, when Mr. Hoover was President, had given him one-tenth of 1 percent of the cooperation that the Congress has given President Roosevelt since he has come into office, we would never be where we are now, we would never have reached this point. Think of the damnable things that were said about President Hoover and about his administration, when we needed to put our shoulders to the wheel to help this country to get back into the condition where our industries would keep men employed. We would have accomplished that if Mr. Hoover had had just a little bit of cooperation from the Democratic House of Representatives, and of all the mean, contemptible, damnable things that were said about Herbert Hoover and his administration, they were said on the Democratic side of the House and by Democratic Members of the House.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman must remember that there was a Republican on his side of the aisle who said worse things about Herbert Hoover than were ever said on the floor of the House.

Mr. BLANTON. That must have been Mr. Will Wood, of Indiana, because he once criticized Mr. Hoover severely.

Mr. RICH. Who was that gentleman?

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. McFadden. He tried to impeach President Hoover several times.

Mr. RICH. O Mr. McFadden, poor fellow, he did not know what he was doing. Between Mr. Hoover and my former colleague Mr. McFadden, I place my faith in Mr. Hoover.

Mr. BLANTON. And my friend has not forgotten that the great Indianan, Mr. Will Wood, former Republican Chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and one of the big Republican leaders here in his day, once said that Herbert Hoover was one of the most extravagant pieces of furniture with which this Government was ever afflicted.

Mr. RICH. I had the very greatest respect for Will Wood, and I doubt very much whether he made the statement the way the gentleman from Texas reports it.

Mr. BLANTON. It is in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in practically the identical language I have mentioned.

Mr. RICH. Not that I doubt the gentleman's word, however. If Will Wood considered Herbert Hoover such a spender, what would Will Wood say if he knew how President Roosevelt is spending money? Will Wood would turn over in his grave. And do not forget that.

Mr. BLANTON. Just one more question: Is it not a fact—because my friend always is truthful—is it not a fact that during the 4 years of Hoover's administration a deficit of $4,000,000,000 was created that did not do the American people one single bit of good?

Mr. RICH. No; not quite in that way. He was trying to help the people of this country through laws you fellows tried to block. You would not come to his assistance; and I condemn the Democratic Party for the way it antagonized Herbert Hoover when he was President. President Roosevelt is spending in 2 years twice as much, and you watch the results. It will be just too bad, and do not you forget it; and my colleague from Texas knows it full well.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman from Pennsylvania desire more time?

Mr. RICH. Yes; I would like 5 additional minutes.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH].

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I yield.

Mr. BLOOM. I just want to ask the gentleman this question: Does the gentleman take the Republican point of view from Washington's time or when the Republican Party was organized?

Mr. RICH. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BLOOM] was chairman of a committee of Congress which published a History of George Washington, a very valuable work, and from it I have learned things about Washington I never knew before. It is probably one of the best and most complete histories of the life of Washington that has ever been published. I congratulate the gentleman from New York on it.

Mr. BLOOM. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. RICH. Throughout 8 long years George Washington guided the destinies of this country through the War of the Revolution. At the end of this war he sent an itemized report to Congress of his total expenses. They amounted in the aggregate to $76,902. It is due to the efforts of Washington and the other great men in the early life of our history as a Republic that we established this Government as we did. When we think of that comparatively insignificant sum of money—$76,902—and the tremendous things that were accomplished through its expenditure, can we help asking ourselves what Washington would think if he could know what Roosevelt is spending in 3 years? He would think we were most extravagant, a country wrecker and not a country builder.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further I would ask him this question: When was the Republican Party organized; and why did he go back to George Washington's time?

Mr. RICH. I am trying to bring home to the Membership of this Congress that throughout the years from the beginning of Washington's term as President to the end of Taft's administration the total cost of government was $24,000,000,000; yet Roosevelt, in 3 years wants to spend $24,000,000,000; and our national deficit right now is $31,000,000,000. I ask my friend from New York to think of this. The public debt at the present time is the greatest it has ever been in the history of this Nation. How is it going to be paid? Where will you get the money? Is it to be paid with these "baloney" dollars they talk about issuing? Roosevelt promised sound money. If he does not stick to sound money as he promised he will wreck the country.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. McFARLANE. The gentleman mentioned the total expenditures of the Government from its founding to the end of Taft's administration. Let us consider in connection with the Republican regime the gentleman speaks about, the legislation for which the Republican Party is responsible which has brought about the situation in the country where 4 percent of the people own more than 80 percent of the wealth. It was brought about through special-privilege legislation. Legislation enacted by the Republican Party is responsible for the present condition of the country.

Mr. RICH. I have heard statements similar to that just made by the gentleman from Texas made on this floor half a dozen times, that 4 percent of the people own 80 percent of the wealth. The gentleman is conservative, for many Congressmen have stated on the floor that 3 percent of the people own 95 percent of the wealth.

I wish gentlemen who talk thus would present facts and figures to support their conclusions. I wish some Member who makes such statements would come prepared with his figures to support them, and I shall try to get them printed in the RECORD, for I do not believe such statements.

Mr. McFARLANE. I shall be very glad to present them in my own time.

Mr. RICH. I may say to the gentleman from Texas that I doubt the accuracy of his statement. I believe he is misinformed. I have heard similar statements made on the floor of the House a number of times, as I said before. Several times I have tried to find authority for such statements but have not been able to find it. I do not believe it; I do not believe those statements.

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I yield.

Mr. ARNOLD. The gentleman said a few moments ago that Congress did not support Mr. Hoover. I wish the gentleman would tell us what constructive measures Mr. Hoover recommended that Congress did not support him on.

Mr. RICH. We established the Federal Reserve bank in the administration of Woodrow Wilson.

Mr. ARNOLD. I am speaking about constructive legislation recommended by Mr. Hoover.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, a lot of the Democrats want to hear some of these things about the administration, and I think they ought to be enlightened, because perhaps they will change their tactics. Whenever an administration measure comes in here and it is stated that it is an administration measure, you are like a bunch of sheep, you just come along, walk up to the ballot box, place your ballot there, and answer "aye." That happens every time it is an administration measure. All these unconstitutional laws, all these measures you do not believe in yourself.

Mr. ARNOLD. I am still waiting for an answer to my inquiry.

Mr. RICH. When the Federal Reserve System was established it was supposed to be a Democratic measure. During the administration of President Hoover the Federal Reserve System was in operation. Previous to 1929 it was stated that the Federal Reserve would keep us from going into bankruptcy; it would prevent bank failures. I want to say to the Democratic administration, if the Democratic Party claim they established the Federal Reserve System, they did a real good job.

Mr. ARNOLD. Will the gentleman please be specific and answer the question?

Mr. RICH. I will tell the gentleman. I think the Democratic Party did a great job if they claim credit for the establishment of the Federal Reserve System, but I want to say also right here that it was not the fault of the Federal Reserve banks that we had the depression which we have just gone through, as well as the bank failures. It was the fault of the human element in those banks. That was the trouble. If those who had charge of the Federal Reserve banks had given credit to the banks of this country, as the law was interpreted to mean and as they were supposed to do, we would have had a lot of banks stay open that did not stay open, and the Federal Reserve banks would have been a greater national benefit in time of emergency.

Mr. BLOOM. Did they not have too much credit?

Mr. ARNOLD. Will the gentleman please answer my question?

Mr. RICH. What is the gentleman's question?

Mr. ARNOLD. The gentleman said a while ago that the Congress did not support Mr. Hoover, and I asked the gentleman specifically to tell us the constructive measures that Mr. Hoover sent down here to meet the exigencies that then existed which this Congress did not go along with him on?

Mr. RICH. I may say to my colleague the gentleman from Illinois if he will look up the record he will find what they are.

Mr. ARNOLD. I am asking the gentleman to be specific.

Mr. RICH. I have only been given 5 minutes, and I cannot tell the gentleman in less than an hour all of the things Mr. Hoover sent to Congress to be enacted into law which Congress rejected. Mr. Hoover did his part, but the Democratic House of Representatives was his and the country's greatest hindrance to real, sound, fundamental, constitutional laws. [Applause.]

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, our good friend the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] is at his worst when he is attacking the President of the United States. I fear that some of the new Members who have not yet gotten well acquainted with him may get a wrong impression of him. That is merely an eruption of pent up Republican partisanship in him, because he is one of the Republican leaders over there and he feels that it is his duty to stand up and make a partisan fight, and hence must attack a Democratic President.

There are no just grounds upon which he can attack the Democratic administration, so he must become partisan and make a personal attack on the President.

At heart and personally you will find him a delightful gentleman, an able and distinguished scholar, and much beyond the average legislator. You will find him an upstanding Republican leader either here or at home.

He was born and reared in Pennsylvania, among Republicans, so he does not know any other kind of politics. He is a good scout for all of that.

But, Mr. Chairman, I want to remind him that such unworthy attacks as he has just made on this floor is what is inciting vicious attacks by infamous scoundrels, such as came to our offices this morning through the United States mail. Such speeches as the gentleman has just made incite these vicious attacks. Here is an attack that came this morning through the United States mail from Clarence B. Thorne, 434 East Thirty-ninth Street, New York City. This moral pervert ought to be in the penitentiary. This is a vicious, unwarranted attack on the President of the United States without cause and without reason. And, Mr. Chairman, he does not stop with the President. He attacks the gentleman who just spoke, as well as every other Member of this Seventy-fourth Congress.

Let me read you his estimate of the 435 Members of the House, and the 96 Senators. This Clarence B. Thorne says:

The Seventy-fourth Congress, therefore—all of it—for even to be a "progressive" or a "maverick", or even a constructively charitable Greenway is not a mitigation of the crime—are guilty as hell of the same treason, the same murder, the same shameless theft which humanity suffers at its befouled and palsied hands.

That is the kind of vicious attacks from degenerates the gentleman incites when he makes speeches as he did just now. My good friend, an upstanding Republican from Pennsylvania, ought not to do it, and it ought to stop.

Our great President has tremendous burdens upon his shoulders just now. Problems of state hang heavily about him. He needs encouragement. He needs us to help to hold up his hands. There should be no idle, unjust criticism. There should be no heckling. We should all strive daily to lighten his burdens rather than make them heavier.

Mr. Chairman, I want to say that there is not a Republican in this House who can answer the question that was asked a few minutes ago by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ARNOLD] of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. There was not a single constructive measure that Herbert Hoover sent here during his 4 years that Congress did not pass, and passed with Democratic votes. We Democrats helped to pass every constructive measure he sent here when he asked Congress for it, if the measure was in the interest of this Nation. So it is futile to get up here and use generalities in attempt to make it appear that President Hoover did not have Democratic support for every constructive measure he ever proposed.

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly, I yield for the gentleman to tell me one constructive measure that Herbert Hoover ever sent here that we Democrats did not support?

Mr. RICH. I want to say to the gentleman from Texas—

Mr. BLANTON. What was the measure?

Mr. RICH. I did not interrupt to give the gentleman that information. I want to give the gentleman the promises—

Mr. BLANTON. What was the measure?

Mr. RICH. I want to ask the gentleman about the promises and the performances of the present President.

Mr. BLANTON. What was the measure? There was no constructive measure that Herbert Hoover ever sent here that we Democrats did not support and help to pass. You cannot get away from that proposition.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. PARSONS. The creation of the R. F. C. was passed by a Democratic House in the Seventy-third Congress as well as the foreign-debts moratorium. Did not the House Democrats cooperate on both of those?

Mr. BLANTON. The Democrats cooperated right down the line in helping President Hoover to put his entire program through. But his program petered out. It failed. He did not have the right kind of a program.

Mr. HOEPEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I am sorry I have not the time. I have some other matters I want to discuss, and my time is limited.

The farmers are with President Roosevelt. When I came to Congress back in 1917, Hale County, Tex., with Plainview as its county seat, was in my district, which had 59 counties in it. It was 556 miles east and west and 400 miles north and south. Here is a letter I got from one of my former constituents, Mr. C. H. Day:

HALE COUNTY FARM ASSOCIATION,
Plainview, Tex., May 1, 1935.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BLANTON: Honoring the administration for its services to agriculture, May 14 and 15, we are expecting 1,500 to 2,000 actual average farmers of the Nation to assemble in Washington for the purpose of expressing our appreciation as recipients for the relief accorded us during the depression and offering our assistance and sober council for a future program based on sound logical reason. As chairman of the national arrangements committee, for this event, the preliminaries were worked out by the executive committees of each of the States in Washington the week of April 22.

Since returning home the farmers of these States have been actively engaged in holding meetings electing their delegates to attend this assembly, in arranging special trains and financing the trip. From Texas we will have two or more special trains. All special trains are intended to arrive in Washington early the morning of May 14.

This is a personal invitation to you to attend the set program which is now being arranged for arrival in the Capital. We have requested the Department of Agriculture to obtain, if possible, the large auditorium in the Labor Building for the program. The arrangements committee will be in Washington May 10 to complete the details and we shall greatly appreciate your cooperation and assistance in order that this program may be carried out in the spirit for which it is intended.

Yours very truly,

C. H. DAY,
Chairman Arrangements Committee.

Thus you see the farmers are with the President of the United States. The farmers appreciate him. The farmers say that he, with the help of Congress, has been their savior and their deliverer in this great time of need.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and to include some excerpts therein.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to discuss an entirely different matter—the persistent and continual misrepresentation accorded me by certain newspapers in Washington.

HERALD AND POST CANNOT TELL THE TRUTH

Mr. Chairman, last Friday I stopped a resolution from passing which the gentleman from New York [Mr. DICKSTEIN] was attempting to put over in a hurry. I quote from Friday's RECORD my position on the matter:

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this would be all right if the resolution provides safeguards for their return.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. It does.

Mr. BLANTON. Are there proper safeguards in the resolution to insure the prompt return of all of them after this jamboree?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. This is under the regulations of both the Department of State and the Department of Labor.

Mr. BLANTON. But I want to know that their prompt return is assured. How many could come in under the resolution?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Each country is going to send a Boy Scout group.

Mr. BLANTON. A "group" could mean a great many. Are they limited as to the number of Boy Scouts they may send?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. There is no limitation at all.

Mr. BLANTON. There should be a proper limitation. Mr. Speaker, before we agree to this request, we would like to hear the resolution read.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Resolved, etc., That alien participants, officials, and other accredited members of delegations to the National Boy Scout Jamboree, to be held in the United States in 1935, and members of the immediate families of the foregoing, all of whom are non-immigrants—"

Mr. BLANTON (interrupting the reading of the joint resolution). That is far enough. Under that language a hundred thousand could come over. I object, Mr. Speaker, if they are going to bring their families in here. If, beside the Boy Scout participants, foreign "officials", and foreign "members of delegations", and foreign "members of the immediate families of the foregoing" may all come across our borders, many of them will stay here, and we already have at least 6,500,000 aliens here from foreign countries holding American jobs away from starving Americans now on relief. It is all right for the Boy Scouts to come in when their prompt return is definitely assured, but the families do not have to participate in the national games, but a possible army of officials and delegations are not necessary.

Mr. RANKIN. Does the gentleman consider this an insidious move to bring in some immigrants?

Mr. BLANTON. I am a little suspicious about it, because there have been so many notorious anarchists brought in. I have lost confidence in our Bureau. When Emma Goldman, who was the former notorious anarchist pal of that notorious anarchist Alexander Berkman, can be permitted to come in, I have not much confidence in regulations our present careless Immigration Bureau will prescribe for our protection.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Will the gentleman withhold his objection so that I may make a statement?

Mr. BLANTON. No; I am going to object. Mr. Speaker, this should not come up here until we can look into it a little closer and properly safeguard it. The word "officials" and also the words "and other accredited members of delegations" and also the words "and members of the immediate families of the foregoing", all being in addition to the Boy Scouts themselves, are entirely too all-embracing, and under such language a whole army of additional foreigners could come in the United States from Italy, Greece, Japan, Russia, the Philippines, Germany, France, England, and from every other country scattered over the entire world. And the worst of it all is that there are no safeguarding provisions that I deem satisfactory to assure their prompt return out of this country after this so-called "jamboree" is over.

We are already in what I consider too much of a foreign jamboree. We have over 6,500,000 aliens in the United States who have been taking American jobs that belong to Americans. If all of these aliens in the United States have no jobs, they are on relief. If we could deport them and get them out of this country, and keep them out, there would be plenty of American jobs for Americans.

This is one matter that I have made up my mind definitely to watch, and no more bills with my consent are to be passed here that will admit any more aliens into the United States.

The time has come when the Members of this Congress who think more of American citizens, walking the streets without jobs, with their wives and little children starving, than they do of foreigners from foreign countries to make a determined, uncompromising fight to stop other aliens from coming across our borders and to deport the millions of aliens who are now here unlawfully. I am one who is pledged to make such a fight. This is one issue upon which I will not compromise. This is a fight to the finish. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I object to the resolution.

The above will show that I did not mention any person named "Brinkman", and that I did not criticize in any way the foreign Boy Scouts, and that I did not in any way compare them to Emma Goldman.

WASHINGTON HERALD'S MISREPRESENTATIONS

Yet the Washington Herald Saturday morning, in large black-face type, printed the following untrue headline: "BLANTON fears alien Scouts", and in a succeeding untrue headline, also in large type, asserted: "Halts resolution to admit boys into United States." And then the Herald stated: "DICKSTEIN launched an attack on the Texan off the floor." And the Herald quoted me as saying, "I am suspicious when Alexander Brinkman can come in."

I halted the resolution because it would admit alien "officials", and because it would admit alien "members of delegations", and because it would admit alien "members of the immediate families of the foregoing", all without proper safeguards for the prompt return after the jamboree.

WASHINGTON POST'S MISREPRESENTATIONS

Then the Washington Post had to print its usual and customary perversion of facts. In its issue Saturday morning, in large black-face type, it printed the following untrue headlines: "BLANTON suspicious—Balks bill to aid Scouts stage jamboree." I did not object to aiding the Boy Scouts stage their jamboree, but what I did object to was an attempt to bring in a horde of foreigners into the United States along with them, which our able colleague from Mississippi well described as "an insidious move to bring in some immigrants."

If the gentleman from New York criticized or attacked me, I did not know anything about it. He did it behind my back and did not let me hear him. Yet the Washington Post had to carry the following erroneous statement in an attempt to reflect upon my action, that was taken to protect our unemployed Americans, who have had their jobs taken away from them by aliens illegally in the United States, to wit:

DICKSTEIN warmly criticized the Texan off the floor, and declared he will bring his resolution before the Immigration Committee Monday and ask passage under suspension of rules. He explained that 35,000 Scouts will come to Washington in August.

CALLS ACTION UNPARDONABLE

"The gentleman from Texas, Mr. BLANTON, who claims to be a 100-percenter", DICKSTEIN declared, "in my opinion has, by his conduct in objecting to this resolution, brought criticism upon the Congress of the United States."

"The gentleman from Texas compared the American Boy Scouts and the Boy Scouts of the world who are to participate in this great event to Emma Goldman and others, which I think is unpardonable."

When the Washington Post made the above criticism it knew that it was untrue, because it had a reporter in the gallery when the matter occurred in the House.

PROMPTLY FURNISHED NEWSPAPERS PROPER CORRECTION

After learning of these erroneous press statements, on Saturday morning, May 11, 1935, I promptly furnished the following correction to the Washington newspapers, the Associated Press, and the International News Service, to wit:

PROTECTING UNEMPLOYED AMERICANS FROM IMMIGRANT ALIENS

Relative to press reports this morning regarding my stopping a resolution permitting alien Boy Scouts to enter free and without restriction as to number, I distinctly stated that I did not object to the Boy Scouts coming, with proper provisions in the resolution to insure their prompt return after the jamboree.

What I objected to was the provisions in the resolution that in addition to giving this privilege to the alien Boy Scout participants themselves, it provided for alien officials, and alien members of delegations, and alien members of the immediate families of all of the foregoing, under which at least 100,000 foreigners might come into the United States.

And there were no proper safeguards in the resolution to assure Congress that this horde of aliens would be forced to return promptly after the jamboree. I did not in any way compare "alien Boy Scouts" with Emma Goldman or Alexander Berkman, but said that when our Immigration Bureau allowed Emma Goldman, a notorious anarchist, who was the dangerous pal of the notorious anarchist, Alexander Berkman, to come here at this dangerous period, after our Government had spent a tremendous sum to deport them following the World War, I did not want to leave the matter wholly in the hands of such bureau.

THOMAS L. BLANTON.

DID NOT HAVE THE DECENCY TO CORRECT

Neither the Washington Herald nor the Washington Post had the decency to print my statement, or to correct the false and erroneous impression they had given their readers by printing their deliberate misstatements.

WILL CALL THEIR HAND IN THE FUTURE

I intend to call attention through this RECORD hereafter to every lie any of these Washington newspapers publish about me, and to publish the facts that they attempt to distort, misquote, and misrepresent. They cannot get away with it. They hurt and injure only themselves, because their readers are learning that they cannot depend on what they see in Hearst's Herald and Times or the Washington Post. When they treat me decently, I will show them every consideration.

THE PEOPLE ARE NOT ASLEEP

The following is a fair sample of the communications I have received from different parts of the United States:

CINCINNATI, OHIO, May 13, 1935.

Congressman THOMAS L. BLANTON,
Washington, D. C.:

Do not surrender your position on foreign Boy Scout relatives. You are right. More power to you.

JAMES L. WILMETH,
Secretary Junior Order of Mechanics.

Within the past 2 months I have received letters and telegrams from every State in the Union strongly commending my fight to cause aliens to be deported from the United States and to stop all immigration for 10 years.

TODAY'S IMMIGRATION COMMITTEE HEARING

As soon as the hearing began today on the hereinbefore-mentioned resolution (H. J. Res. 285), I appeared before the committee and insisted that this resolution should be properly amended.

As House Joint Resolution 285 was introduced by Chairman DICKSTEIN, in stipulating what persons should be exempt from the payment of the $8 tax, and exempted from the fees prescribed by law to be collected in connection with executing an application for a visa and visasing the passport or other travel document, used the following broad and all-inclusive language, to wit:

That alien participants, officials, and other accredited members of delegations to the National Boy Scout Jamboree to be held in the United States in 1935, and members of the immediate families of the foregoing.

I insisted that the resolution show clearly that the "alien participants" were to be alien Boy Scout participants, and that the word "executives" should be used, and that the reference to "delegations" should be pinned to the Boy Scouts themselves and their executives, and that members of their families should be omitted and left at home. I was glad to note that the chairman of the committee was not present. I feel gratified that the committee did properly amend the resolution, and reported it with safeguarding amendments. So, after all, good was accomplished by my stopping the resolution last Friday, for which Chairman DICKSTEIN, behind my back, criticized me in his statement given to the press. And the national representative of the Boy Scouts was present at said committee hearing and informed me that he quite agreed with the position taken by me.

Mr. BOYLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I am sorry, I cannot yield until I get through with this subject.

Mr. BOYLAN. I always yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. I am going to yield when I get through, if I have the time.

How many of you feel very kindly about having alien Boy Scouts coming over here to this country from countries that have denied their sacred obligations which they owe us—debts of honor? A picture was shown here the other day that made my blood boil. It was the Chancellor of Great Britain sitting in front of his table with what he called "a balanced budget" and the statement that Great Britain had balanced her budget. It was an infamous lie. That English budget is not balanced. There is a debt of honor she owes this country, amounting to several billion dollars, and that budget will never be balanced until proper provision is made for its payment.

I want the alien Boy Scouts from England and France and all the other countries who have refused to pay their honest debts they owe us to go back home and tell their nationals that they will be without honor until proper provision is made to settle such debts.

Every American in the United States made great sacrifices in enabling our Government to save the civilization of Europe, and they—England, France, Italy, and Russia—owe their present existence to us, for if we had not gone to their rescue Germany would have subjugated them.

Mr. Chairman, I realize that I am looking at this from a different angle from the viewpoint of the gentleman from New York [Mr. DICKSTEIN], who on this floor not long ago said that in his district, where many of the people in it are of foreign origin, "there is not a single family that has a relative abroad." He had brought them all over here. My colleague from Texas [Mr. DIES] is about the best posted man in this House on immigration. He served on that committee for several years until he was promoted to the Committee on Rules. He will tell you that from the check-up that he has made, and the check-up that I have made, there are at least 3,500,000 aliens in the United States today who are here unlawfully, and he will tell you that there are about 6,500,000 who are here lawfully, who have not yet taken out their citizenship papers. You could not make them fight for that flag if war were declared. They would claim their exemption, or dodge the draft as Bergdoll did. They would not fight for that flag in case of war. The 3,500,000 are here unlawfully, just like Bruno Hauptmann is here. Nobody knew anything about him.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes additional to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I am sorry, I have not the time. If you take these 3,500,000 unlawful aliens out of the United States and take out the 6,500,000 here lawfully who have not taken out their citizenship papers but who are holding jobs or are on relief, you could guarantee a job for every American who is unemployed; and you would take Americans off the relief rolls.

I am for America for Americans just now. This is not Russia; this is not Czechoslovakia; this is not Italy; this is not Greece; this is not Germany; this is not France; this is not England. This is America.

I have on the Clerk's desk a petition that will take a bill out of the committee, pass it, and make it become a law, that will stop immigration for 10 years. Let us assimilate the aliens we have before we take on new ones. [Applause.] Eighteen Members have signed it; it takes 218. Why do you not sign it? Now, do not go home when Congress adjourns and say that it is not your fault that these aliens come in here, because it is. You can stop it if you go up there and sign that petition. With 218 signatures the House can take it up and pass it before Congress adjourns and we will stop these aliens coming here. The gentleman from New York, the chairman of that committee, already has put my bill in his dead house, as he calls it, and he put it in his dead house last year and will keep it there next year and will not let it pass. But we can pass it, if you will sign my petition to discharge his committee, under our discharge rule, and he cannot stop us. If you want to keep the alien out, and if your constituents want you to, go up and sign that petition and we will pass the bill; we will keep America for Americans.

Now, I want to get to one other subject and then I am done. I have sent every Member of this House and every Member of the Senate, at my own expense, a report on Garnett today. I did it as a public service. It is absolutely nothing to me personally in the world; it does not benefit me at all in any way. I have sent you a copy of a record disclosing a most diabolical newspaper plot to ruin some high public officials; one a man whom your President appointed as United States attorney for the District of Columbia. I want you to read every page of that record and you will see the President's commission of appointment. I want you to read an endorsement by 1,100 members of the Bar Association of Washington, showing that he is a splendid lawyer and an outstanding citizen. I want you to read an endorsement by 80 members of the Barristers' Club here, a group of young lawyers in Washington. I want you to read a list of statements from various Washington citizens, clubs, organized citizens' associations, and other groups.

Do you know the motive for their plot? Four years ago the Hearst Herald libeled a Methodist preacher over in Virginia, and the Methodist preacher employed to defend him the man who afterward was appointed United States attorney for the District of Columbia. Garnett brought that suit over in Alexandria, Va. Hearst had eight high-powered lawyers against him. He had Wilton J. Lambert, one of the greatest lawyers in the United States, as one of his counsel, and seven others. First they pleaded jurisdiction and Garnett beat them. Then they pleaded privilege—that Hearst had a right to libel a Methodist preacher whenever he got ready because he was publishing a newspaper.

Garnett was pitted against these high-powered lawyers, but he beat them on that plea also. Then the case was set down for trial before a jury. Hearst was beaten and did not want to leave it to a jury, so he settled the case and paid the Methodist preacher $2,500.

Hearst's Herald and Times determined then they were going to get Garnett, and they have been after him ever since. I want you to read that record I have sent you. It is nothing to me personally, but I hate injustice anywhere I find it. I would defend any other public official here if I thought he was being persecuted. John, I think they are persecuting you, boy, and I am for you; I think they have been after you unjustly. I believe they have been trying to get your goat. They love to get Congressmen's goats.

Mr. HOEPEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. HOEPEL. I would like to say that those who are doing this were my Democratic opponents in 1932 and 1934.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, no. I have been here long enough to know conditions in Washington.

I just wanted the Members to know these facts. Every judge in Washington is for Garnett. Nine justices of the Supreme Court of the District left their bench and sent a committee to the Attorney General's office in Garnett's behalf. The 1,180 lawyers of Washington, and all of the judges of the various District of Columbia courts here, are for him.

The said newspapers determined to ruin Garnett, but they cannot do it. When they get through, the United States attorney will stand higher and stronger here in Washington than he did before Hearst started this attack.

I shall show you from the Herald and from the Post some of the methods they have used. Here is an article from the Washington Herald of Thursday, May 9, 1935, the headlines of which state: "House resents Garnett's hits at crime probe." When has the House resented it? That is absolutely false. The House has taken no action.

Then they try to quote the Speaker as though he were taking sides, the greatest Speaker who has ever presided over the House of Representatives. You will find that JOE BYRNS never authorized either one of these newspapers to make that statement. Here is the Post for Thursday, May 9: "BYRNS votes crime group his support." That is absolutely false.

The Speaker did not do that; that is a misrepresentation. The Speaker had never seen that report, does not know anything about it. He is the last man in the world who would prejudice a case. When he gets that report, when he finds out what these 1,180 lawyers say about Garnett, when he finds out what every judge in Washington says about him, when he finds out what the Attorney General says about him, when he finds out what the President of the United States said about him, when he finds out what Garnett's neighbors and friends in Washington say about him, that will be the end of it. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion let me state that I have in my office a huge stack of letters from the leading citizens of Washington, written me in behalf of United States Attorney Leslie C. Garnett, and in behalf of Maj. Ernest W. Brown, Superintendent of the Metropolitan Police, and in behalf of Inspector Albert J. Headley, stating that they enjoy the confidence of their neighbors and associates, and that they deem this attack on them an outrage, without excuse or justification.

I have sent you only a fair cross section of these letters, as there were too many to think of publishing more than just enough to show the import of all of them. Some are from citizens who have known Inspector Headley during the entire 39 years he has faithfully, honestly, and loyally served this District.

With such records as these three faithful officials have builded up throughout the years of their lives, it is going to require more than this spleen and malice and hatred to destroy any of them. They cannot be destroyed by malice. Hearst's plot has failed. The Post's plot has failed. They are still highly respected. [Applause.]

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] such time as he may desire.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I want to read to the Members of the House an invitation from the farmer:

To the Speaker and to the Members of the House of Representatives, Seventy-fourth Congress of the United States:

On behalf of several thousand farmers from 25 or more States, assembling in Washington Tuesday, May 14, to express to this Congress and to the Agricultural Adjustment Administration the appreciation of the great majority of American farmers for the present adjustment programs which have saved agriculture from ruin, we extend to every Member of this honorable body a cordial invitation to attend the farmer meeting to be held in Constitution Hall, Tuesday, May 14, from 10 a. m. to 12 m.

This meeting is not one of protest or demand but of endorsement of a farm program which is really an effective contribution in the farmers' long struggle for economic justice. Opponents of the program have not only spoken loudly in their own interests but have also professed to speak for farmers. To indicate to the leaders of this Nation the real voice of agriculture, farmers from all over America have journeyed here to emphasize their approval of these programs, to express their confidence in the leadership of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, and to voice their conviction that the best interests of the Nation call for continuation and strengthening of these adjustment programs.

It is in this spirit that the farmers invite you to attend their meeting, that you may personally receive their commendation.

Respectfully,

C. H. DAY, Texas,
J. F. TOMPKINS, Arkansas,
D. E. SCOTT, North Carolina,
EARL DEAN, Iowa,

National Committee on Arrangements.

Mr. Chairman, I understand there will probably be 2,000 or more farmers from all over the country representing different parts of the country, as well as different commodities that are affected. They are meeting in Constitution Hall tomorrow morning to tell the story of what those who are affected by the farm program think and how they feel. We have heard from many people here who have assumed to speak for the farmers, both in and out of Congress. It should be interesting to the Members of this House to hear some spokesmen who are really tillers of the soil. It would be interesting to hear their story simply told as they will tell it to you. I therefore urge every Member of the House who is in position to do so to go down to Constitution Hall in the morning and hear these American farmers, who represent different commodities in different sections of the country. Inasmuch as practically every section of the country is represented, every Member should go down and hear directly from these farmers and not what someone says who assumes to speak for them.

Mr. PATMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. PATMAN. In addition to the A. A. A. benefits the gentleman, as Chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, knows more than any other Member of the House of the savings in connection with the reduction of interest rates on farms and farm homes. I wonder if the gentleman would tell the Members about how much the farmers are saving annually on the reduction of interest on their farms as compared with, say, the year 1932?

Mr. JONES. It is impossible to state the exact amount. They are saving, through the activities of the Farm Credit Administration, about $75,000,000 per year. Practically all other lending agencies and institutions have reduced their interest rates, which cover about three times as much in mortgages. In addition they have saved hundreds of thousands of farm homes from foreclosure. Of course, as compared to the rates of a few years ago the savings run into hundreds of millions.

Mr. PATMAN. If the reduction of 3½ percent goes through, which the gentleman recommended and secured the passage of a bill a few days ago, the farmers will save a couple hundred million dollars in all, including other saving, over 1932?

Mr. JONES. If the terms are met by the other institutions; yes.

Mr. HAINES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. HAINES. I was very much interested in the gentleman's broadcast the other day. I heard just a portion of it. I rise to inquire if the gentleman will have it inserted in the RECORD. I think it was a great statement, and I would like to read all of the gentleman's address.

Mr. JONES. I thank the gentleman. I will either insert it in the RECORD or cover the same subject a little later in the House.

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MICHENER. Does this group represent organized farmers or independent farmers?

Mr. JONES. I am not authorized to say whom they represent. I understand it is just a sort of grass-roots movement, consisting of a lot of farmers. Someone made the suggestion and it spread like a prairie fire and people from different sections of the country thought they would like to come here and let the administration and the Members know how they felt. At least, they are people who are directly interested, and I would rather have their story, whomever they represent, because they are actual farmers, than to listen to some organized group who have always said if we did anything for these farmers that we wrecked the farmer anyway. This story comes direct from those who till the soil, and I would like to hear the story. Would not the gentleman?

Mr. MICHENER. This is just my notion about it: I cannot conceive of a movement growing as this movement did, just like Topsy grew, so to speak, from nowhere, unless there was back of it some organization somewhere, and I am sure there is. I want to know who that organization is.

Mr. JONES. The main motive behind the movement, I think is the fact that during a period of 2 or 3 years the farm prices had been ground down below a living level. Through the operations of the farming program recently nearly a billion dollars in benefits has been given to the farmers all over this country. In addition to that the prices of farm products have been more than doubled. I think that is motive enough. Does not the gentleman think so, too?

Mr. MICHENER. Answering the gentleman's question, I would say yes, but I am not talking about motive. I am just asking who is back of the movement?

Mr. JONES. I am not authorized to speak for them. I rose simply to extend their invitation to the Members of Congress in a simple way and had not intended to comment further. I do not know. I have not investigated. I have been told that they talked about the matter and then communicated with the actual farmers in other sections of the country and got together. They raised the necessary funds to send the representatives here because they were aware of the fact that propaganda was being carried on all over the country against the farm program. They wanted to say what this has meant to them, and they want to get their side of the story presented to the American Congress and before the American people.

Mr. MICHENER. The gentleman answered the question when he stated he did not know.

Mr. JONES. I do not know, but I do know they will speak as farmers and for farmers.

Mr. MICHENER. That is all there is to the matter then.

Mr. JONES. But I do know that many others have come here representing their own interests, and these people have a perfect right to come here under any circumstance. The right of petition is a sacred right. It is sacred to the farmers as well as to anyone else.

Mr. HOEPEL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HOEPEL. Is it true that legislation will shortly be reported to the House providing that 30 percent of the tariff revenues shall be turned over as a subsidy of some kind to the farmers?

Mr. JONES. No; that is not true. There will be a bill reported which will undertake to restore to the farmers a sum equal to the portion of the tariff that has been taken away from them for the past 50 years, but that is not a subsidy—that is restitution.

Mr. HOEPPEL. In reference to this later petition, may I ask the gentleman if he has ever contemplated and visualized the large letter of thanks and gratitude which this Congress would receive from the veterans of America if we would give to them the bonus payment which is justly due them?

Mr. JONES. I would rather not mix this program with that program. The gentleman knows how I feel in reference to the bonus matter. This is simply an invitation on behalf of some 2,000 farmers from more than 25 different States in the Union, producing a great variety of crops affected by the farm program, who want to tell us what they think about it, and I think we owe them the courtesy of attending.

Mr. DONDERO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. DONDERO. Can the gentleman inform the House how many farmers have been aided throughout the Nation by this program?

Mr. JONES. It is very difficult to give the exact number that have been aided.

Mr. DONDERO. Just roughly.

Mr. JONES. There are more than a million cotton farmers, more than a million wheat farmers, and, I understand, more than a million corn-hog farmers who have been aided. There are about 3,000,000 who have received benefit payments, some of them on more than one commodity. In addition, several hundred thousand have benefited from marketing agreements.

Mr. DONDERO. I thought, perhaps, the gentleman had the figures in the aggregate.

Mr. JONES. I do not have the number exactly, but they have all been helped directly or indirectly. [Applause.]

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN].

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], who just concluded, took the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] rather severely to task because the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] on the floor here ventured to criticize some of the policies of the majority party; but before the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] finished he stated, as I recall, that this was the proper place for criticism.

By what stretch of the imagination the gentleman from Texas can charge the gentleman from Pennsylvania with inciting a letter of the kind that the gentleman from Texas now has in his files, I cannot understand, because there is no connection between the reasoning of the two, if there be any reasoning in the letter which the gentleman has.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Just for a question.

Mr. BLANTON. All attacks on the President right now incite others to make attacks; not high-class gentlemen like our friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH], but they incite the vicious to make the kind of vicious attacks that only the vicious can make.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Then must everyone keep still and say nothing, utter no words of criticism or no words of disagreement? Must gentlemen over on the other side, in the Senate, remain silent if they disagree, because if they say anything by way of criticism, someone, somewhere, crazy, idiotic, may gather encouragement and make a violent and unjustifiable attack?

Mr. BLANTON. I disagree sometime with the President. I am going to vote to override him on the bonus and I voted against him on prohibition. But I do not attack him. I believe in him. I am helping him all I can.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I did not yield for a speech.

Mr. BLANTON. But I think that no one should attack him in a way that would bring about vicious attacks from moral degenerates like the moral pervert in New York, whose letter I read. I never attack him when I disagree with him.

Mr. HOFFMAN. No; you are loyal to the President. The Members on this side are loyal to the President. Time and again here in open session many of you, not the Member just speaking, but others, have stated that you rode into office on his coat tails; that you were for him 100 percent; that whatever he wanted you were willing to give him; and yet when it comes to this question of a bonus, which he no doubt honestly and conscientiously believes he should veto, what do you do? You postpone the vote over in the Senate to give Father Coughlin a chance to whip him into line. You turn loose over there in the Senate a gentleman who, in almost the vilest language a man can use, portrays him as guilty of the most disreputable actions, and charges him with improper and dishonorable motives, and all without foundation in fact; and you do it to intimidate that President to whom you claim loyalty and whom you say you support 100 percent. You support him 100 percent all down the line except when it is on something that may interfere with your political future, and then you follow your own judgment. Let him do the same.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I will yield for a question.

Mr. BLANTON. I was here 15 years before the President became President and I was pledged for 12 years to my constituents on the bonus question before he ever became President.

Mr. HOFFMAN. No one finds any fault with that, and I intend to vote to override his veto, but I was elected on a platform that pledged my vote for the bonus. My point is this: Vote as you like, vote as you believe, but why hold the bill up over there to give opportunity for all this pressure to be brought upon him? Why try to intimidate him? Why try to force his hand? Why send out an appeal to the people of the country to write him, to wire him? Why ask their support to coerce him?

If he believes, as his utterances would indicate, that he should not sign the measure providing for the bonus, let him follow that course. That is his prerogative. Why insult him by intimating that a veto will cost him political support? Surely you do not believe for one moment that such a thought would be given consideration by him. If you do, you have less confidence in his sincerity of purpose than has any Republican.

My thought is this—regardless of whether he attempts to impose his will upon us, let us treat him as fairly as we wish to be treated; let us set an example; let us leave him free to act. We all know what will happen, so why not send the measure over from the Senate? Let the President perform his duty. The House will then override that veto and let the measure go to the Senate, where each Senator can assume the responsibility which none will attempt to evade.

Mr. BLANTON. I am more against all that "hokey" over there than is the gentleman.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Not with me you are not. I have noticed this about the gentleman from Texas, and I know of no one for whom I have greater admiration. I have learned many things since coming here in January, listening to the instruction which the gentleman has given from the floor, and this is one thing I have noticed—that he assumes this attitude always—the old, old attitude expressed hundreds of years ago—by the verse: "God, I thank Thee that I am not as other men are, * * * or even as this publican." You recognize from whence came that thought?

So when you criticize the gentleman from Pennsylvania, ask yourself this: Is there anyone in this House who exercises his right to criticize more than the gentleman from Texas; if so, I know not who it is? Hardly a day passes that the gentleman from Texas does not here rise and take the newspapers to task and lambaste them up one side and down the other because of some political comment printed therein. Whether he does it so they will again criticize him the next day or whether he still has hopes of converting them, I know not. It must be one or the other and if it be the latter, it is a forlorn hope.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] will tell the gentleman that he and I are the best of friends, and that I have the highest regard for him.

Mr. RICH. If the gentleman will permit, that is one statement on which I agree with the gentleman 100 percent, but the statement made by President Roosevelt and the promises in the Democratic platform he is not carrying out, but the gentleman from Texas and I agree on many things and I admire the gentleman greatly.

Mr. HOFFMAN. That is to say, brother Members, they both agree that the country cannot get along without their services. [Laughter.]

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ARNOLD] said that the Republicans never offered any constructive criticism. A peculiar thing is noticeable, and that is that every time we do offer any criticism of that kind, you always say, "What did Hoover do?"

By way of illustration, note this: When my mother caught me with jam on my face and I offered the excuse that sister took the jam jar off the shelf, it never worked. That excuse got me nothing but the deserved "whaling."

If, in my youthful days, I was guilty of sucking eggs, does that furnish any excuse for your sheep stealing? If Hoover did something that was not right, does that give you a reason for your misdeeds? If, under Hoover's administration, there was a deficit of three or four billion, does that furnish you an alibi for a deficit of thirty or forty billion which you will pile up before you have finished with your orgy of spending? If some Republican was guilty of a misdeed in the past, is that a justification for a systematized, organized raiding of the public Treasury and the wholesale purchasing of votes by the expenditure of public moneys for a multitude of purposes? Can you justify your deliberate, continuous course of conduct in piling up a debt so great that the mind of man cannot comprehend the total by referring to errors of judgment, if there were such, made by a preceding administration? Yet that is the answer you always make when driven into a position where the unsoundness of your program is apparent.

If we go back into the records of history, if we take out our dirty linen and wash it in public, as they say, what party was it that once nearly wrecked the Nation because that party honestly believed that State rights were superior to Federal rights?

What are you doing now? You turn square about and say that the Federal Government shall do everything, have all the power, take all the power away from the States, grasp, hold, and exercise all of the powers of self-government reserved by the States for themselves.

That course, followed to its ultimate conclusion, means this and nothing less: That in the end we have not the United States of America, but we have a supreme Federal Government, and at the top a dictator or a small group, which will be our master.

Let us quit calling each other names and forget about things gone by. Give us on this side the credit for trying, not for being—that, for you, might be impossible—for trying to be as honest and conscientious as you gentlemen on your side believe yourselves to be.

Cannot you conceive that somebody on this side has a home, that someone on this side has property, that we want to do something for the good of all, that every time we open our mouths on this side it is not for abuse?

A great weekly, which for many months could see only good, only perfection, in the President's program, was finally driven, on November 3, 1934, in an editorial in Collier's Weekly headed "Too Many Democrats", to write—and let me quote:

Unquestionably, however, there are too many new-deal Democrats and Republicans in the Seventy-third Congress. The country and the administration would be better served by a more even distribution of liberals and conservatives on Capitol Hill.

The Congress elected 2 years ago was overwhelmingly Democratic. On every important measure, except payments to veterans and the St. Lawrence waterway, the administration was able to muster irresistible majorities.

In the past two sessions little real debate has been heard. On most matters Congress sought merely to learn what Mr. Roosevelt wanted. A word from the White House was sufficient to marshal the votes and to determine the law.

This is a burden and a responsibility too heavy to be borne by any man, however gifted and public spirited. Congress, under our form of government, must be capable of thought as well as of action. A rubber-stamp Congress, writing obediently every suggestion or preference of the White House into the law, is a poor Congress.

There is great danger that the excessive majorities of the present Congress will be foolishly increased at the November election. The congressional campaigns have been sorry affairs. Too many candidates of both parties have been appealing to what may be fairly called the mendicant vote. With utter lack of responsibility candidates are seeking to buy votes with larger and less scrupulous distribution of Federal funds.

This is politics of the basest sort. Of course, the hungry must be fed and sheltered and clothed, but candidates who can think of nothing better than reaching deeper into the public till are poor servants even of those they promise to relieve.

No better service could be rendered the country or the administration than the election of more Senators and Representatives able to say "no" as well as "yes" and to act in the national interest regardless of all lesser considerations.

And at the November election the people did elect a few more Republicans, Michigan taking the lead and pointing the way toward prosperity by electing Republicans to replace Democrats.

And so, when we had a bill up here and you Jeffersonian Democrats needed a few votes to put into it a sound, a conservative proposition, you came across the aisle, and helpful as we always are, we gave them to you. Strange as it may seem, I found myself voting with my friend BLANTON. Of course, I would not say that he was voting with the Republicans.

So give us credit for that little help and for other instances where we came to your rescue and saved your legislation from those on your own side who would have rendered it unworkable.

Again, on December 15, Collier's Weekly, in another editorial headed "Still More Democrats", made these statements referring to the election returns:

This is a flattering testimonial of public favor, but it renders even more difficult the already heart-breaking responsibilities which rest upon the Chief Executive. Mr. Roosevelt in the next Congress will have to be not only the leader of his own party but also the only effectual opposition to the silliness and extravagance of the "crackpots" among the lawmakers.

In his private moments the President might well wish to trade a little of his popularity for a brace of durable opposition debaters in Congress.

The Democrats seemed to be permanently discarded. Governor James Cox, of Ohio, then John W. Davis, West Virginian and New York lawyer, and, finally, Alfred E. Smith, the popular Al Smith, of the New York streets, all entered the lists and all were vanquished.

So we shall have a Congress filled with men who want to make a spectacular showing of their zeal for the new deal. Various harebrained proposals are inevitable.

The minority, small as it is, attempts on every occasion to give the President all possible aid on every sound, constructive, progressive measure, but it refuses to be stamped by the old battle cries which influenced the last Congress, and it is not yet ready to surrender the liberties, the rights, granted by the Constitution.

Too Many Democrats and Still More Democrats. The first editorial had over it a cartoon with the Democratic mule drawing the Republican elephant suspended in the traces between the mule and the singletree. The second had the mule running away with Uncle Sam and dragging the elephant on the end of a string.

True, we have been dragged, but we are still unsubdued, for we realize that in the end the common sense of the voters will prevail. Yes; there are still too many Democrats, not only for us but too many for some of you over on that side, for you will find the bitterest criticism of the President and his policies coming from your own untamed Members.

Coming back to what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ARNOLD] said about us, that we never offer any constructive criticism; is that true? Is it not possible that once in a while we think of something and give utterance to something that might be helpful? What about it? We have said time and time again, and so have others, that we think this vast expenditure of public money should be stopped. We think and have suggested that you follow the statement of the President when he was a candidate and try to balance the Budget. If it be suggested that you plug the hole in a sinking ship to save it, is that constructive criticism?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Yes; for a question, but not for a speech.

Mr. BLANTON. I refer the gentleman to his Republican colleague from New York [Mr. TABER], whom Democrats have followed many times on his constructive fights he has made here. He has led us. I do not hesitate to say that I have followed him many times. He has made some wonderful fights here. When you Republicans make constructive fights, we Democrats are with you. It is only when you try to tear down that we do not follow you.

Mr. HOFFMAN. That is all beside this point, and is just what the gentleman always does when a Member is speaking. The gentleman wants to talk about something else. My argument was this, that we Republicans who are here today do occasionally—I say occasionally, so get that please—once in a great while have a constructive thought which we try to utter.

We also suggested that you live within your income? Is that constructive or is it not? Surely you must admit that it is. Then there is another idea we have had in our minds and tried to give utterance to, and that is that our Government should be honest, that when it makes a promise it should stand by it. Is that constructive? We think that it should stop deceiving the people and that it ought not to do again as it did when this administration first went into power. Within 3 months, I think it was, the administration issued written promises to pay in gold dollars $600,000,000. Then when June rolled around, or about that time, the Government repudiated those promises. How in the wide, wide world can you expect anyone, any man with money, any man with property, to risk it in business, retail, manufacturing, or any other kind of business, when he does not know what you are going to do, when he does not know whether you are going to abide by your written word, whether you adopted the Kaiser's thought—"an agreement is just a scrap of paper."

If those things are not constructive, then I do not know what constructive criticism could possibly be.

Another thing we suggested once or twice, and that is that you have this Government one of law, so that someone would know what it is all about. We all remember how a certain case in the Supreme Court went through the Federal district court and through the circuit court of appeals and finally up here to the Supreme Court, only to have that Court discover that there was no law under which the injunction which had been issued could be granted. A Federal action and a Federal prohibition under and for the violation of a Federal law which did not exist. What an absurdity. Why not have our people governed by laws written on paper, so that every man might read and know?

There is another thing you always ask, and that is, When did Republicans try to relieve suffering humanity? Read your history. There never was an occasion to grant wholesale Federal relief by the spending of one taxpayer's money for benefit of another until some good Democrat conceived the idea of using public funds for political advantage. Coming down here from a little country town, hardly out of it before, I only knew that in our town those in want were always taken care of; none was permitted to suffer; and that was true of the county and the State, taken care of by our own people; and it remained for the Federal Government to give relief to almost everyone who wanted it, to coax onto the relief rolls some who were only too glad to quit their work and accept Federal aid. It remained for the Federal Government to compete with the farmer in the hiring of labor, offering relief greater than the farmer could pay for work.

Continually you talk about Mr. Hoover. Was it not Mr. Hoover who during the World War and after administered relief, gave out clothing, fed hundreds of thousands of people in the old country and all without a hint of waste or the taint of scandal?

Compare what he did there, if you wish to make a comparison, with the manner of the administration of your relief funds. True, he only furnished food, clothing, medical supplies, the necessities of life, and you furnish dancing lessons, teach bridge playing, and some other of the higher things of life, but these things you add to the necessities with the money you take from the taxpayer who is working, trying to support and maintain himself.

For months, whenever a Republican ventured to disagree with any of the so-called "new-deal legislation", he has been accused of lacking in human sympathy, honesty, and of being a tool of "the big business interests, the international bankers, Wall Street."

The truth of his contention that the so-called "new deal" was not a new deal, lifting us out of the depression, that much of it was a waste of public money, is now admitted by many prominent Democrats.

The announced purpose of the new deal was a more abundant life for the underprivileged, and, incidentally, happiness, prosperity, and security for all. With this purpose everyone is in accord, and there is nothing new about it, for it is only the same thought which moved the framers of the Declaration of Independence, Washington and the statesmen of his day.

The difference between that day and this lies not in the objectives sought but in the method of accomplishment. Our forefathers believed in attaining their object by industry, thrift, and a regard for the rights of others. The "new dealers", the "share-the-wealth" exponents, and similar groups seek to accomplish their purpose by taking from those who have and giving to those who have less, regardless of merit and often of necessity, and this so far they have sought to accomplish by means of excessive taxation and by the granting of special privileges and allotments of public funds to special classes.

That their course cannot continue indefinitely has been pointed out not only by Republicans during the last 2 years but by many Democrats, such as ex-Gov. Al Smith, former Governor Ritchie, Bainbridge Colby, Wilson's Secretary of State; Newton Baker, his Secretary of War; and Senator Glass of Virginia.

More recently other prominent Democrats, including Governor Talmadge of Georgia, Governor Curley of Massachusetts, Senator Byrd of Virginia, Senator Tydings of Maryland have sought to advise the President, to save their party and the Government from its folly.

All of these last-named gentlemen have everything to lose, nothing to gain, by their disagreement with the President; hence, their criticism may be viewed as being made with reluctance, only given because they see and realize the danger.

Senator BYRD recently pointed out that approximately 40 percent of the total income of the American people during the last year was paid to various governments in some form of taxation, this as compared to 8 percent paid in 1913. He added that the "administration's squandering of billions of dollars" amounts to nothing short of a mortgage upon all the people's properties and that the only money the United States Government can spend on its recovery programs must necessarily be derived from direct taxation.

Secretary Wallace has admitted that the A. A. A. was a "political expediency." Senator BYRD pointed out that Secretary Wallace now seeks to gain control over all the farmers of America, and impose upon them a licensing system. He added:

Imagine a farmer who grows a perishable crop waiting for the unwinding of redtape at Washington, thousands of miles away, before he can ship a product that will spoil in a few hours.

Senator TYDINGS said:

We cannot go on running the Government on "hot air", on money pulled down from the heavens, which the taxpayers will have to pay back.

A billion dollars is treated just the same as if it were a hundred thousand, and as if we can spend and borrow our way out of the depression. There is not a man who believes in his heart we can do that. There are dozens of Senators who echo "I agree with you" in their heart of hearts. Perhaps their party loyalty is a little stronger than mine.

Referring to the Democratic platform, he made these observations:

That was the platform upon which we were all elected. It promised a revival of world trade. It promised a balanced Budget. It promised to pay as we went. I have not seen any election since which has altered the promises which we made in that platform.

Unless we about-face and walk back toward sanity, we will rue the day and realize that silence was not the part of friendship, the part of patriotism, or the way to assist in getting out of the depression.

Of the many promises contained in that platform, promises used to secure the election of the present Democratic majority, well might he have asked, "How many have we kept?" And the answer would have been, would it not, "None"?

Always, in the House of Representatives, when a Republican opposes an administration measure, he is charged with being merely a destructive critic and asked what he or the Republican Party has to offer.

Conceding that the Republican Party has its faults, it has, nevertheless, offered something in the place of the so-called "new-deal legislation." Republicans suggest, as did the Democrats when they sought office, a balancing of the Budget, as Senator TYDINGS says, "a paying as you go", a keeping of promises, the ceasing of interference with the small business man, the abandonment of the attempt to regulate nature and the production of foodstuffs, a conservation of the surplus of food, rather than its destruction.

Read this—part of an address delivered by Franklin D. Roosevelt on March 2, 1930:

The doctrine of regulation and legislation by "master minds", in whose judgment and will all the people may gladly and quietly acquiesce, has been too glaringly apparent at Washington during these last 10 years.

Were it possible to find "master minds" so unselfish, so willing to decide unhesitatingly against their own personal interests or private prejudices, men almost godlike in their ability to hold the scales of justice with an even hand—such a government might be to the interests of the country.

But there are none such on our political horizon and we cannot expect a complete reversal of all the teachings of history.

Yet, no sooner was he elected than, ignoring those who made the Democratic Party, those who had labored in the campaigns and won the victory which placed him in his office, the President began to call around him those who were known successively as the "professors", the "brain trusters", the "master minds"; and now, as the "brain stormers", listening to, guided by them; ignoring the men of experience, those with records of performance, of accomplishment, of deeds.

And now read this, from page 541 of the book by Tgwel, one of Roosevelt's "master minds":

For many years the technical task of devising plans for regulating our complex economic interests was too difficult to attempt. But today we know that this is no longer true, for Russia has shown that planning is practicable.

What do you think of it, you folks of the Fourth Congressional District? One of the men in charge, one of the "master minds" using Russia as his yardstick, as his pattern? And this is Democratic doctrine.

From the Washington Herald of May 11, 1935, the paper of William Randolph Hearst, the President's personal friend and political sponsor, we quote this:

Russia, groveling in degradation, terrorized, oppressed, starved, and dead to even the hope or aspiration for freedom.

This Tugwell speaks of the difficulty in attaining the "experimental habit of mind." He explains it as due to "the unreasoning, almost hysterical, attachment of certain Americans to the Constitution."

It is such disloyalty, of which we so often get glimpses in the "new dealers", which accounts for the changed public attitude toward the new deal itself.

Thoughtful Americans are fed up with these overcapitalized fakers.

Let us have done with the antics of the "brain stormers!" Let us have done with their parrot speeches and dunce-born proposals! Let us get down to tacks!

Release the constructive, positive forces in which American life is so rich, Mr. President. They are tugging for outlet.

There are plenty of men who could genuinely assist you and not lead you into the bog.

Call them around you! They will bring confidence to your side. Cease fighting your country's strength. Encourage it—don't discourage it. Release its saving and abundant energies.

Let the United States function! Let it operate!

If you have the independence and insight to do this, your troubles will quickly lessen—and so will those of your loyal and much-enduring fellow countrymen.

The above quotations are not my statements; they were made by the President's friend, seeking to rescue him, to set his feet on the right road, the road to real, honest prosperity and security.

Yet, in spite of all this good advice, the steam roller goes on and every week sees the House of Representatives pass in some form or other new legislation increasing the power of the "brain stormers", giving them more of your money to waste, to spend.

And the end is not yet. We now learn that $4,000,000,000, a sum so vast that your mind cannot grasp the meaning, is to be turned over to one man and by him parceled out to his advisers for expenditure.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TRUAX].

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Chairman, it is always a pleasure to work with and cooperate with my distinguished colleague and friend from Indiana, Hon. LOUIS LUDLOW, Chairman of the Subcommittee on Appropriations, reporting this bill making appropriations for the legislative branches of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and for other purposes. This appropriation bill provides funds for the various and sundry activities of the Congress of the United States consisting of the House of Representatives and the Senate. The gentleman from Indiana is always honest and conscientious in his activities and I am pleased to state that invariably he is on the liberal or progressive side of all legislation.

I first became acquainted somewhat intimately with the gentleman from Indiana in 1924. That was the year of that historic Democratic National Convention that lasted for 3 weeks in the city of New York. That was the year that the Democratic party engaged for 3 weeks in a knock-down, drag-out fight over candidates and issues. That was the year that I served as a delegate to that convention, was secretary of the Ohio delegation, and acting as reading clerk on several occasions in that convention I called the roll of States on the one hundred and third, or final ballot, that resulted in the nomination for President of Hon. John W. Davis, of New York and Wall Street. That is not to say, however, that I consider that as redounding to the credit of myself or to the credit of the gentleman from Indiana. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW] was not a delegate to the convention as I was. He was a well-known and prominent newspaper correspondent for leading Ohio newspapers. He was at that time, as I recall it, writing for the Columbus Dispatch, Columbus, Ohio. In that convention way back in 1924, I was fighting for the farmer, the laboring man, and the small business man. The gentleman from Indiana was found then as now and always battling for the human rights of the common people as against the property rights of the aristocratic and overprivileged few.

Mr. Chairman, I was interested in what the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] just said. I was interested to learn that he comes from a small town. So do I. I was interested to have the observation that he just made about Herbert Hoover as a relief administrator during the war.

No one, in my humble judgment, has any right to criticize at this time any of Mr. Hoover's administration of relief during the war. He did a splendid job of it, but at the same time, through his authority over food matters, he was one of the few men down here at Washington who was responsible for the price of the farmer's wheat being fixed at $2.20 a bushel when it would have gone to $5 or possibly $10 per bushel had that act of Congress been made a minimum price rather than a maximum price, as was intended by Congress and as was intended by President Woodrow Wilson. By that act of Mr. Hoover and his associates in the Food Administration the wheat farmers of America were robbed of billions of dollars.

Mr. Hoover's administration of relief to millions of American needy was a far different story, my friends. You will recall that under Mr. Hoover's administration, as under Roosevelt's, one of the burning, vital issues was the bonus. Under Mr. Hoover's administration the veterans of this country, the veterans of the World War, instead of receiving any sympathetic consideration from the Congress, the President, or from anybody else, were evicted from the Capital of this Nation at the point of bayonets, at the end of guns by the United States Army, ordered out and into action by Herbert C. Hoover, then President of the United States.

You will recall that when preceding Congresses were considering the appropriation of huge sums of money for the feeding of the people of this country, that Mr. Hoover was unalterable in his opposition to those measures. He was quite willing, my friends, to appropriate hundreds of thousands of dollars for the feeding of the livestock of the farmers in distressed areas; he was quite willing to do that. He was quite willing to appropriate money for the relief of the farmer's hogs, his bulls, his horses, and his jackasses, but he was unalterably opposed to the use of money for the filling of human stomachs or the clothing of naked human bodies.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRUAX. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. This morning the minority leader gave great credit to ex-President Hoover for initiating the R. F. C. If the gentleman remembers, the R. F. C. in the first instance was authorized only to lend to railroads, banks, insurance companies, and mortgage companies. That is the extent to which the Hoover administration went in lending money to business, industry, or any other source of production.

Mr. TRUAX. The gentleman is quite right. I am not, of course, fully in accord with the policies of the R. F. C. during the present administration; and as a protest, though not with any hope that my vote might change the policy of the R. F. C. or the use to which the billions of dollars already disbursed by that agency have been put, I voted against the so-called "administration banking bill", and I would vote the same way again, Mr. Chairman, because I am one of those who believe if ever we are to call a halt to the nefarious practices of the banker racketeers of this country, if ever we are to restore our constitutional prerogative of coining and issuing money and regulating its value, we certainly cannot accomplish it by continually voting for every banking bill that goes through here designed solely and purely for the bankers of the country and not for the poor people who deposit and lose their money in the banks.

Some Member asked: "Why do you always rise and ask what Hoover did?" The reason the question is asked so often, Mr. Chairman, is because it is a question that is quite unanswerable. No one ever has been able to answer that question; no one ever will be able to answer that question. What did Hoover do for the common people of the country? It is unanswerable; there is no answer to it.

Mr. Chairman, we have heard from the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who is a friend of mine, about the farmers of his district. He said that they are a fine lot of farmers, and I know he is right. He said that the farmers of his district never have received any money from the Government. I am glad to hear that, but I would like the gentleman from Pennsylvania to answer this—I am sorry he is not here—I would ask him what the farmers of his district received for their commodities during the administration of Mr. Hoover.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, was the gentleman from Ohio referring to me as the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. TRUAX. Yes; I was. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania what his farmers received for hogs during the last year of Hoover?

Mr. RICH. I may state to the gentleman—

Mr. TRUAX. I want a direct answer.

Mr. RICH. I will answer the gentleman. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that during the administration of Mr. Hoover and during past administrations—

Mr. TRUAX. No; during Hoover's last year. What was the price of hogs?

Mr. RICH. We were always taught to increase our crops, to increase our cotton; but during the Democratic administration we are taught to destroy our hogs and to destroy our cotton.

Mr. TRUAX. Why does not the gentleman from Pennsylvania answer my question?

Mr. RICH. Never during a Republican administration were we taught to destroy; that was considered wrong in principle.

Mr. TRUAX. The gentleman refuses to answer. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania what was the price of cattle during the last year of Hoover?

Mr. RICH. The result of the policies of the present administration is that we are unable to get commodities today.

Mr. TRUAX. The gentleman has not answered me yet.

I will give the gentleman the information, since he declines to answer. The farmers in Pennsylvania, the gentleman's State, and in the State of Ohio, my State, were getting some 2½ cents a pound for hogs. They were getting from 2½ to 4 cents a pound for fat steers. They were getting from 10 to 20 cents a bushel for corn. They were getting around 10 cents a bushel for oats. That was under Hoover.

What are they getting now? I find by looking over the market reports of yesterday that fat cattle in Cleveland, Ohio, brought from 11½ to 13 cents per pound; hogs brought an average of $9.35 per 100. That is without the processing tax of $2.25. Mr. Chairman, this makes a total of $11.60 a hundred for hogs. This is under the Roosevelt administration. Corn sold on the Chicago Board of Trade yesterday for 90 cents a bushel. Oats sold on the Chicago Board of Trade yesterday for 48 cents a bushel, and every other farm commodity in this great country of ours has shown similar advances under the administration of Franklin D. Roosevelt.

Mr. Chairman, I am not one in this Chamber who will plead guilty to the charge of the gentlemen on the other side of the aisle who say that all we Democrats rode in on the coattails of Roosevelt. I refuse to be placed in that class. I refuse to say that I as a Representative at large from the State of Ohio came in on the coattails of Franklin D. Roosevelt, and I cite the statistics of the 1932 election to prove my assertion. Mr. Roosevelt carried the State of Ohio by a majority of about 74,000 votes. It should have been much larger, I admit, but because of certain deals that were made in Ohio by certain Democratic politicians in which they traded the Democratic candidate for Governor for the Democratic candidate for President of the United States, the candidate for President of the United States suffered severely. While the Democratic candidate for Governor of the State of Ohio in 1932 received a majority of over 200,000, Mr. Roosevelt had a majority of only 74,000. It was my good fortune to have a majority over my opponent of nearly 100,000 votes, to be exact about 97,000. The same thing occurred again in 1934. My majority not only stood where it was in 1932, but increased in that year to about 157,000.

Mr. EKWALL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRUAX. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. EKWALL. Did the gentleman go back to Ohio during the sessions?

Mr. TRUAX. During the session?

Mr. EKWALL. Yes; or did he stay here all that time?

Mr. TRUAX. I did not go home very often. I think it is my job to stay here and work.

Mr. EKWALL. That is why the gentleman had a greater majority, probably.

Mr. TRUAX. I thank the gentleman for his observation.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRUAX. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. O'CONNOR. What does the gentleman predict for 1936? It should be 250,000.

Mr. EKWALL. It should be, but it will not.

Mr. TRUAX. Does the gentleman mean my majority or the majority of the President?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I mean the gentleman's plurality.

Mr. TRUAX. I would prefer to take that up a little later.

Mr. Chairman, I have not been one of those who go blindly along at all times upon any and all measures presented here simply because the President tells me that I ought to go along that way. I am in the same class as my friend from Texas [Mr. BLANTON]. I was one who voted for the soldiers' bonus. I was one who voted to override the President's veto on veterans' pension legislation. I, like my friend the gentlemen from Texas, had certain commitments of a previous nature that I felt bound in duty and in honor to observe. There also had existed in me for a great many years a feeling of cooperation for the fellow who is down and out, the man who really needs our help, the man who is without a job, the man who has lost his business, the man who has lost his home, the man who has lost his farm, and for those more than 4,000,000 heroic young men who went across the Atlantic to fight the battles of our country. Mr. Chairman, some would have us believe that those men went over there to fight the battle to make the world safe for democracy. It turned out to be a question of fighting that battle to make Wall Street safe for plutocracy. I was one of those who believed it to be his duty, regardless of what the President of the United States thought, and regardless of what the head of the Democratic Party might think, to go along with those whom I felt I should support, and for whom I expect to do all I can to see that they get a square deal in this country.

Mr. Chairman, mention has been made of the bankers. I have been accused at various times of saying some mean things about the bankers of this country. I somewhat resent that charge. It is true that I have said some things that might have sounded to others like being mean, but at the same time the statements that I have made have been the truth. One of the meanest statements I have ever made about the bankers of this country is when I said that after Mr. Roosevelt came into office he found it necessary to close up all the banks in this country and sort out the goats from the sheep in order to cut out the racketeer bankers so that they would be prevented from stealing all of the taxpayers' money. I also said that after Mr. Hoover stepped out of the President's office many banks found it necessary to adopt a new policy. That policy was this: From now on, from the time Mr. Roosevelt was inaugurated President, the new policy was to be that burglar alarms were to be placed on the inside instead of on the outside of the banks, as formerly.

Mr. Chairman, I want to discuss for a moment a subject that is uppermost in every clear-thinking, liberal progressive in this great Congress. I refer to the so-called "bonus issue." The House of Representatives passed the Patman bill by a large majority, and this is not the first time the same bill has been passed by the House of Representatives by a large majority.

It is an old issue, an issue that is well understood by a great majority of the Members of this House, an issue that is now understood well by a great majority of all the American people. They know, today, Mr. Chairman, as many of us who are friends of this bill have known for some time, that the real issue at stake in the proposed acceptance of the Patman bill or what might turn out to be the veto of the Patman bill, that the issue which worries the people who have been accustomed to a Government of the rich, by the rich, and for the rich, the issue that they oppose, is the right of the Congress of the United States and the right of the Government of the United States to take away this unconstitutional and illegal privilege of the bankers of this country. This right they have stolen and usurped of issuing currency and drawing interest thereon. This is the real issue that is at stake.

This great mass of American people is composed of 80,000,000 persons and you could repeat after General Johnson, when he said there are 80,000,000 cry babies. He is opposed to the Patman bill and that is what he called 80,000,000 people who are sorely in distress. These people want the Patman bill enacted into law. They do not want a bankers' bill, they do not want a Vinson bill, they do not want a Harrison bill—

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRUAX. I yield.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Will the gentleman state to the House what, in his opinion, will be the effect upon President Roosevelt in his campaign for reelection next year if he vetoes the so-called "bonus legislation"?

Mr. TRUAX. Now, my friend from West Virginia knows that he should not ask me that question. Let him answer it himself.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I will withdraw the question. I simply wanted to ask the gentleman, but I will withdraw it.

Mr. TRUAX. I will say this, Mr. Chairman. I am not one of those who is ready to believe, at this time, that the President will veto the Patman bonus bill. I am unwilling to believe that. I think he may have received bad advice at certain times—

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Ohio 10 additional minutes.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRUAX. I yield.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. If the President vetoes the bill, which we expect him to do, how is he going to be consistent in the gentleman's mind with what he said about driving the money changers out of the temple?

Mr. TRUAX. If the gentleman will read my remarks, I think of last Friday, on the banking bill, he will find that question fully covered.

You understand that I do not favor the so-called "Eccles bill." I voted against it, and the gentleman knows, as other Members know, that I would not vote against a bill that would be for the benefit of all the people and not for the benefit of a few selfish, greedy bankers.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I want to join the gentleman from Ohio in the hope that the President will not veto the bonus legislation.

Mr. TRUAX. I say to the gentleman it is high time for each and every Member of the Congress of the United States to assert his own prerogative, to stand up here and vote the way he thinks he should vote and the way he should vote for the best interests of the people back home, regardless of what somebody tells him is the way he ought to vote or ought not to vote, and that is exactly what I propose to do, Mr. Chairman.

The President of the United States has his own responsibility to the people. I have mine. I am doing a good job if I take care of my own responsibilities in the manner which my judgment dictates they should be discharged.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRUAX. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. And the executive department is a separate and distinct department from the legislative branch of the Government. The President has his duties to perform and we have no right to tell him what he shall do. We have our duties to perform and he has no right to tell us what we shall do. And neither we nor the President has any right to tell the Supreme Court what it shall do, as all three are separate, distinct branches of the Government.

Mr. TRUAX. The gentleman from Texas is right. We have no more right to tell him what he should do than we have a right to tell the United States Supreme Court what they should or should not do. We have just heard mentioned on the floor of the House, by the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR], and others, the tremendous power that is vested oftentimes in one member of the Supreme Court of the United States. They make decisions that do not suit me and do not suit my constituents. I fear they may make a decision possibly today or tomorrow or quite soon that will not suit me on the Frazier-Lemke farm bankruptcy bill, but I shall vote for the merits of that bill, for the justness involved in that measure as long as I am able to utter a sound, and it matters not to me what the Supreme Court may say about that measure or about other measures; it matters not to me what the President of the United States, whether he be a Democrat or a Republican, may say about the bonus bill, I still have my convictions and shall exercise them in the manner in which I think they should be exercised.

As I said a while ago, I think the President of the United States now has had much bad advice on veterans' measures. I am like our old friend Will Rogers, the humorist, "All I know is what I read in the newspapers", and I read in the newspapers a few days ago that the President called into conference several men to consider and weigh the possibilities involved in a possible veto, which is just what the gentlemen present have asked in their questions. I cannot answer for the President. I only know what I read in the newspapers. I read that the President held a conference with Gen. Frank T. Hines, and I think everybody here will agree that Gen. Frank T. Hines is not just what you would call a real, honest friend of war veterans.

I think that legislation that has been brought in on the floor of this House, legislation that has been enacted into law by this House of Representatives and by the other branch at the other end of the Capitol—I think the legislation was unsound, unjust, and yet it had the approval and support of Mr. Hines.

Last week, as a member of the Committee on Pensions, we heard the testimony of General Hines on the pending bill to restore the pensions of Spanish War veterans.

I want to say that it was the first time I ever met General Hines. I was of the same opinion held by many Members of the House, that General Hines had horns on him, cloven feet, and was hard-boiled. Yet in fairness I want to say for the general that he is a mild-mannered, soft-spoken gentleman who would not impress you as being a swashbuckler or a leader of soldiers, but rather as a soft-spoken minister, and bald-headed at that. [Laughter.]

Now, the theory, which you can see is deeply imbedded in his philosophy, is this: Patriotism cannot be bought, nor can the soldier measure his services to the country in dollars and cents. He believes that the disabled war veteran, disabled in line of duty, should be taken care of. He believes that the man who served his country in its hour of need and was shocked or disabled because of sickness or an epidemic or pestilence should be amply taken care of, but in the general's opinion this man must prove his own service-connected disability. I am not in accord at all with General's Hines' theory or logic. War profiteers always measure their loyalty, patriotism, and services by the dollar mark. World War veterans ask only for what is justly due them, immediate payment of the bonus with the Government's own new currency.

Our friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. STACK], a member of the committee, after listening to General Hines' testimony, looked up in that quiet way of his and said, "Well, General, I take it after hearing your testimony, that if you can be sure that there will be nothing taken away from the Spanish War veterans under this bill you favor the bill?" General Hines said, "Not quite."

I think General Hines has been one of the closest advisers, not only of this President but President Hoover, President Coolidge, and President Harding, and naturally that position, that inherited position has its influence with those with whom he comes in contact.

Now, something has been said about Mr. Douglas, the former Budget Director. That was gone into by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH]. He said, if I recollect the words, that "Douglas has a heart, the same as the rest of us." That may be true, but if he has it is a banker's heart, my friends. [Laughter.]

There is another gentleman to whom I would refer. He is a friend of mine, and I call him a good friend of mine, our former colleague, Hon. Charles West, of Ohio, now the contact man for the President. The newspapers stated that he was in conference with the President, with General Hines, and some others. Although I do not in any way attempt to disparage the work of Mr. West, or his talent and ability, yet back in Ohio Charley had never been known exactly as a friend of the veteran. He voted against the soldiers' bonus. He voted for the Economy Act.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. West, to my best recollection, has always voted against the war veterans, so naturally he cannot be expected to be favorably influenced to favorable consideration of the Patman bill by its known and active enemies. I am in hope, Mr. Chairman, that after the conference of yesterday, reported by the press, our great President will rededicate himself to some of these finer motives, to the finest motives of our citizenship, namely, just consideration of the claims of the soldier.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRUAX. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. General Hines is an executive officer who has to administer the law as he finds it.

Mr. TRUAX. That is correct.

Mr. BLANTON. And doing that, from the gentleman's knowledge of him, is it not a fact that he is a man who is high class and a perfect gentleman, honest as he can be, and fair and just to every soldier in the United States under the law as he finds it? That is my experience with him and my opinion of him.

Mr. TRUAX. I would say to the gentleman from Texas that there is considerable thought among Members who present a lot of veteran claims that there is unfairness and discrimination and endless delay in some cases.

Mr. BLANTON. I think he is one of the fairest and most just administrators of the law that I have ever known. It is not his fault when the facts of a case do not come within the provisions of the law. He is forced under his oath to track the law, even if we do not like it.

Mr. TRUAX. Yes; but I would say to the gentleman that General Hines administers in favor of the Government, which says it proposes to save all the money that it can, and he does not administer in favor of the veteran who, in my judgment, is entitled to decent consideration by his Government.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRUAX. Yes.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Is it not a fact that whenever there is a doubt, despite the fact that he tried to be fair about it, that doubt is resolved in favor of the Government and against the veteran?

Mr. BLANTON. No; that is not true. I know of many cases where he resolved the doubt in favor of the veteran and against the Government. When his general counsel turned down Mrs. Roger Fenlaw, of Ranger, Tex., on her deceased husband's $10,000 insurance, and would not sign the papers allowing it, General Hines overruled him and forced payment of it, and Comptroller General McCarl upheld General Hines, and Mrs. Roger Fenlaw received her $10,000 insurance.

Mr. TRUAX. Oh, we expect an occasional exception to the rule. Mr. Chairman, Saturday night there was a debate over the air between the Honorable WRIGHT PATMAN, the author of the Patman bill, and a Mr. Hobart, head of the American Veterans' Association. The funny thing about it is that they could not get a man in this whole Congress who was willing to take the negative side of this debate, and they had to go to New York, and they found this fellow Hobart, who represents, I am told, one-fifth of 1 percent of all the veterans of this country, the American Veterans' Association. This fellow Hobart had some nasty things to say about men prominent in the public eye—and I was not one of them—because of what they had to say about this bill. He referred to Father Charles E. Coughlin as the "rabble-rousing priest." I would say to Mr. Hobart that if you get this Patman bill vetoed, and that veto is sustained, and if you get the Frazier-Lemke Farm Bankruptcy Act held unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of the United States, if you get a few negative actions of that kind on bills for the benefit of all the people, you will not have "rabble rousers", but you will have a horde of revolutionary hell-raisers that will let you know there is going to be something going on in this great country of ours.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has again expired.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 minutes more.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Chairman, the line of demarcation between the 3 percent who own 95 percent of the wealth, and the others who own the rest of the wealth is very marked. Someone said this afternoon, give us the figures to prove that 3 percent of the people own 95 percent of the wealth. I can give you some figures. In 1934 less than one-half of 1 percent of the people of this country paid any income tax. Now, can you figure that out? In a country of 125,000,000 people, less than 1½ percent of the population earn a net income if single of $1,000 a year, or if married a net income of $2,500 a year.

You are startled when you hear that thousands of people in this country ardently support Senator Huey P. Long. Do you wonder? Do you wonder that millions of people have signed up in his share-the-wealth clubs? Do you wonder that these people who constitute the 98½ percent who did not even make enough money to pay income taxes—you may call it fallacious, you may call it captious—but do you wonder that every time Father Coughlin sends his stirring voice over the ether millions of people listen in to hear what he has to say, not only this "rabble" that Mr. Hobart speaks of, not only the millions who have lost their homes, their farms, and their businesses, but millions more who today are hanging on by the skin of their teeth, expecting the loss of all they have ever gained in this world. Do you wonder they will listen to Huey Long? Do you wonder that they will listen to Father Coughlin? Even if Huey Long and Father Coughlin were out of the picture, these people still would be there; the sentiment is there; you cannot suppress it by belittling Father Coughlin or Huey Long; you have got to do something.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRUAX. I yield.

Mr. GREEN. From the demonstration of approval that the farmers of the Nation are bringing to Washington this week, would it not indicate that at least the farmers of the Nation are faring far better than they have in many, many years? So I am wondering whether that will not have the effect of stilling any troubled waters which may exist in the country.

Mr. TRUAX. The gentleman is partly right and partly wrong. As for the farmer who has been able to refinance his farm under the acts passed by this Congress and signed by the President; yes. Farm prices, as I mentioned a while ago, are from 4 to 5 times greater than they were 3 or 4 years ago; but let me remind the gentleman that when this administration came into office the farm-mortgage indebtedness amounted to $12,000,000,000. We have refinanced only about $3,000,000,000 of it, about one-quarter of it, 25 percent, and the farmer who has been foreclosed, the farmer who is threatened with foreclosure, the farmer who will be foreclosed if the Supreme Court declares this farm bankruptcy bill unconstitutional, is no better off than he was 5 years ago. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. EKWALL].

Mr. EKWALL. Mr. Chairman, I am a little concerned when I hear the Democratic brethren taking us to task on the Republican side because we dare to criticize the President of the United States. Since when has it become lese majesty to criticize the President if it is honest and fair? I have never heretofore taken the floor and for one minute criticized the President of the United States; but it has not been because I did not think he might not be entitled to some criticism or that I did not, as a Member of the House, have the right to criticize him.

The gentleman from Texas belabors us on the Republican side because we have the temerity to raise our voices at times against the President. The President is just the same as we are, just the same as every other man or woman in the vast army of Government employees; he is also just an employee; but I think he is a good man. As a matter of fact, I have always admired the President in many ways. When I was elected to Congress I told the folks out in my district that I would go along with the President as far as I reasonably could, but that if I disagreed with him I would retain my American right to do so and tell him about it. There is nothing un-American about that and nothing wrong. I have heard many Democratic Members criticize the President. The gentleman from Ohio just now said that he hoped the President would get back to rededicating himself to the noble principles he espoused when elected. I agree with the gentleman from Ohio. I, too, hope he does, because he had many fine, high-sounding principles. I do not say that he is not trying to bring about those reforms he promised, but I think he is going about some of them in a rather bunglesome manner. I believe he has made some mistakes and some failures, the same as any human being might.

I do not say that any of us are infallible. Neither do I concede that, so far as legislative brains are concerned, they are all on the Democratic side. You on your side have made mistakes and we on our side have made mistakes, and I think we are wasting a lot of valuable time when we try to intimate there is something wrong in criticism. That is partly what we are here for, and it seems to me that so long as the criticism is honest criticism there should be no odium attached to it.

My genial friend from Texas criticizes the newspapers. I think they are kidding him; they are constantly kidding him, and he is taking it seriously. [Laughter.] There is not one of us who does not like to get his name in the newspapers. I think Members like it; it gets their names before their constituents. I think the gentleman from Texas wants to have his controversy with the newspapers printed as often as possible.

I do not blame him, because it reads well when it gets down to Texas. That is good politics.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] also makes the statement that our getting up here and criticizing the President brings in a flood of critical letters. The gentleman has not seen anything in the form of caustic letters, and if he will come over to my office I will show him some letters that are letters. They have come to me on every conceivable subject, not because of speeches made here but because the American people think it is their right, and I think it is their right, to communicate to their Congressmen and Senators what they think. Sometimes these people get a little too caustic, but we Members get a little caustic over here, too. I do not blame people for writing me. They may write me all the letters they desire, and, may I say, they become rather personal, too. When they do, I consign the letters to the waste-paper basket. If they write in like ladies and gentlemen, I endeavor to answer them the same way, but I do not always answer letters that are highly critical and those letters that have no good purpose.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] spoke a good deal about the foreigners that we have in this country. I could not quite tell from his talk whether he was belittling all foreigners or just some foreigners. He spoke of the other gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES], for whom I have a great deal of respect, as being the greatest authority on immigration in this body. I think possibly the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES] does know a great deal about that subject. I read with a great deal of interest his article appearing in the Saturday Evening Post several weeks ago on the subject and received a good deal of valuable information from it. However, I want to say there are a lot of foreigners in this country who are good people. My father and mother were born in Sweden. They were born over there in the old country. I have some brothers and sisters who were born over there and some who were born in this country, and I want to say that there never was a better man ever lived than my father nor a better woman ever lived than my mother. They were at one time foreigners. My father at an early opportunity took out citizenship papers and became a citizen. He came to this country to give his children better opportunities, and I am mighty glad that he did so. I agree with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DRES] when he says that foreigners who are in this country illegally ought to be deported. I agree with that thought absolutely, and I think that is the class that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] must have had reference to. I do not believe the gentleman means to speak disparagingly of people simply because they are foreigners. There are lots of people in this country who have not had the opportunity of taking out their citizenship papers. I believe those people ought to be given a reasonable opportunity to become citizens. If it had not been for the foreigners, you know, we would not have had much of a country over here. It would still be inhabited by the aborigines. At some time or other all of our people were foreigners.

Mr. Chairman, I come back to the question of criticism of the President. The Democrats themselves criticize the President when they disagree with his stand on the bonus question. I also criticize the President on that position because I am for the payment of the bonus. I am for the cash payment of the adjusted-service certificates, and I expect to vote to override a Presidential veto, if there is one, when opportunity arises. I also criticize the President for the ruthless way he treated the Spanish-American War veterans of this country. It is a crying shame that these veterans, most of whom were over 60 years of age, many out of work, depending in many cases absolutely on the far too small pittance they were then getting from the Government before the economy act went into effect, should have been deprived even of most of that small payment. Many of these men have gone to their graves feeling bitter because the Government took away the inadequate pittance they were receiving. Mr. Chairman, I am for restoration at the earliest possible moment of all the benefits the Spanish War veterans were receiving prior to the time the President, by Executive order, reduced the payments to practically nothing. I am going to vote for complete restoration of such payments, if the opportunity presents itself.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TRUAX] stated that he is in hopes we will get back to our constitutional prerogatives. It was my understanding that the Constitution had been practically abandoned during the past year or two, and that the only way you could get close enough to the Constitution to realize there was one left was to go over to the Congressional Library and see the original one under glass.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TRUAX] also criticized former President Hoover. Unquestionably, former President Hoover made mistakes, and probably a lot of them, but at the same time he cannot be said to be a man without ability and without brains. He came into the Presidency at a time when any man would have had a difficult time as President. Possibly he did not do some things that Mr. Roosevelt would have done, possibly he did not do some things that Mr. Wilson would have done, but nevertheless I give President Hoover credit for doing whatever he did honestly and intelligently as he saw it. The fact he did not succeed better was at least partly due to the peculiar times over which no one had full control and would probably have happened to any other President at that particular time, be he Democrat or Republican.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio further stated that President Hoover kept the farmers from getting more than $2.20 a bushel for wheat during the war. He said they should have received $5 or $10. If they had obtained $5 or $10, who would have paid the bill? Why, the American people would have paid the bill. And permit me to say that $2.20 is a pretty good price anyway at any time.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. EKWALL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman tells us we are getting only 90 cents a bushel for wheat. If the Democratic times presently existing are so good and the principles of the Democratic Party are so beneficial, why are not the farmers getting $2.20 now? I will tell you one reason why they are not getting it. It is because of the great amount of wheat imported into this country under the system existing at the present time. This ought to be a warning to some of the Members to start them to thinking how we can remedy the situation and keep some of this wheat from coming in from the outside to the detriment of our farmers. I am for the farmer.

Mr. TRUAX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EKWALL. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. TRUAX. Can the gentleman tell us the total number of bushels of wheat produced annually in this country as compared with the number of bushels imported?

Mr. EKWALL. No; I cannot tell the gentleman that. Obviously I could not state that off-hand and the gentleman knows it.

Mr. TRUAX. That information would have a distinct bearing upon the statement the gentleman just made.

Mr. EKWALL. Certainly.

Mr. TRUAX. As a matter of fact, the imports are negligible in comparison with the amount produced here.

Mr. EKWALL. It may be negligible but I do not think so; nevertheless the gentleman knew when he asked me that question I could not answer it because nobody right off can tell you how many bushels of wheat are grown here and how many are imported, but I am informed a considerable quantity is imported.

Mr. TRUAX. I can tell the gentleman that.

Mr. EKWALL. Certainly, but I have not the wisdom of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. TRUAX. It is not a matter of wisdom.

Mr. EKWALL. No; it goes beyond wisdom—it enters the realm of the psychic, and then the gentleman has raised so many hogs in Ohio he has probably bought a lot of wheat and knows a lot about the price of it.

Mr. TRUAX. We do not buy it for that purpose except when it is cheap as it was when Hoover was in office, when it was about 10 or 20 cents a bushel.

Mr. EKWALL. Then you did not buy it when it was $2.20 a bushel?

Mr. TRUAX. No; and we sold our hogs then for 16 or 18 cents a pound.

Mr. EKWALL. Then the gentleman tells us the reason the President did not get more votes in Ohio was because they did a lot of horse trading among the Democrats there. It seems to me this would be a good time for the Democrats to do a little more horse trading and get back some of the money that was lent during the Wilson administration to the European governments and also do a little horse trading to bring us back to prosperity. Apparently, the boys were having a little shell game down in Ohio during the last election and that is the reason President Roosevelt did not get more votes down there. I think something ought to be done about that.

Mr. TRUAX. Of course, that has all been fixed up now and everything will be all right at the next election.

Mr. EKWALL. The gentleman also states that if certain things do not take place here we are going to have a revolution. Well, if we are going to have a revolution, let us have it. I have heard about the coming of this revolution for a long time. I think we are all honestly trying to do the best job we can, but if there is going to be a revolution in this country we might just as well have it and get it over with and then start in all over again or give the country back to the Indians if they will take it.

On this question of criticism let us forget the idea that it is wrong and un-American to criticize the President or criticize anyone else in public office or out of public office. The President is getting $75,000 a year for his job, and I think he is trying to do the best job he can under the circumstances, but he is a public servant, nothing more and nothing less. There is no halo around the head of a man who is President of the United States. There is likewise no halo around a man who is on the Supreme Court or in any other public position. He is in office because he wants to be. Nobody is forced into public office and he does not have to stay there against his will. So whenever we get up on either side and honestly criticize or make suggestions, let it not be charged that we are doing this in a partisan manner or for political purposes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EKWALL. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. But from the highest to the lowest there is a respect that should be shown for any public officer who is doing the very best he can.

Mr. EKWALL. Oh, yes; I agree with the gentleman from Texas. We are not disagreeing on that point at all. I think that a person in public office ought to be respected according to the way in which he is doing his duty in that office. If a person is doing the best he can he ought to have the respect and the help of the people of this country. If he is doing something wrong or unconscionable then he ought to be criticized, and when I criticize the President in a nonpartisan manner I do not do it with the idea of harming him in any way or trying to restrict him in anything he is trying to do. It is done with the idea of trying to be a little helpful.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EKWALL. I yield.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Getting off the subject of criticism, I would like to know if the gentleman can tell me how in the world we are going to get back to prosperity when in practically every industrial or manufacturing establishment today, as well as in every municipal government, State government, and Federal Government, jobs will not be given to men or women who have attained the age of 40.

Mr. EKWALL. That is one of the big problems we have got to work out, because it is certainly unjust to discriminate against people on account of their age when it comes to giving them employment. [Applause.]

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. BURDICK].

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Chairman, I have been informed that the rules governing the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union are elastic enough in discussing a bill of this character so that I may be permitted within certain limits to present a subject entirely different to that under consideration. If it were not for the fact that this is a very important matter to call to the attention of the House I would not keep you away at this late hour to tell the story that I want to tell you.

In this depression I have always had the view that we wanted to save property and save human life. You may differ in some degree as to the method to be employed, but everyone should agree that until we get out of this situation we should spend our time and energy for the purpose of conserving human lives and property. For that reason many States of the Union have moratorium laws to prevent the foreclosure and unconscionable taking of property. Many States, like my own State of North Dakota, have moratoria against the taking of personal property of farmers, city dwellers, and business men.

Instead of spending our time in criticizing the Democratic administration for what it is responsible for we should be working on anything that might conserve human lives and property.

I want to call your attention to a situation that has arisen in the State of New Mexico, and which needs action by this Congress, because there is no Federal set-up that will relieve these people.

The very day that the banks closed in the United States and admitted their failure to operate the financial system of the country a band of people from Louisiana purchased 3,500 acres of land from the Merchants Bank Building Co., an auxiliary of the First National Bank of St. Paul. That bank is a part of the chain-bank system that I have already presented to this Congress. They purchased the property for $65,000. They paid $30,000 as a part payment. Now all these payments have been made since 1933. In 1933 they paid $15,000. In 1934 they paid an additional sum of $14,800.

There is now due on the contract, but not in default, $35,000 on an investment of $65,000.

On these 3,500 acres they established a colony now consisting of 47 members, under the name of the Llano Cooperative Colony.

In this colony these people purchased $24,000 worth of personal property that the First National Bank of St. Paul or the building company never had any interest in whatever.

They now claim there is $1,500 now due on that contract and they are going to take all of the property at once. On the 27th day of December this bank in St. Paul sent a bunch of cow hands to the colony settlement intending to round up all their cattle and horses and stating they would bring school busses there to transport these people back to the State of Louisiana, telling them they had canceled their contracts and were taking all the property because they were in default.

I want to show you about the most cold-blooded thing that anyone can do, and that is the reason I call these matters to the attention of the Congress, because there must be some way through some Federal set-up which we can make, if we have not it already in existence, to prevent a situation like this from bringing the misery and distress that this contemplated action will do. These people called the sheriff on the 27th day of December and told him the bank had come there to wipe them clean. The sheriff came out and prevented any further losses; but on the 4th of January they went into a district court in the State of New Mexico under a $3,000 bond and attached all of the property, the land, and the livestock, and the food supplies of this colony, and they now have the food supplies locked up, and they are attempting to drive these people, 47 of them, off the land and put them on relief by the cancelation of a contract under principles that are unethical and unconscionable.

Here is a notice their lawyers served down there. Having their food supplies locked up he notified them that he would feed the women and children out of their own food, but would not feed the men. The women and children declined to accept any food unless the men were also fed. I shall read just what he said so that the House will know the situation. Let us not complain so much about the relief already given and the way it has been given, but spend our energies on the conditions that confront us where relief is now necessary. He says:

I have arranged with Lou Miller to use the kitchen in the house and to furnish food for the women and children, but no one else in the colony can have any food.

At the present time their seed is locked up, their livestock is in the possession of the sheriff under a bond of $3,000, and all their machinery is locked up, and those people are absolutely at the mercy of this bank, who wants now to take this $65,000 worth of property, which has increased to a value of $143,960, because these people still owe $35,000. I say to you that there ought to be some organization in this Government to remedy such a situation. The Federal land bank say they cannot give relief; the R. F. C. say they cannot grant relief. There ought to be some organization by which these people could be protected against the ruthless action of this bank. This convinces me further that if you want to leave the future of the people of this country solely to the business interests of the country and withdraw the Government's protection, which the people have, you will get some more examples of this kind, where banks will destroy people and property because, perchance, they can make some money.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURDICK. Yes.

Mr. BOILEAU. Has the gentleman tried to determine whether or not the provisions of the $4,880,000,000 appropriation bill are broad enough to enable the President to give relief in a matter of this kind? My recollection is that it is broad enough or was so when it left the House, and I believe the provisions are still in the bill as it left the House.

Mr. BURDICK. I have tried that from several angles. I am informed the set-up has not been completed, and that the different departments are at a loss to know what money they will have and what authority they will have. I bring this to the attention of my colleagues in Congress because there will be more of this. Through their influence in Congress and through the power they have to introduce resolutions and bills, it is my hope that these people, 47 of them, may not be wiped off the face of the earth and sent back to Louisiana as charges of this Government.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURDICK. Yes.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Why does not the gentleman prepare a resolution and present it before we adjourn tonight? I would be willing to support such a resolution.

Mr. BURDICK. I am calling this especially to the attention of my good Democratic colleagues. I would rather have the resolution come from that side of the House.

Mr. TRUAX. I would like to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that right now and for 2 years there has been pending a bill I introduced which would stop all foreclosures on real estate merely by amending the national bankruptcy law. In those cases where taxes and interest have been kept up or where there is a payment on account of the principal of the mortgage, it would grant a 5-year moratorium. Congress has the power to enact that bill into law.

Mr. BURDICK. I thank the gentleman from Ohio. I will gladly support your bill. The gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. DEMPSEY] is very much interested in this matter and has told me that the facts are substantially as I have recited them to you, and as they are included in this speech.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to include therein the two documents I read.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Dakota?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The following notices were delivered to the colonists by W. R. Warner, agent of the Merchant's Bank Building Co.:

GILA, N. MEX., April 19, 1935.

(Memorandum for George Clark.)

Hereafter all supplies held under attachment shall be kept under lock and key and none issued for food or other purposes except for feed for livestock. The object for this being that grain, meat, poultry supplies, etc., have already been depleted to an extent that the amount due under attachment has been so reduced as to leave our interests unprotected. The dairy of 20 cows will be available to the colony until further action is decided upon.

W. R. WARNER, Trustee.

GILA, N. MEX., April 20, 1935.

(Memorandum for Mr. Moore.)

I have arranged with Lou Mahler to establish a kitchen in his house and to furnish food therein for the women and children of the colony.

What food is not available on the premises will be supplied by purchase by Mr. Wooley.

No food will be supplied for the remainder of the colony.

Mahler will be in charge of the dairy under direction of George Clark. Mr. Clark will be in direct charge of affairs during my absence.

W. R. WARNER, Trustee.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BULWINKLE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 8021, the legislative appropriation bill, 1936, had come to no resolution thereon.

SEWARD, ALASKA

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 3808) to authorize the incorporated town of Seward, Alaska, to undertake certain municipal public works, including the construction of an electric generating station and electric distribution systems, and for such purposes to issue bonds in any sum not exceeding $118,000, with Senate amendments and concur in the Senate amendments.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate amendment be not read, but be printed in the RECORD at this point.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman tell us what the Senate amendment provides?

Mr. GREEN. Yes. This is a bill authorizing the town of Seward, Alaska, to issue bonds to the extent of $118,000 for the purchase of a city-owned light and power plant. The Senate has amended the bill in such a way as to authorize the town to purchase, should it so desire, an existing plant in the town at not to exceed $75,000. This is done with a view of not having the Government competing in business with the local electric plant.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman believes in that policy, does he? The gentleman need not answer the question unless he desires.

Mr. GREEN. I think we could get along very well without too much government in business.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendments follow:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the incorporated town of Seward, Territory of Alaska, is hereby authorized and empowered (a) by contract or contracts, or by its own agents and employees, or otherwise than by contract, to construct a municipal electric system, together with all parts thereof and appurtenances thereto necessary or convenient for the generation, production, transmission, and distribution of electric energy, and to acquire by gift, purchase, or the exercise of the power of eminent domain, lands, easements, or rights in land or water rights in connection therewith; (b) to operate and maintain said system for its own use and benefit and for the use and benefit of public and private consumers or users within and without the territorial boundaries of said town; (c) to issue its bonds to finance in whole or in part the cost of the construction of said system; (d) to prescribe and collect rates, fees, or charges for the services, facilities, and commodities furnished by said system; (e) to pledge to the punctual payment of said bonds and interest thereon all or any part of the gross or net revenues of said system (including improvements, betterments, or extensions thereto thereafter constructed or acquired); (f) to enter into contract with the United States of America or any Federal agency created or continued by or pursuant to the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1935; and (g) to subscribe to and comply with all rules and regulations prescribed or continued by the President of the United States of America pursuant to the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1935. The common council of said town in determining the cost of the construction of said system may include all costs and estimated costs of the issuance of said bonds, all engineering, inspection, fiscal and legal expenses, and interest which it is estimated will accrue during the construction period and for 6 months thereafter on money borrowed or which it is estimated will be borrowed pursuant to this act.

"Sec. 2. The construction of said system may be authorized under this act, and bonds may be authorized to be issued under this act by resolution or resolutions of the common council of said town. Said bonds shall bear interest at such rate or rates not exceeding 6 percent per annum, payable semiannually, may be in one or more series, may bear such date or dates, may mature at such time or times not exceeding 40 years from their respective dates, may be payable in such medium of payment, at such place or places, may carry such registration privileges, may be subject to such terms of redemption, with or without premium, may be executed in such manner, may be in such form, either coupon or registered, may contain such terms, covenants, and conditions, and may be declared or become due before the maturity date thereof, as such resolution or subsequent resolutions may provide. Said bonds shall be sold for not less than par and may be sold at either public or private sale. Pending the preparation of the definitive bonds, interim receipts or certificates in such form and with such provisions as the common council of said town may determine, may be issued to the purchaser or purchasers of bonds sold pursuant to this act. Said bonds and interim receipts or certificates shall be negotiable for all purposes. Said bonds bearing the signatures of officers in office on the date of the signing thereof shall be valid and binding obligations, notwithstanding that before the delivery thereof and payment therefor any or all the persons whose signatures appear thereon shall have ceased to be officers of the town.

"Sec. 3. Any resolution or resolutions authorizing the issuance of bonds under this act may contain covenants as to (a) the purpose or purposes to which the proceeds of sale of said bonds may be applied and the use and disposition thereof, (b) the use and disposition of the revenue of said system, including the creation and maintenance of reserves, (c) the transfer from the general funds of the town to the account or accounts of said system a sum or sums of money for furnishing such town or any of its departments, boards, or agencies with the services, facilities, and commodities of said system, (d) the issuance of other or additional bonds payable from the revenue of said system, (e) the operation and maintenance of said system, (f) the insurance to be carried thereon and the use and disposition of insurance moneys, (g) books of account and the inspection and audit thereof, and (h) the terms and conditions upon which the holders of said bonds or any proportion of them or any trustee thereof shall be entitled to the appointment of a receiver by the District Court for the Territory of Alaska, which court shall have jurisdiction in such proceedings, and which receiver may enter and take possession of said system, operate and maintain the same, prescribe rates, fees, or charges, and collect, receive, and apply all revenue thereafter arising therefrom in the same manner as the town itself might do. The provisions of this act and any such resolution or resolutions shall be a contract with the holder or holders of said bonds, and the duties of the town and of its common council and officers under this act and any such resolution or resolutions shall be enforceable by any bondholder, by mandamus or other appropriate suit, action, or proceeding in any court of competent jurisdiction.

"Sec. 4. The common council of said town shall prescribe and collect reasonable rates, fees, or charges for the services, facilities, and commodities of said system, and shall revise such rates, fees, or charges from time to time whenever necessary so that said system shall be and always remain self-supporting. The rates, fees, or charges prescribed shall be such as will produce revenue at least sufficient (a) to pay when due all bonds and interest thereon, for the payment of which such revenue is or shall have been pledged, charged, or otherwise encumbered, including reserves therefor, and (b) to provide for all expenses of operation and maintenance of said system, including reserves therefor.

"Sec. 5. No holder of any bond issued under this act shall have the right to compel the levy of a tax by said town to pay the principal of or interest on such bonds. All bonds issued under this act shall be payable solely from the revenues pledged to the payment thereof and shall contain a recital to that effect. Such bonds may be issued notwithstanding any debt or other limitation or restriction prescribed by any other law.

"Sec. 6. This act shall become effective 30 days after its passage: Provided, however, That none of the powers herein granted to the said town of Seward, Alaska, shall be exercised by said town in the event that the Seward Light & Power Co., a corporation, shall, within 1 week after a copy of this act is served on said Seward Light & Power Co., offer in writing to sell and convey to the said town of Seward all right, title, and interest in and to its electric generating plant or plants, electric distributing system, pipe lines, and water rights now owned by it and used and employed in supplying electric energy to the inhabitants of said town, said offer of sale to be for the sum of $75,000, and to guarantee that delivery of said title, free from encumbrance and debt of any kind, shall be made to said town upon payment of said sum, anytime within 6 months from date of said written offer to sell: Provided further, That said offer and agreement to convey title must be delivered by said Seward Light & Power Co., to the town clerk of said town of Seward, Alaska, within the time specified above. Service of copy of this act on the Seward Light & Power Co. shall be made by delivery thereof to its president, S. M. Graff, or any other officer of the corporation: And provided further, That in the event the said Seward Light & Power Co. offers to sell and convey its properties as provided for in this section, the said town is authorized to purchase such properties and to issue bonds for such purpose in an amount not to exceed $75,000, such bonds to be issued in the manner provided for in this act."

Amend the title so as to read: "An act concerning the incorporated town of Seward, Territory of Alaska."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendments were concurred in.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

THE A. A. A. AMENDMENTS

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and to include therein a radio address delivered by my colleague the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOPE] over the radio last night.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address over the Columbia Broadcasting System Sunday, May 12, from 9:45 to 10 p. m., eastern standard time, by Representative CLIFFORD HOPE, Republican, of Kansas, on The A. A. A. Amendments. He spoke from Washington as the "Congressional Opinion" speaker in the Columbia series of that name.

The Agricultural Adjustment Act became a law exactly 2 years ago today. The program has been well administered, has passed the trial stage, and has proven its value. In its original form, however, the act was not broad enough to give effective relief to producers of all agricultural commodities. Likewise, even as to the commodities which it has been possible to include in the program, experience has demonstrated the need for greater flexibility and has pointed out defects which can be remedied only by legislative action. This has resulted in the introduction in both Houses of Congress of bills which have been popularly known as the "A. A. A. amendments", which bills have been favorably reported by the Committee on Agriculture in both the House and Senate.

The bills as reported in the two Houses are considerably different, and it is my purpose this evening to discuss only the revised House bill. This latest bill, a revision of H. R. 7713, has not yet been formally reported, but the committee has approved it and the report will be made shortly.

It is impossible in the brief time at my disposal to go into a detailed discussion of this legislation. I do, however, want to call attention to the most important points which are covered. Before doing that, however, permit me to call attention to the very thorough consideration and discussion which this legislation has received. I do not recall in my more than 8 years on the Agricultural Committee of the House that any measure has been more thoroughly and adequately discussed or has received more careful consideration in the committee than has this one. Extended hearings were held and ample opportunity to be heard given both the proponents and opponents to the legislation. Since the hearings the committee has spent several weeks in perfecting the bill. Numerous changes in the original draft have been made to meet objections on the part of those who might be affected by the legislation, and it is felt that all legitimate objects have been met.

I believe I can point out the purpose and objectives of the bill best by discussing them under four or five different heads. The first of these comprises those sections of the bill which have the very important effect of changing the policy of the original act from one of restricted production to what might be called "adjusted production" of agricultural commodities. When the original act was passed there were immense surpluses of many agricultural products. As to those particular products the problem was to dispose of the surpluses and adjust production to consumptive demand. I do not believe any person who has made a study of the agricultural situation questions the soundness of that policy as a temporary measure. Now, however, we are faced with a different situation. The restriction program to some extent, and the drought to a much greater extent, have removed our agricultural surpluses. That does not mean, however, that the problem has been solved, because under existing conditions if farmers should plant and harvest a normal crop upon the average acreage in cultivation for the years from 1926 to 1932, we would be faced with a new surplus problem unless we find it possible to vastly expand our export markets. In other words, a normal crop of cotton, wheat, or corn upon predepression acreage would produce more than we can consume and export under existing conditions. However, having now achieved something like a balance in most lines of agricultural production, we are in a position where it seems advisable to set up whatever machinery may be necessary to enable us to not only contract but expand production if conditions make that possible. Another year of drought in this country might make it advisable to expand crop acreage. Small world crops of commodities like wheat and cotton might open up an export demand which would justify a return to normal acreage and production of these commodities.

The features of this bill, which carry out the ideas above outlined, include amendments by which the power given the Secretary of Agriculture to provide for a reduction in the acreage or the production for market of any agricultural commodity is changed to provide for the adjustment of acreage and production. Thus, under the new language, it is possible for the Secretary to not only make benefit payments to farmers for reducing production, but, if desirable, for increasing production as well. In harmony with this thought, the original act is also amended so that proceeds from processing taxes may be used in making payments for the expansion of domestic or foreign markets and for the removal of agricultural surpluses, as well as for making production adjustments. In addition a new provision authorizes the appropriation each year of an amount equal to 30 percent of the import duties collected during the preceding year to be used for encouraging the exportation of agricultural commodities, the purchase or leasing of submarginal agricultural and grazing land, and the making of payments in connection with acreage or production adjustments of basic agricultural commodities. It will thus be seen that this new legislation not only makes the original act more flexible by providing for adjustment rather than reduction in acreage and production but also sets up the machinery by which it is hoped that we can increase agricultural exports. Of course, merely setting up this machinery offers no assurance that there will actually be increased exports. These provisions will make it easier to export when markets are found and are significant as indicating a change in policy on the part of Congress and a desire to get away from a purely restrictive program.

In addition to those matters which have just been mentioned, relating to the different use of processing taxes and funds collected therefrom, it should be noted that provision is also made in this legislation for payment of benefits in commodities rather than in cash. Such a proposal is entirely optional with the individual farmer. If he feels it to his advantage to accept payment in kind, then it is his privilege to do so. How extensive this policy may be followed is not known, but it adds an element of flexibility to the act which cannot but be helpful.

Another important provision is that which provides that in determining parity prices there shall be taken into consideration the difference in interest payments per acre of farm indebtedness and tax payments per acre on farm real estate as compared with such payments during the base period from 1909 to 1914. Provision is also made whereby in fixing the rate of processing tax the Secretary is authorized to increase the rate to make up for the amount of tax loss on account of the exemptions or refunds allowed when the purchased article is used by a State institution or for charitable or welfare purposes. These provisions will furnish a fairer base for determining parity and will result in increased benefit payments to producers.

Another important provision just included in the bill gives the President power, under certain conditions, to impose quotas or compensating taxes on imports where the effect of such importations is to prevent the price of any agricultural commodity from reaching parity. It is not known to what extent this section may be invoked but it furnishes the machinery whereby we can control importations and thus prevent their having an adverse effect upon farm prices.

Another important feature of the bill is that which gives greater and increased recognition to cooperative organizations. Under this provision the Secretary is authorized to utilize cooperative associations of producers in connection with the payments for the expansion of domestic or foreign markets and is directed to "accord such recognition and encouragement to producer-owned and producer-controlled cooperative associations as will be in harmony with the policy toward cooperative associations set forth in existing acts of Congress as will tend to promote efficient methods of marketing and distribution."

This brings us to the most controversial feature of the pending bill, namely, those provisions relating to licensing. In this connection I think I should point out that the licensing provisions have been changed considerably since their introduction, and while certain objections might well have been made in the beginning, these objections are no longer tenable. Notwithstanding this, some opponents of the legislation are still discussing it as if the original provisions were retained and are busily engaged in stirring up opposition to provisions which have not been approved by the Committee on Agriculture and which will not be included in the bill.

I wish there was time to discuss the licensing features of this bill in some detail. I would like to do this not only to point out what these provisions include but what they do not include. The idea of licenses is nothing new. The present Agricultural Adjustment Act makes provision for them, both independently and in connection with marketing agreements. We have numerous other Federal and State laws imposing licenses and other forms of regulation in connection with many lines of business. The changes made in the new bill in some cases limit and in others expand the licensing power of the Secretary of Agriculture. These provisions have been drawn with a view to making these powers more effective in helping the producer. They strengthen the law in the respect which actual experience has shown it to be weak. Under these provisions, when producers working through the Agricultural Adjustment Act are unable to make fair marketing arrangements with processors and distributors, the Secretary, as a last resort, is given the power to impose licenses, fixing the terms upon which they can do business. This power, however, is limited to licenses affecting only a small number of commodities, to wit, milk and its products, tobacco, sugarcane and sugar beets, fruits, vegetables, wool, and mohair. Even as to these commodities the powers may never be used; certainly not if processors and distributors are willing to work with producers in bringing about fair marketing agreements.

These licensing powers will be most effective in dealing with problems arising out of the distribution of milk, fruits, and vegetables. In the course of various congressional hearings involving the matter, I have been impressed with the tremendous problems confronting milk producers. Even where they are well organized they have found it most difficult to secure better than starvation prices for their product. On the other hand, distributors and dealers have, in most cases, been prosperous. Even during the worst of the depression their margins were maintained. The Federal Trade Commission has recently made a report on its investigation of the milk situation in the Connecticut and Philadelphia areas. This report shows that in the Connecticut area, from 1922 to date, the price per quart paid to the producer has ranged from 4 to 10 cents and the price to the consumer from 10 to 17 cents.

During the same time, however, the range in the dealers' margin has only been from 6 to 7 cents, except for March 1933, when it was 5½ cents. In the Philadelphia area the dealers' margin since 1922 has ranged from 5.39 to 6.25 cents per quart, while the price paid the producer has ranged from 3.06 to 8.82 cents and the price to the consumer from 9 to 15 cents per quart. In other words, while dealers' margins and profits remained stationary and stable, producers' prices fluctuated more than 100 percent. It is my information that the conditions prevailing in these two areas are typical of those existing in all of the large milksheds of the country.

Why isn't the producer entitled to the same price stability as the distributor? Why shouldn't the price which the farmer receives be based upon what is fair and reasonable rather than upon what the distributor is willing to pay him; or if it is necessary to have lower prices during periods of depression, why should not the burden be borne more nearly equally by producers and distributors. Why shouldn't the farmer have as much to say about what his price shall be as the man to whom he sells his product? These plans for marketing agreements and licenses will offer producers an opportunity which they have never before had to deal fairly and on even terms with the distributors of their products.

The opposition to the licensing feature of this legislation is being led by distributors and processors of farm products. They have the effrontery to assume to speak for the farmers of this country and object to this type of legislation because they say it will regiment the farmer and fix the prices at which he must sell his product. They possibly know something about regimentation, because, as a matter of fact, this group has been regimenting the farmer and fixing his prices for these many years. They now seem reluctant to give up that privilege and to permit the farmer to have something to say about it himself.

In spite of all the misinformation which has been circulated, no farmer need have any fear of this legislation. It specifically provides that no farmer as such shall be licensed. Also there is a specific provision that no license shall be imposed upon any retailer excepting in the case of milk. This is a farmer's bill. It will be administered by those who are in sympathy with the farmer and whose only object is to furnish protection to him in dealing with those who, through superior organization, have in the past been able to take advantage of him.

The purpose of the Agricultural Adjustment Act and these amendments is to set up the machinery whereby the producer can put himself in a position to deal on even terms with those who distribute and process what he has to sell. In the case of some commodities the farmer's price can be increased by the use of the processing tax. In the case of other commodities it is necessary to use licensing and marketing agreements. The opposition to either of these plans and to the Agricultural Adjustment Act generally comes from those who are unwilling to pay the farmer a fair price for his product. It comes from those who want to be in a position where they can oppress the producer and gouge the consumer as they see fit and without interference.

The matter of fair prices to agricultural producers is of interest to everyone because unless the farmers of this country receive their fair share of the national income there is a lack of balance in our national economy which makes it impossible to have stable and prosperous business conditions. The success of the farm program in increasing the income of farmers has already resulted in an increase in prosperity for those who manufacture articles which farmers buy. Anything which brings the farmer nearer to receiving his share of the national income is a step toward restoring industrial prosperity. The attack on these amendments is an attack upon the entire farm program, and if they are defeated those who are fighting them will attempt to destroy the remainder of the program. It is not a political question but an economic one. I decry the attempt to inject politics into farm relief. I am a Republican, but I will support every sound program to bring equality to agriculture, no matter by whom presented.

The farm program of today has been made possible because farmers have stood behind it individually and through their organizations. Now that it is under attack it is more important than ever that they continue to give it their support and backing through their local, State, and national organizations, through the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, and in Congress.

THE AGRICULTURAL CREDIT ACT OF 1935 AND INTEREST REDUCTION RELIEF FOR FARMERS

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, on last Friday, Members of this House passed H. R. 5440, with the Wheeler amendment, which provides somewhat lower interest rate for farmers. I wish to compliment the Chairman and members of the House Committee on Agriculture for making it possible for this amendment to go into the bill, because it will give a signal to the debt-burdened farmer that Members of this Congress realize his plight and are taking steps in the direction wherein lies alleviation of his present distress. This bill gives the farmer a rate of 3½-percent interest for the first year, and then steps that interest up to 4 percent, and after that restores the rate to 4½ percent, and is, therefore, a temporary makeshift.

The farmers in my State—Nebraska—and especially the farmers in my district—the Third Nebraska District—are anxious to take their responsibility as American citizens in this time of depression. They are anxious and willing to join hands with the administration in any movement which will ultimately result in a victory over the present hard times. These farmers have come to the time in their lives that they no longer can dig out of the ground sufficient produce to balance their budgets because of burdensome debts. These farmers have come to the point in their lives that the question of borrowing more is obnoxious and spells further gloom. They have too many debts now, and they are anxious and willing to pay what is due to the many waiting creditors who also are in the same financial conditions as these farmers.

For many years many of these farmers have been unable to purchase the innumerable things they need. Repairs, lumber, paint, harness, machinery, and items too numerous to mention are needed on the Nebraska farms today. Farmers are anxious to buy. Their stocks of these needed things are depleted. But they are unable to buy because they have no money with which to buy, because they have debt burdens that are too heavy.

Therefore the passage of the Wheeler amendment in H. R. 5440 comes as a ray of sunshine to these farmers. It comes as a ray of hope that eventually Congress will recognize the true conditions of our Nation and that the solution of our greatest problem is not how the farmer shall borrow more money, but how shall the farmer be helped with lower rates of interest so that he may pay back what he already owes.

This condition, according to my belief, is Nation-wide. The Nation's banks are filled with idle money and yet the national income is decreasing and the interest burden is increasing.

Statements have been made on the floor of this House that the farmer is better off today than he has been for some years, because the prices of the things he raises have increased. Yet other statements have been made to the effect that the farmer today is $799,000,000 more in debt than he was in 1933.

This shows plainly that the borrowing of the farmer has been on the increase and his income has decreased to such a point that he no longer can afford to borrow, but must be helped to pay.

The recent upturn in agricultural prices had its inception in the shortage of farm crops due to drought. Before that, and for many years, the farmer has been handicapped. He has been continually paying more for the things he buys than he received for the things he raised. The farmer's dollar for years was worth less than the dollar other people had. He has been working with depreciated money and, for that reason, I introduced a bill in this House asking that the President name a commission to study the farmers' plight, in order that the farm dollar would have equality permanently with other people's money. That bill is being held up in the committee and I hope that I can have a hearing upon it in the near future. In the meantime, I have been bringing this matter to the attention of various Congressmen and I find that like other bills which are not administration bills, it is not being given the consideration to which it is entitled.

But the present plea has to do with other remedies that are only partially contained in the bill which we just passed—that of lower interest rates. The entire Nation would benefit by a general reduction in interest rates, and it seems to me that the ideas contained in the Frazier-Lemke refinancing bill would solve our problem.

The Rules Committee has this bill and we are told that this committee will not give us a rule under which the bill can come before this body for consideration.

The House Committee on Agriculture should be complimented in reporting this bill out, and we are given to understand that many members of that committee are in favor of the measure.

More than 20 State legislatures have endorsed this bill, and in my district I am positive that 90 percent of the farmers and many business and professional men are in favor of it. That sentiment appears to be true in all parts of the country, and I feel that when such a measure is demanded by so many of our citizens it becomes the duty of this Congress to let the bill come out on the floor for consideration and debate.

Knowing the difficulty of the problem with which those favoring this bill would be confronted in getting it up for consideration, and, anticipating the wall which would be built around it by the administration, a petition was placed on the Clerk's desk, asking that the Rules Committee be discharged and the bill be brought up for consideration. There are 150 signatures on that petition. To get the bill out will require 218 signatures, and those favoring this bill are asking Members of the House to sign the petition. I speak to you as the first signer of that petition.

Signing this petition will not necessarily bind any Member to vote for the bill. There are those who have signed the petition feeling that such a measure should be given to the House for solution and not be allowed to die through the gag rule of a political machine. They feel that the country needs lower interest rates to come out of this depression. They feel that the bill should be given into the hands of the Representatives of the people for solution. Some of these Congressmen who have signed the petition may feel that the interest rates called for in the bill are too low, but they believe those questions of a controversial matter can be ironed out in debate when the bill comes on the floor for consideration. With these few words of explanation I appeal to Members of the House to sign the petition and let us bring this lower interest rate bill up for consideration, obedient to the pleas of our people.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED

Mr. PARSONS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution of the House of the following title, which was thereupon signed by the Speaker:

H. J. Res. 254. Joint resolution providing for an investigation by the United States Public Health Service of the plumbing and sanitary systems in Federal Government buildings.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 2 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Tuesday, May 14, 1935, at 12 o'clock noon.

COMMITTEE HEARINGS

COMMITTEE ON THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. LEWIS. I announce that the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES], the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], and the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] are unavoidably detained; that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS] is absent on an official mission to the Virgin Islands; that the Senator from Arkansas [Mrs. CARAWAY] and the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] are absent on official business; and that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. OVERTON] is absent because of illness.

Mr. AUSTIN. I announce that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS] is absent because of illness, and that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] is necessarily detained from the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-six Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

POSTMASTER GENERAL FARLEY

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under the unanimous-consent agreement the Chair lays before the Senate the resolution S. Res. 74.

The Senate resumed the consideration of Senate Resolution 74, which has been reported adversely by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, as follows:

Whereas it has been reported that James A. Farley, acting as Postmaster General and in various other capacities for the United States Government, has conducted a private business for the selling of materials to persons engaged in doing public construction work for the United States Government, and that in some instances concerns buying materials from the said concern in which the said James A. Farley is interested have received contracts through as many as three low bidders being disqualified; and

Whereas it is further alleged that the said concerns favoring the firm of the said James A. Farley with business have been able to secure changes in specifications netting them large sums in profits after the award of contracts, and it being alleged that such changes are deliberately made for the purpose of allowing large profits and avoiding competition; and

Whereas it is further publicly known that the said James A. Farley has used the Printing Office and facilities of the United States Government for the purpose of gratifying personal whims and caprices of personal and political friends, even to the printing of stamps never to be used; and

Whereas it has been further charged that the said James A. Farley is implicated in a wire service leading into the gambling houses in the United States from the race tracks, and is using the functions which he supervises for the Government to pursue said businesses for profit to himself and to his friends; and

Whereas it is further alleged that without pay or compensation for the same the said James A. Farley has commandeered for his personal use facilities of public-service corporations borrowing money from the United States Government; and

Whereas it has been charged that the said James A. Farley, on the eve of a loan being granted to a railroad in West Virginia, telephoned the leading factor of that concern that it was to his interest to take a certain political position affecting the election of a United States Senator; and

Whereas there are general and specific charges of misconduct, irregularity, dishonesty, and other activity on the part of the said James A. Farley, it is due to the people of the United States, the Government of the United States, and the said James A. Farley that a reasonable and fair disclosure be made of said matters: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Senate of the United States does hereby order an investigation into the public and official conduct of the said James A. Farley and all matters conducted by him affecting the business of the United States and the expenditure of funds of the United States, and that the said committee be composed of 3 Members of the United States Senate, not more than 2 of whom shall be members of the same political party, to be selected by the Vice President of the United States and to be approved by the said Senate; and that said committee shall have all authority necessary and proper to procure evidence, summon witnesses, to hear testimony, and compel the production of books, records, accounts, statistics, employ experts, and do any and all such other things as may be necessary to carry out the purpose of said investigation; and be it further

Resolved, That any reports of investigations and data secured by the Department of the Interior, particularly through Louis Glavis and those associated with him, on the affairs in which said James A. Farley has participated for the Government of the United States, be forthwith furnished to the United States Senate to be, after proper perusal by Members of the said United States Senate, referred to the said committee to be provided for herein.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] to the resolution.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that I am beginning to talk at exactly 12½ minutes past 11 o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will properly keep the time under the unanimous-consent agreement. One-half of the time is to be controlled by the Senator from Louisiana and one-half by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR].

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, yesterday afternoon the Senators from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], and Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] were very apprehensive as to the genuineness of an affidavit which I offered. I not only have present in one of the galleries of the Senate the party who made the affidavit but likewise another lady who volunteered last night to give another affidavit. I ask Senators to listen to me read another affidavit which not only proves the first affidavit, in part, but gives a lot more information that is quite startling to anybody except someone who wants to whitewash Jim Farley.

Here is an affidavit taken before Mr. Charles F. Pace, financial clerk of the United States Senate:

My name is Miss Lottie Koch. I live at 616 Seventy-third Street, Brooklyn, N. Y. I make this statement, to be verified as an affidavit, of my own free will and accord, and without the promise of reward. I came this morning of my own free will to Washington, D. C., to the office of United States Senator HUXY P. LONG, where I gave him the following knowledge, which I now restate as my affidavit:

I was an employee of the firm of James Stewart & Co., Inc., from May 27, 1918, until November 29, 1934, in the capacity as file clerk. While there I knew Mrs. Helen Humphreys, who was a confidential attaché and telephone operator in the office of the concern. Along about June or July 1934 it was reported that Federal investigators were coming to look into the files of James Stewart & Co. There was great excitement in the office. I was called by Mr. A. M. Stewart and instructed to bring to him any letters in the files from Mr. Jim Farley. I went into the private file of Mr. Watts and got two letters from Mr. Farley and carried them to Mr. A. M. Stewart and handed them to him in the presence of his secretary, Mr. Robert Kob, and Mr. M. E. Kalette. These two letters were as follows:

One was a letter from Mr. Farley to Watts relative to some Mother's Day stamps. Mr. Watts had written Mr. Farley asking for a special sheet of the Mother's Day stamps and Mr. Farley had written Mr. Watts back that the issue was in great demand and that he would send him some of the stamps if he could get them.

The other letter from Mr. Farley was signed "Jim", and contained a short paragraph reading as follows:

"The matter is in abeyance. Contract is yours. (Signed) 'Jim.'"

Deponent knows that this letter pertains to the Vesey Street post office.

Along about this time Major Stevens, the Washington representative of James Stewart & Co., was in the office in connection with the Federal investigators, and was very busy running from one part of the office to another to tell them what this file or the other file might contain, and whether it should be supplied or not. In due course the company began to remove from its files certain papers, particularly including the files pertaining to the granite work on the courthouse building, and in course of such work began as though it were installing a new filing system, and over a period of several months, in which said James Stewart & Co. was removing files from the cabinets, and at the same time installing a new system. Finally, on November 29, 1934, deponent was discharged, and the only statement ever given to her was by her successor, who told her that "Your memory is too good."

Deponent started in with the said company working for $20 per week and rose to a salary of $190 per month, which, after the general offices had taken two cuts in salary, was reduced to $150 per month. No complaint was ever made against her services until the trouble came up over the Federal investigation, and when that arose, one of the vice presidents, Mr. Lohmann, who handled none of the Government work, but who was a vice president of the company, protested that deponent had never failed to be able to secure anything from the files that was needed, but as soon as the courthouse work had been completed, and the work of removing certain papers out of the files pertaining to the same and to other work, deponent was dismissed.

Deponent can state that Mrs. Helen Humphreys was so close in the confidence of the Stewarts that she was invited to their most intimate affairs, including their funerals and their weddings, and drew a salary, she thinks, of about $63 a week.

Deponent would be pleased to appear before any committee to give this testimony under oath.

(Signed) LOTTIE KOCH.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,

District of Columbia, City of Washington:

Before me, the undersigned authority, personally came and appeared Miss Lottie Koch, as introduced to me by United States Senator HUEY P. LONG, who, being by me first duly and legally sworn, says the allegations and facts of the above and foregoing statement are true and correct.

LOTTIE KOCH.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this 14th day of May 1935.
[SEAL] CHARLES F. PACE,

Notary Public, District of Columbia.

My commission expires February 12, 1936.

As I have stated, this affidavit was sworn to before Mr. Charles F. Pace, financial clerk of the United States Senate, whose office adjoins the Senate Chamber. Attached to that affidavit is a statement by Mrs. Helen Humphreys, reading as follows:

STATEMENT BY MRS. HELEN HUMPHREYS

In the presence of the witnesses attesting hereto, I wish to reiterate all contained in the copy of the affidavit filed in the United States Senate, which I read in the papers, and express my desire to testify under oath concerning the same, and to point out the places where an investigation will show the particulars of record, such as files, books, and accounts of the Government, and particularly records of insurance companies, and the books and vouchers showing to whom were paid the premiums, as mentioned in my previous affidavit.

(Signed) MRS. HELEN HUMPHREYS.

Witness:

Attest:

E. J. HICKEY.

HUEY P. LONG.

That statement is witnessed by Mr. E. J. Hickey, one of the employees in the office of the Secretary of the Senate, and also witnessed by myself.

I send the original affidavit to the desk.

Mr. President, let us go a little further. Let us go further, when we are talking about whitewashing old Jim, before this alabaster coat is put on this man who says he will not allow himself to be investigated and who, according to these reliable, responsible, and truthful witnesses, not only rifled the files of the Government but rifled the files of Stewart & Co. Before Senators get ready to whitewash him, we had better see what the Government itself says about this gang of brigands and thieves.

I have a new compilation of which any Senator may have a copy. If any Senator reads this compilation, he will not hesitate a moment to agree that the investigation ought to occur. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY] said he had read all in this file. I had not read it until this morning, but after I read it I wondered how the Senator from North Carolina could ever rise on the floor of the Senate again and tell the Senate that he is the son of a preacher, after I found this in the files that he did not see. [Laughter.] Here it is. If Senators will take these things and read them, they will find that all this file is complete incrimination of the deepest dye by Ickes' employees, Wharton Green and Glavis, these investigators. There never was a deeper dyed conspiracy of such a criminal aspect laid to an organization in the history of the world than is laid to this crowd represented right here in this file. Let me read a line or two of it. Here is one of the letters from Wharton Green to Glavis, on page 14 of the compilation. I merely call attention to the underscored lines in the letter. There is plenty more of this, and much of it is of this kind:

The close contact between Stewart's organization and the Procurement Division is to my mind indicated by the fact that Stewart knew from Washington that this courthouse investigation, which he stopped, as he stated, "because of orders from Washington", would also be resumed for the same reason.

Notice that. This is the same Wharton Green making his report to Glavis. I said there was no question about the officers and the men in charge of this work and this office down here being in close contact with the Stewart outfit and being a part of them; that they knew more about it than was known here, and when the investigators went there they had orders from Washington not to allow them to see the files which this very Department had sent them there to get.

This is the very Department, as will be shown by these letters, which sent these investigators to the Stewart offices in New York City for the purpose of getting the papers showing this diabolical swindle and fraud, and when they got there the Department gave orders not to allow the investigators to go into those files which were not at that time destroyed.

Whitewash them? Send them to the United States Senate. Like Frederick the Great, who said he would have somebody in Heidelberg explain why he took Vienna, Mr. Farley will have somebody in the United States Senate explain why they swindled the Government out of $500,000 and rifled the files and put in a new filing system later. He will have somebody in the United States Senate to explain this thing. Do not worry about that! Go ahead and exonerate him and you will hear more from the country when you do.

Listen to this:

In other words, there exists now and has for a long time a constant contact and complete understanding between Watts, Stewart's New York representative; Stevens, Stewart's Washington representative; Reynolds, of the Procurement Division; and Roberts, formerly of the same division.

We may not be able to secure proof there were irregularities in connection with the award of contracts or subcontracts on either the courthouse or post-office annex, but the circumstances that those connected with same appear greatly concerned is indicative of something.

Then what did they do? When they went into it, what did they say? Here is what they said, just before they locked the gate and said, "Don't come back here." Look over here to this letter on page 17:

Referring to mine of the 19th instant—

This is from the same man—

I am informed that the principal change from the contract drawings and specifications, which has been made by the Treasury Department since the award of the contract to James Stewart & Co., of New York City, was the substitution of Vermont marble for the marble specified—

I want the Missouri Senators to listen to this—

(said to have been known under the trade name of "St. Genevieve" (?)), and that for this change James Stewart & Co. allowed the Government but $140,000, whereas the actual difference in cost was about $550,000.

Listen to that, Senators! I told you $387,000, according to my figures yesterday afternoon. Here are the figures out of the file of the Secretary of the Interior which say that the difference was around $410,000; and any man who will take a lead pencil and a piece of paper and subtract one from the other is bound to come to the conclusion that that fraud was perpetrated. Here are these letters, one letter after the other, every one of which certifies to the fact that they locked the door up there and would not allow these men to go in and see what had occurred.

That is not half the story. This is about the toughest, crookedest, rottenest, most open, most corrupt fraud that has ever been put on paper. There never has been a fraud like this in a court. There never has been a case so openly crooked and alleged to be and certified to be so rotten and so crooked and so corrupt in the history of this Government. There never has been crookedness, rottener, lower-down stealing ever put in the nostrils of the people to have a defense made. Do not worry about it; there will be a defense made in the United States Senate.

What did they do? Here is what they did: They sent these men to New York—you have the letter before you—and they did not get old man Cass Gilbert to sign this thing to permit the change, but they got it done down here in the Treasury Department. The architect was afraid to do it. The architect made an affidavit—I have it there for you—that he had nothing whatever to do with changing those prices and nothing to do with fixing the value. On the contrary, they came down here to a man whose appointment was given by Farley—2 of them, 3 of them—and they made that change between the 15th day of June and the 26th day of June 1933; and when the investigators went up to get the papers, what did they say? They said:

We are not going to allow you to go into this thing any further. It is already killed. Mr. Cass Gilbert died of a broken heart after he found out what had been put over on him, and we are not going to allow you to go any further into it.

They actually claimed—and you have it before you; it is there, in the papers I have had stenciled for you this morning—they actually claimed that this fraud on the Government of $410,000 to $500,000 had broken old man Cass Gilbert's heart when he found out that the Farley organization had put it over on him, and he did not know anything about it; and when Glavis' men went up to New York to get documents out of the files of James C. Stewart & Co., and they were calling in the women and taking out the papers out of the file, and they were rifling the filing cabinet of what was contained in it because the Federal investigators were on the way, what happened? According to these papers that I have submitted for you to read, if you care to read them, when they got up to New York to see Stewart & Co., the investigators walked into the door of Stewart & Co., and who was there? The officers of Stewart & Co.? No; four officers of the United States Treasury Department were sitting in the private office of Mr. Watts. The investigators walked in to examine the files of Stewart & Co., and these four men, all of whom owed their jobs to James A. Farley, were seated in the private office of Mr. Watts. The investigators walked in and said, "Why, gentlemen, we are surprised to see the Treasury Department representatives here in this office that we have come to investigate." That is all in the papers before you there. The Treasury Department men said, "We are up here to see that you do not go too far. You are not only investigating Stewart", they said; "you are investigating the Government, and we are going to demand of you that you give us the names of these damnable scoundrels who have defamed the names of these Government people before we allow you to proceed any further."

"Why", the investigators said, "gentlemen, that is not under us. That was all thrashed out at Washington, D. C., between the Treasury Department and the Department of the Interior, before we ever came here. That has all been arranged. We have only our duty to perform, to come here to go through these files, to investigate." The Treasury Department men said, "We are not going to have anything like that"; and this Mr. Watts, the vice president of James Stewart & Co., who was made vice president at a salary of $25,000 a year, according to the evidence I have submitted here, for no reason on earth except for the fact that he had an inside contact with James A. Farley—this man was there, protected by four officers of the Treasury Department, who defied Glavis' organization from the other Government department to go into the files of James C. Stewart & Co.; and in the meantime they continued to rifle the files, and to install a new filing system, until eventually they fired the old filing clerk; and then, the next thing, what happened?

The Treasury Department said that if there was going to be any investigation of this matter, they did not think Mr.

Glavis ought to be so much in it, and that they ought to be allowed to do it themselves; whereupon Mr. Glavis and his assistants reported that in view of the position taken, there was no need for them to go any further. "Here are the facts. They are there", they said. "There is an absolute understanding; there is a contract; there is a working organization between them. There is no need to go any further, and therefore let nothing be done about it", because the Treasury Department officers would not allow them to go any further in the investigation of this rampant swindle that was going on at the time.

Mr. President, I desire to save a little time for someone else. I have a little more proof here.

The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKellar], when I began to read him the list of 30 or 40 witnesses here yesterday afternoon, none of whom he summoned, sought to explain that he was not expected to summon anybody. Here is his own resolution from the Post Offices and Post Roads Committee. He never got an appropriation from the United States Senate to summon a witness or to pay for taking the testimony of a witness until May 1, 1935. He knew they were not summoning any witnesses before that committee. He did not summon any witnesses; but, as prejudiced as the mind of the Senator from Tennessee appears to me to be, he does not want to hear the facts. He could not see them when they were there. He would not see them; but they will not face the music. Go ahead; try to whitewash this thing, Mr. President.

According to my understanding, I have occupied 20 minutes of my time. I should like to reserve a little time to see just what can be done under these disclosures which no one can dispute unless he defies the Government that made its own investigation.

Mr. McKellar. Mr. President, this resolution was introduced by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. Long] on February 11, 1935. It contains six charges, all based on hearsay.

The first one is:

It has been reported that—

The second one:

It is further alleged that—

The third:

It is further publicly known that—

The fourth:

It has been further charged that—

The fifth:

It is further alleged that—

And the sixth:

It has been charged that—

What are these charges, Mr. President? All of them are made on hearsay, none on knowledge. As the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. Bailey] so accurately and so ably pointed out in his forceful and wonderful speech of yesterday, the facts as to each one of these six charges were all gone into.

The first charge was that certain concerns in New York had been buying materials from the firm of James A. Farley and that such concerns had contracts with the Government. Later on, the Senator charged that wrongdoing was committed by Mr. Farley in connection with the construction of a Federal post-office building in New York.

At that point the Senator from Louisiana offered a resolution, which was unanimously adopted, as I recall, asking for the files of papers in reference to those two contracts as existing in the Department of the Interior and in the Treasury Department.

The request for the papers was granted by the Senate, the resolution was adopted by the Senate, and the papers were furnished by the Department. The papers went before the committee, but instead of doing what the Senator from Louisiana declared they would do, namely, prove his charges in connection with those contracts, they absolutely disproved those charges.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. No; I cannot yield. I refuse to yield. The papers absolutely disproved the charges, and the Senator, notwithstanding that fact, while he had the papers before him, and has had them ever since the report of the committee, stated yesterday that those papers had been rifled. The papers themselves show that there is not a word of truth in that statement. On the contrary, the only paper that even his friend Glavis—

Mr. LONG. Mr. President—

Mr. McKELLAR. I decline to yield.

Mr. LONG. A point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator declines to yield.

Mr. LONG. A point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it. What is the point of order?

Mr. LONG. He says my "friend Glavis." I do not know Glavis, never saw him in my life.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator does not state a point of order.

Mr. McKELLAR. I decline to yield.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Tennessee has declined to be interrupted.

Mr. McKELLAR. And I ask that these interruptions not be taken out of my time but that they be taken out of the time of the Senator from Louisiana.

There was a statement by Glavis that some letter was not in the record. When the papers were examined by the Department and sent to the committee, it was found that that supposedly missing letter was in the files and had never been out of the files.

I mention these matters to show that the Senator has made speech after speech in this body and is still harping on the charge of dishonesty on the part of Mr. Farley as to these two contracts, when the papers which he produced, which he laid before the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, show beyond the peradventure of a doubt that every statement he made about it—and which he has continued to make about it—is without the slightest foundation in fact insofar as Mr. Farley is concerned.

The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY] pointed that out in the evidence and cited the evidence, but I feel it to be my duty, inasmuch as the Senator from Louisiana continues to harp on those cases, to tell the Senate exactly what the record which the Senator from Louisiana produced shows, that is, that there is not a word of truth in his statements concerning James A. Farley's connection with those contracts.

While I am on the subject of those contracts I may say that the Senator brings in a belated paper, or a copy of one, two paragraphs of which he referred to, and I am going to read those paragraphs. The first one starts:

The close contact between Stewart's organization and the Procurement Division.

Mr. President, the Procurement Division is in the Department of the Treasury. The Senator seems to think it is in the Post Office Department. It is not in that Department at all.

The close contact between Stewart's organization and the Procurement Division is to my mind indicated by the fact that Stewart knew from Washington that this courthouse investigation, which he stopped, as he stated "because of orders from Washington", would also be resumed for the same reason. In both cases Stewart had the information here before we did. In other words there exists now, and has for a long time, a constant contact and complete understanding between Watts, Stewart's New York representative; Stevens, Stewart's Washington representative; Reynolds, of the Procurement Division; and Roberts, formerly of the same division.

We may not be able to secure proof there were irregularities in connection with the award of contracts or subcontracts on either the courthouse or post-office annex, but the circumstances that those connected with same appear greatly concerned is indicative of something.

(Signed) WHARTON GREEN.

There is not the slightest connection established with Mr. Farley; oh, no. Mr. Farley's name does not appear in it. It is with the Procurement Division, with officers in the Treasury Department named, some of whom are no longer there. Yet this is lugged in here in order to exploit the personal and political malice and spleen of the Senator from Louisiana against James A. Farley, whom he cannot control.

I digress here long enough to say, Mr. President, that it makes no difference who it is; it may be Jim Farley, it may be a Senator on this floor, it may be a Cabinet officer, it may be a humble citizen anywhere, if he does not agree with the Senator from Louisiana he is a scoundrel, he is a thief, he is a boodler; he is everything that is dishonest and corrupt if he simply disagrees with the Senator from Louisiana. He stops at no one.

Senators heard the statement, I may say the horribly untrue statement, made by the Senator from Louisiana against our great President only last week. His speech is to be found in the RECORD of last Friday, May 10, in which he denounced the President of the United States as a corruptionist, and called him every vile and inconceivable name, and implied all villainess and corruption and dishonesty to the President of the United States. He does not stop at anybody. The President does not agree with him, the President does not let him control him, and therefore the President is dishonest.

The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], as honest and as fine a man as ever lived in this country, a great statesman, a great leader, one of the greatest leaders we have ever had in this body, is denounced by the Senator from Louisiana on occasions when the Senator from Arkansas does not agree with him. It may be that the Senator from Arkansas has done nothing to him, yet he denounces him when he does not agree with him.

He denounces Mr. Farley. He declared that the Interior Department had the evidence which would prove the scandalous charges he had been making, and when the record was produced and the evidence was not what he wanted, he denounced Mr. Ickes and everybody in that Department except Glavis.

Next he abuses the Post Office Committee, and he does not stop at that. The committee tried to make an honest investigation of this matter. We were not controlled by the Senator from Louisiana, and because we did not agree with him in the charges made by him and proved by the record to be untrue, he denounces the members of our committee.

He denounces my friend, the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], one of the purest and best men, and one of the best Senators who ever sat in this body. He denounces him simply because the Senator from North Carolina did not and does not agree with him—that is all. All anyone has to do if he wants to be denounced is to differ on any subject with the Senator from Louisiana. If any Senator wants to be denounced on the floor of the Senate all he has to do is to differ with the Senator from Louisiana and he will promptly be denounced.

Mr. President, to be perfectly frank, I am getting exceedingly tired of such denunciations on the part of the Senator from Louisiana. It ought not to be done here in the Senate of the United States.

He denounced me the other day and said I had attacked him. I never attacked him voluntarily in my life. Everything I have said concerning the Senator from Louisiana has been said when he invited the attack by some statement of his which was not in accord with the facts, and a man who will not defend himself should not be in this body. One does not deserve a place in this body if he is not willing to protect himself.

I proceed. Those two charges were absolutely disproven. Then came the next one—and let me refer briefly to what the others were.

First, that Mr. Farley had established a wire service leading into the gambling houses in the United States from the race tracks. That was absolutely disproved.

The Senator from Louisiana alleged that Mr. Farley commandeered for his personal use certain utilities. That was absolutely disproved.

He charged that he attempted dishonestly to influence the election of a United States Senator in West Virginia. That was absolutely disproved. What were the facts? It was charged that Mr. Farley told a railroad company that unless they would support his candidate for Senator in West Virginia a loan of $25,000,000 would not be granted. Mr. Jones told the committee the facts, and the statement of the facts appears here in writing. Jesse Jones, Chairman of the R. F. C., testified that instead of lending the money to the railroad company the R. F. C. had collected about half of its debt. Its debt had been $25,000,000. They collected $12,000,000 of it; and he said that Mr. Farley had never mentioned the matter to him one way or the other. In other words, the Senator made that charge with the same zeal and emphasis and the same abuse, in the same horrible language customarily used by the Senator from Louisiana in making charges, like certain belated charges he is now making, to which I will come in a moment. I insert here a copy of Mr. Jones' statement:

RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION,
Washington, March 7, 1935.

HON. KENNETH MCKELLAR,
Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR MCKELLAR: In reply to your letter of March 6, enclosing copy of Senator LONG's letter to the Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads of the same date, in which you ask for information this morning concerning the reference by Senator LONG to a loan of $52,000,000 to the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, beg to advise that we made no loan of $52,000,000 to this road.

The Baltimore & Ohio Railroad owed our Corporation a note of $25,500,000, due August 10, 1934, this loan having been made 2 years prior. To meet this note and to provide the road with other funds that it needed, the Baltimore & Ohio offered, through its bankers, a $50,000,000, 5-year secured note issue. The loan was certified by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and our Corporation estimated the value of the security behind the $50,000,000 loan to be approximately $90,000,000.

We agreed to lend the road any part of the unsold portion. The net result of the transaction was that the bankers sold all but $13,490,000 of the $50,000,000 issue and the Corporation received a cash payment on its $25,500,000 loan of $12,144,900, and notes of the new $50,000,000 issue in the amount of $13,355,100.

In the opinion of every member of our Board the loan was well secured, and neither Mr. Farley nor anyone else ever spoke to me or to any other member of our Board about this loan, except officials of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad and the bankers who handled the issue.

Very sincerely yours,

JESSE JONES, Chairman.

The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY] has gone over the proof in this hearing and has done it well, and I cannot see how any Member of the Senate, whether Democrat or Republican, can vote for the pending resolution after hearing the facts as stated by the Senator from North Carolina. Later on in the Senate the Senator from Louisiana made additional charges, one about a Kansas City convict, I believe, who had committed some crime, and that Farley had helped him. Yet we have the Attorney General's statement before our committee that he had never heard of Farley in the matter; never had consulted with him; that he had had nothing in the world to do with him. And so on with all the charges. I attach the Attorney General's statement:

No action taken by the Department of Justice in any of these matters was at the instance or suggestion of Mr. Farley. No appointment or designation of any attorney or agent to handle any phase thereof was suggested by him, nor was any official removed or caused to resign at his request.

Then yesterday, when the resolution came up in the Senate itself, what happened? Did the Senator from Louisiana rely on the charges theretofore made? Oh, no. He abandoned those charges. He scarcely referred to them. He knew the evidence was in and knew that no Senator would vote to sustain any such charges on the facts presented to the committee. He knew that. He knew those charges were absolutely without any evidence to support them, and what did he do? He abandoned them and then filed an affidavit. Senators heard the affidavit. It was a very adroitly worded affidavit, which could be regarded in almost any sense.

I was interested in the debate which ensued yesterday as to whether the lady who made the affidavit could be punished for perjury if the statements she made were not true. The learned Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK], one of the ablest lawyers in this body and one of its best Senators, thought that she might be punished for perjury.

After a careful examination of that affidavit—we have not obtained the original as yet; have never been able to see the original; the copy of that affidavit, which the Senator says is a true copy, and we take his word for it, is the only one we have seen—after a careful examination of it, I do not believe that anyone could be prosecuted for perjury on account of any statement made in that affidavit. It is too vague and indefinite. It has to do with overhearing a conversation over the telephone. The lady does not even claim that she knew the voice of Mr. Farley, and yet she was a telephone operator, a telephone operator who listened in to this conversation. Whether she is still with the company or not now I do not know. The newspapers say that she is a discharged employee.

Then, after the debate on that subject yesterday, the Senator from Louisiana, knowing there was nothing in that affidavit, undertakes to get another one with which to prop up his case, and he brings in the affidavit of Miss Lottie Koch, another discharged employee of James Stewart & Co. Take everything that Miss Koch says and there is nothing in it. Nothing in the world in it! She says that Mr. Watts had written Mr. Farley. There were two letters. She says:

One was a letter from Mr. Farley to Watts relative to some Mother's Day stamps. Mr. Watts had written Mr. Farley asking for a special sheet of the Mother's Day stamps and Mr. Farley had written Mr. Watts back that the issue was in great demand and that he would send him some of the stamps if he could get them.

Is there anything criminal about that? Is there anything wrong about that?

What the other letter contained we do not know, because there is only one short excerpt taken from it. She says with reference to that:

The other letter from Mr. Farley was signed "Jim", and contained a short paragraph reading as follows:

"The matter is in abeyance. Contract is yours."

(Signed) "JIM."

Whatever else may be in the letter we do not know. All we know about that letter is that:

The matter is in abeyance. Contract is yours.

There is no telling what that was. Mr. Farley was not issuing any contracts. Mr. Farley was not the head of the contracting part of the Government. It does not implicate Mr. Farley in the slightest degree. We would have to see the letter and go into the matter to determine if there was anything wrong in it.

But, Mr. President, is it possible that after hearing all the proof, after hearing these charges—10 in number—taking those which were originally filed and those which were afterward filed in speeches—all of which were considered by the committee—taking them all, suppose we have all of them, and knowing that there was no proof to sustain any of them, we are next confronted—

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President—

Mr. MCKELLAR. I decline to yield.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee declines to yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. MCKELLAR. We were next confronted with two charges brought in here yesterday after the case is closed, after the hearings have been had, after the Senator from Louisiana was invited time and again to bring his witnesses and to tell what they would testify; and when he declined to do it—

Mr. LONG rose.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I decline to yield. I am not going to have the Senator taking up my time.

After he declined to do it, and had to be written to twice by the committee in order to get him even to undertake to do something, he came on the Senate floor and stated what he had. He did not come to the committee. He produced no names to the committee. He never has. But he came here before the Senate and made a speech in which he replied to my last letter, but a reply to that letter never was received by me nor by the committee, and every member of the committee knows that what I have said about it is the absolute fact.

Mr. President, are we now to pass on these belated affidavits? Everyone knows that after the discussion yesterday if the Senate had voted it would have voted against this resolution, even with the affidavit which was produced yesterday. The Senator from Louisiana knew it perfectly well. So he hies himself out in order to try to save this resolution by getting in an additional affidavit. I read a part of that affidavit to the Senate. The Senator from Louisiana has read it all. Take every word of it as true and there will be found in it no ground for changing any Senator's vote on the pending resolution.

Mr. President, as my time is limited, I reserve the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Louisiana has 15 minutes more.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President—

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I desire it understood that the Senator from Wyoming is not speaking in my time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Louisiana has control of his portion of the time.

Mr. LONG. I do not want to control it. I just want it understood that the Senator from Wyoming is speaking in the time of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no, Mr. President.

Mr. LONG. Then I decline to give the Senator any time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No one may speak in the time of the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, inasmuch as the Senator from Louisiana is going to speak again, I feel I ought to take some more time at this moment to refer to another matter which I have overlooked, so as to give the Senator from Louisiana an opportunity to reply.

Yesterday afternoon, after the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] had made a remarkably forceful speech, as he always does on any subject to which he addresses himself, the Senator from Louisiana offered an amendment, and I desire to read that amendment at this time:

To enable the Congress to secure such information as may be necessary for the consideration and enactment of legislation.

In other words, the Senator at this late hour undertakes to meet the objection raised by the Senator from Idaho, which I believe is a good objection. But what are the facts? What did the Senator from Louisiana have to do in order to put in that amendment? He certainly had to pocket his pride, and he certainly had to deny what he had said before on the same subject, because previously he made speeches about this matter, and he told in those speeches why this resolution was presented. I read from his speech of February 12. By the way, he has changed his mind about the President, as well as Mr. Farley, since that time. I read:

Mr. LONG. No; I will not agree to that. I think I know Mr. Roosevelt is a pretty good politician—and I mean that as a compliment, for a man who is a good politician will, just because he is a politician, learn that it is good to be honest in politics if he means to stay there very long.

I think Mr. Roosevelt is pretty good in other lines, too; but the Bible says: "Abstain from all appearance of evil", and when the committee is called to investigate Farley it is going to be "Katy, bar the door"; he is a "gone goslin"; he is going to quit; he will "fly the coop"; there will be no more to it; that will be already finished when Mr. Farley is ordered to be investigated by the Senate.

What does that show? Does that show the purpose of this resolution to afford a background for legislation? That statement shows his venom, spleen, hatred, and malice toward James A. Farley, whom the Senator could not control.

Just as I said in the beginning, any man whom the Senator from Louisiana cannot control, any man whom the "Kingfish" cannot make smaller fish out of, any man with whom he cannot have his way, he immediately denounces. The Senate offers him a forum, and he denounces him here on the floor. The denouncement in this case showed real spirit and feeling of the Senator from Louisiana; it showed his real reason for submitting this resolution. It was not for the purpose of providing a background for legislation, but it was for the purpose of venting spleen against James A. Farley, a man whom he could not control.

But that is not all. On the 21st the Senator from Louisiana again showed exactly the purpose of this resolution. I read:

Of course, I should not object to him having the right until he is kicked out of the Cabinet, and he is going out just as sure as 2 and 2 make 4—

The Senator from Louisiana is talking about mathematics again, let me say to the Senator from Arkansas, his kind of mathematics—

And he is going out just as sure as 2 and 2 make 4. He is on the way out. He is just as surely on his way out as that we have a Pennsylvania Avenue here in Washington.

Again showing the purpose of the resolution. Legislation! Of course no legislation was in view back of it. He does not desire any legislation. The Senate has heard him speak time and again since this controversy began. His desire is to incriminate, if he can, to abuse, to traduce, to destroy the good character of the man whose only offense was that he did not agree with the Senator from Louisiana and would not be controlled by him.

Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. LONG and Mr. O'MAHONEY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, the Senator from Tennessee, unfortunately for him and for many of his friends, has become not only a painter but a very poor painter. In other words, he is the sorriest exhibition of a whitewasher that I have ever seen. [Laughter.] I do not believe I have ever before seen one just get right up in front of a proposition and fall down and bellow like somebody was trying to do something to him and he was afraid he would not. All that can be made out of the answer of the Senator from Tennessee is that when he reached the things for which there is no explanation and about which there cannot be any dispute he engaged in a tirade of vilification and indicated that his feelings were hurt because, as he said, away back yonder somebody said something about a lot of people. I do not suppose I have talked about my colleagues any worse than they have talked about me, and I do not suppose some of my colleagues feel any worse toward me, maybe, than I may feel toward them, and that may be a justification to them; but what has that got to do with this case? Why not come down and face the music?

The Senator from Tennessee attacks Glavis.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I was just wondering if the Senator considers it an attack on Mr. Glavis because I called him "a friend of the Senator from Louisiana"? I was wondering if that was what the Senator objected to?

Mr. LONG. That is the only way the Senator from Tennessee meant it. The fact that Glavis was a friend of mine was a terrible thing; that is the connection in which the Senator from Tennessee used it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will not answer as to that.

Mr. LONG. If the Senator can figure it any other way, very well.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator may draw his own conclusions.

Mr. LONG. I do not know Glavis. He is an employee in the Interior Department. It was Glavis, I understand, who once helped to unseat a whole Presidential government in connection with the Pinchot-Ballinger case. Well, we do not need Glavis to unseat this one; there is enough besides Glavis to do it; but just by a queer stroke of fate you fall down here and do not make any answer—and there will be none made, because there cannot be any made—to the charge that there was substituted, instead of 60,000 cubic feet of marble, 46,000 cubic feet, and instead of $12.50 marble, $4 marble, the testimony showing clearly by the oath of two witnesses that Mr. Farley was manipulating it, the testimony showing by Glavis' report that there was that contact, and testimony is ready to be produced to show every bit of it. Nonetheless, no denial is made on this floor but that $410,000 of the money of the people of the United States was filched as clearly from the Department of the Treasury, through this Farley negotiation, as if he had robbed a bank in daylight or in nighttime. Does the Senator from Tennessee make any answer to that? No. He makes no answer.

Does the Senator from Tennessee make any answer to the fact that through their negotiations up there and Farley's manipulations they rifled the files of the letters and rifled the files of some of the contracts, or does he make the slightest contradiction of the fact that, according to Mr. Glavis' report, they would not allow them to go in there and examine the files after they had been sent there? Strange as it may seem, every one of those particular men whom I have inquired about is known to have been a mere puppet, placed in the Treasury Department by James A. Farley, who controls the dispensation of all patronage and practically the dispensation of work.

Why not have some answer from the Senator from Tennessee instead of a common ordinary bellow? Why not have some answer? Mr. President, I recall that in my old days on the farm, when you would finally get a dog to where he was afraid to go out and tackle something, the only thing he would do would be to just lie down, right in the hot open sun, and bellow. While we were hunting wild hogs which were a little bit dangerous, I have seen dogs, when they would get on the scent of the hogs, lie down and bellow, and the closer to the scent they would get the louder the dogs would yelp, and the surer they were to turn around, stand still, and refuse to move a single inch.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am wondering if it was the same dog the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY] was talking about yesterday.

Mr. LONG. The Senator from Tennessee is standing here baying at the moon when there is not even a moon to look at, but he refuses to face the fact that $410,000—and he cannot deny it—was taken out of the Treasury of the United States Government.

What else? I read from another one of the letters from Green to Glavis:

James Stewart & Co., of New York City, are the general contractors for the above, and in the course of an investigation of this firm, which we are now conducting of the post-office annex (ser. N. Y. 089-P. W.), we are given to understand that James Stewart & Co. will realize over a half million dollars by irregularities in connection with changes which are being made from the contract plans and specifications.

Get that! The Senator from Tennessee says that proves that it is all right; he actually says that it proves that water runs uphill. Here is a document that was filed by the office of Mr. Ickes, and the Senator from Tennessee says that it proves that everything was all pure, white, and holy:

These changes, we are told, involve principally marble and bronze work. We are further advised that a running fight has been under way from the start of the work between the architect, Cass Gilbert, and the contractor, James Stewart & Co., but that the contractor, through his political connections in New York and Washington, has been able to get away with almost anything.

That is from the file, but, lo and behold! when you go and look to see how they got away with this change in the marble, which was supposed to come out of Missouri, the contract which said the specification could not be changed except by and with the consent of the supervising architect went for naught, because they came down to Washington, D. C., and got an appointee of Farley in the Treasury Department to give them the O. K. to make the change that put $410,000 in their pockets.

That does not mean anything; you are going to whitewash it, are you? But I will be at the next washing. Go ahead and whitewash him, but I will be at the next washing.

Here is a little bit more of the substance of this investigation as it went along:

On account of increasing talk in the trade of the above and other questionable transactions in connection with this project was the direct cause of the very recent death of the architect for the project, Mr. Cass Gilbert.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator read the remainder of that paragraph? He did not start at the beginning.

Mr. LONG. It says, "It is rumored."

Mr. BLACK. Yes; I did not hear that.

Mr. LONG. I was making the reading as short as I could on account of the brevity of time. I have everything in the document here. The Senator will find further that Cass Gilbert never approved the change in the marble work. If I do not start at the heading of some paragraph, the Senators will understand that I am conserving my time as much as I can.

In a conference today with Mr. J. S. Stewart and H. D. Watts (of James Stewart & Co.) in their office in New York City, Special Agent Bruce and I requested permission to examine the company's records and file appertaining to the construction of the New York Federal courthouse and were advised by them that their Mr. Forris D. Stevens (Washington representative) had discussed the matter with Mr. Reynolds, of the Procurement Division, Treasury Department, a few days ago, and Mr. Reynolds advised Mr. Stevens that it was the desire of Admiral Peoples—that the investigation of the record should be commenced in the Treasury Department of Washington, and that therefore the Stewart Co., in deference to Admiral Peoples' wishes, denied us access to the company's records at this point.

Now mark you, Mr. President, they sent them to Stewart & Co. to investigate the records of Stewart & Co., and when they got to the records of Stewart & Co. up there they were met by four officers and agents of the Treasury Department, every one of whom was an appointee designated by James A. Farley. When they got up there and these four men faced them, they said, "Halt. We are not going to let you go into these files. We have decided you will have to turn around and go back to Washington, D. C., and investigate the Treasury Department first." They came back to Washington, and then the Treasury Department advised them they could go back to New York and investigate. They went back to New York to investigate and were told then, "You cannot investigate because you have not given the names of the people who made the complaints."

Their trip up there gives the Senator from Tennessee something to bellow about—not something to talk about, but something to bellow about. That is all he has done since the investigation has been under way. He said they had all the evidence before the committee. They never had one line of competent testimony before the committee. The Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads up until this date has never called one witness. Did the Senator hear what I said?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; I heard, but we had the testimony of the Senator from Louisiana who undertook to testify. I do not know whether or not he counts himself a witness.

Mr. LONG. That is not so at all. I did not undertake to testify. I merely went before the committee as a Member of the United States Senate and told what I wanted to do and what I expected to prove. There has never been one witness subpoenaed. There has never been one witness who was allowed to testify. There has never been one single witness up to this good day who has testified before the committee. Notwithstanding the fact that it was told what I told it, this committee was not expected to summon a witness. That was not the purpose of it. No one ever thought they were going to do it. But now the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] come here with this fictitious kind of argument that they heard evidence, when the fact is they never heard any evidence from one solitary witness. Right now the Senator from Tennessee is not willing to have his own committee hear any evidence.

I challenge the Senator from Tennessee! He will not hear Glavis. I challenge him now! He will not hear Mrs. Humphreys. I challenge him now! He will not hear Green. I challenge him now! He will not hear the woman whose affidavit I filed this morning. I challenge him now! Never has that committee been authorized to hear witnesses under oath until the 1st day of May, but even that committee, with all the prejudice that has been shown to come from the chairman of it and some of the members of it, does not dare to open the doors and hear testimony—not in executive session! Oh, no. I would not want to risk anybody in executive session.

I challenge the Senator from Tennessee! He does not dare hear a line of testimony. That committee never have summoned a single witness. They have never taken a line of testimony. What they have undertaken to do is to hush this thing up, to save the Democratic Party—to save the Democratic Party! Yes, they will save the Democratic Party; but about one more salvation like this and the Democratic Party is through. One more salvation like this and the party is finished.

I hardly suppose the Senator from Tennessee wants any other kind of motion to put himself on record, does he? The Senator from Tennessee has no objection to a roll call on this question has he?

Mr. McKELLAR. Indeed, no. I want a roll call.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I ask that when we vote on this question we have a roll call. The Senator from Tennessee has so expressed his desire.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the request for the yeas and nays seconded? Apparently a sufficient number of Senators have raised their hands. The yeas and nays are ordered.

Mr. LONG. I have only about 5 minutes left under the ruling of the Chair—perhaps less than that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has 3½ minutes left.

Mr. LONG. That is a good compromise.

Mr. President, I have only this to say in conclusion: I have never yet heard a denial of what the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY] said when he asked, "What about that transaction between Knox and Farley and Eastus, the United States attorney?" The Senator from North Carolina said it was a crooked transaction—that one of them ought to be run out of the United States attorney's office, and yet the two of them were imposed on Farley.

Oh, no; do not investigate Farley! We come with the report of Glavis and Green, and it shows that they had permitted this kind of robbery and swindle. What does the Senator from Tennessee say? He said the Treasury Department is crooked and Glavis is a friend of HUEY P. LONG, but Farley is all right. Then we come here with two women who had been confidential employees, who make the affidavits which they have given, who give the names of the insurance companies whose books can be subpoenaed and examined, who give the names of Government files and the files of James A. Stewart & Co. which can be subpoenaed and examined; and what does the Senator from Tennessee say? "Oh, no, no, no! Halt! No sworn testimony! No investigation of any kind. The only kind of evidence I need is a written statement that comes from Mr. Farley or some henchman of Farley."

That is the evidence. The Senator from Tennessee could not pass a law examination today like he did when he was a young man. Today he has it in mind that evidence is a written statement filed by somebody in favor of whom he desires to decide. That would be his definition of evidence today—some unsworn, ex parte statement by some person under investigation in defense of the man in whose favor he wishes to render a decision. That is the only evidence that constitutes proof, according to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. President, that is the case before the Senate. The case will not down. Senators may think this will be the last of it, but it is not even the beginning of it. You can no more squelch these facts than you can make the lightning stop coming when there is a cause in the elements to bring the lightning. You can no more make this man a pure man than you can make a rotten egg edible. Mr. President, all the scientists in the world have tried to make pure that which was impure, but they have never yet found the chemical that could be put in a rotten egg to make it either taste or smell right. The Senator from Tennessee does not have and cannot obtain the chemical properties, nor can anybody else, which can infuse honor into a confessedly crooked, rotten situation that is undertaking through political control today to keep itself from investigation and which dares not have the facts come to light.

Mr. McKELLAR obtained the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee has 9 minutes.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, in conclusion, I merely wish to call the attention of the Senate to one of the numerous and the last misstatements, I believe, of the Senator from Louisiana. He said that I said that employees of the Treasury Department were crooked. I made no such statement. The RECORD will show I made no such statement.

Again, he said I will not answer about the $500,000 which he said Farley stole. Again, speaking of the same amount, he said I will not answer about the $410,000 which he said Farley stole. There is absolutely no evidence on this charge. I call upon any Republican or Democratic member of the committee to say whether there is a line of evidence on that subject in the record. It was not offered before the committee. It is not there, and the Senator from Louisiana knew it was not there when he made the statement.

The Senator from Louisiana again begins to abuse me. He is adding me to some very distinguished company—first of all Mr. Farley. Then he follows with his diatribes against the Democratic Party. He denounces the party which sent him to this body. He is at war with it just as he is at war with everyone else who does not do his bidding. He is at war with his own party. He is at war with his own President. He is at war with the members of the Cabinet who will not do his bidding. And now, because the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads does not do his bidding, he is at war with the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and singles me out as its chairman to vilify and abuse me.

He talks about my "bellowing." I do talk loud, but I do not talk as loud as does the Senator from Louisiana! I think there is no other Senator in this Chamber who can talk as loud as he talks. Certainly no one can talk as vehemently; certainly no one can talk without regard to the facts as does the Senator from Louisiana. I think he is a leader in many things. He is a past grand master as a leader of abuse. In that respect there is nobody who is equal to him in this body. I doubt if there ever was any Senator in this body who could abuse others as can the Senator from Louisiana, with or without cause. Cause is wholly immaterial. It makes no difference. The Senator abuses Mr. Farley because he cannot use him. He abuses the President because he cannot use him. He abuses the Democratic Party because he cannot control it. I say that if we ever have such leadership as the Senator from Louisiana in the Democratic Party, no longer will I be a member of that party.

Mr. LONG. Thank you.

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to say another thing: I do not state it as a fact, but in my humble judgment the Senator from Louisiana will never lead the Democratic Party. He may in some way boss the people down in his own State, as he seems to do, but he is not going to boss the people of the United States, and he is not going to boss the Members of the Senate.

Another matter: In his diatribe against Mr. Farley, the Senator from Louisiana tries to establish a connection between the statements he has read and Mr. Farley by saying that Mr. Farley appointed all the employees. Here are some of the employees to whom reference is made:

One is Mr. Reynolds, who is a civil-service employee of the Treasury Department. To my certain knowledge Mr. Reynolds has been in the Treasury Department some 15 or 20 years.

Another one is Admiral Peoples. To my certain knowledge he has been in one department or the other—either the Navy Department or the Treasury Department—for something like 25 years, during my entire service here. Admiral Peoples was here when I came here. He is one of the finest men God ever made, as honest as the day is long, and as competent and efficient a man as we have in the Government service; yet, because Admiral Peoples does not do the bidding of the "Kingfish" of Louisiana, the "Kingfish" of Louisiana denounces him as a crook and a scoundrel in a place where Admiral Peoples has no opportunity to defend himself.

I say that none of these men were appointees of Farley. The only one who may have been is no longer with the Department, and this paper says he is no longer with the Department.

So, Mr. President, in the last charges that were made, just like all the rest, the Senator from Louisiana is absolutely oblivious to the facts, drawing on his imagination for statements to support what he is temporarily trying to do—working for the first page in the newspapers, trying to advertise himself as some kind of candidate for the Presidency, undertaking to denounce and traduce and vilify, and even going so far as to do it dishonestly in some cases, as he has toward the President of the United States, and as he has toward James A. Farley, and as he has toward me—to carry out his ambition to be President of the United States. A great many things have happened to the United States since our Government was established, but nothing that would be so unspeakable as to have at the head of this Nation a man who has the venom and the hatred and the malice toward everyone who disagrees with him that the Senator from Louisiana has.

Mr. President, the Senator from Louisiana has done himself the gravest injustice by making these charges. He has done a grave injustice to his fellows in the Senate, members of the Post Office Committee, men who—aside from the chairman of the committee—are a thousand times better, fairer men than the Senator from Louisiana. He denounces them as lending themselves to a crooked deal to whitewash a Cabinet officer. It just is not so.

The Republican members of the committee were open and aboveboard about the matter. They were fair and frank about it. They gave their views. They said there was no evidence to support the charges. The Republican members—all of them except the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL] and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER], who were not there—filed their statements, which are absolutely in accordance with the facts.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President—

Mr. McKELLAR. The other members of the committee, the Democratic members, filed their honest views about the matter.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, I heard the testimony.

Mr. McKELLAR. I decline to yield.

Mr. SCHALL. I heard the testimony. Why describe me like that?

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator heard the testimony, I did not.

Mr. SCHALL. I did not hear the testimony, but I heard the statement of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG], who said he would produce thus-and-so testimony.

Mr. McKELLAR. I decline to yield, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee has the floor.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, with that statement—that the committee has acted honestly and has brought in a report in accordance with the facts—I urge every Senator who believes in honesty and truth, and who is opposed to the exhibition of malice and hatred that has been given by the Senator from Louisiana, to vote down the resolution.

Mr. ROBINSON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Coolidge	La Follette	Pope
Ashurst	Copeland	Lewis	Radcliffe
Austin	Costigan	Logan	Robinson
Bachman	Couzens	Loranger	Russell
Bailey	Dickinson	Long	Schall
Bankhead	Dieterich	McAdoo	Schwellenbach
Barbour	Donahey	McCarran	Sheppard
Barkley	Duffy	McGill	Shipstead
Bilbo	Fletcher	McKellar	Stelwer
Black	Frazier	McNary	Thomas, Okla.
Bone	George	Maloney	Thomas, Utah
Borah	Gerry	Metcalf	Townsend
Brown	Gibson	Minton	Trammell
Bulkeley	Guffey	Moore	Truman
Bulow	Hale	Murphy	Tydings
Burke	Harrison	Murray	Vandenberg
Byrd	Hastings	Neely	Van Nuys
Capper	Hatch	Norris	Wagner
Carey	Hayden	Nye	Walsh
Clark	Johnson	O'Mahoney	Wheeler
Connally	Keyes	Pittman	White

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I rise to announce the absence of the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES], the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], and the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], who are unavoidably detained on official business.

I also desire to announce the absence of the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS], who is on an official mission to the Virgin Islands.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-four Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. McKELLAR. A parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will not the Chair state how the vote arises?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question pending before the Senate is the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] to the pending resolution, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 3, in line 13, it is proposed, after the word "investigation", to insert the words "to enable the Congress to secure such information as may be necessary for the consideration and enactment of legislation."

Mr. McKELLAR. There is no objection to that, as I understand.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will ascertain. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on the resolution as amended.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Chair state how the question arises?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the resolution, as amended, authorizing an investigation of the Postmaster General, be adopted?

Mr. McKELLAR. Those who are opposed to the investigation will vote in the negative?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Those who are in favor of the investigation of the Postmaster General will vote "yea" and those who are opposed will vote "nay."

Mr. NORRIS. A parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish the Chair would state whether or not there will be a separate vote on the preamble. The adoption of the resolution would not mean the adoption of the preamble.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the resolution shall be adopted, then there will be a separate vote on the preamble.

The question is on agreeing to the resolution, as amended. On that question the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. LOGAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS] and vote "nay."

Mr. NYE (when his name was called). Upon this question I have a pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES], who is absent. If I were permitted to vote, I should vote "yea." If the Senator from South Carolina were present, I understand he would vote "nay."

Mr. WHEELER (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]. If he were present, he would vote "nay." If I were permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. LONG (after having voted in the affirmative). I desire to change my vote from "yea" to "nay."

Mr. AUSTIN. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS] is absent on account of illness.

The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] is necessarily absent.

Mr. LEWIS. I rise to announce that the Senator from Arkansas [Mrs. CARAWAY] and the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] are absent on departmental business.

I wish to announce also that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. OVERTON] is absent on account of illness.

I desire to announce that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] is absent in attendance on an important meeting of the Committee on Banking and Currency. If present he would vote "nay" on this question.

I also announce that the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], and the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] are unavoidably detained, and that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS] is absent on an official mission to the Virgin Islands.

The result was announced—yeas 20, nays 62, as follows:

YEAS—20

Austin	Dickinson	Keyes	Schall
Barbour	Frazier	La Follette	Steinwer
Capper	Gibson	McNary	Townsend
Carey	Hale	Metcalf	Vandenberg
Couzens	Hastings	Norris	White

NAYS—62

Adams	Connally	Logan	Radcliffe
Ashurst	Coolidge	Louderman	Robinson
Bachman	Copeland	Long	Russell
Bailey	Costigan	Maloney	Schwellenbach
Bankhead	Dieterich	McAdoo	Sheppard
Barkley	Donahay	McCarran	Shipstead
Bilbo	Duffy	McGill	Thomas, Okla.
Black	Fletcher	McKellar	Thomas, Utah
Bone	George	Minton	Trammell
Borah	Gerry	Moore	Truman
Brown	Guffey	Murphy	Tydings
Bulkeley	Harrison	Murray	Van Nuys
Bulow	Hatch	Neely	Wagner
Burke	Hayden	O'Mahoney	Walsh
Byrd	Johnson	Pittman
Clark	Lewis	Pope

NOT VOTING—12

Byrnes	Glass	Norbeck	Reynolds
Caraway	Gore	Nye	Smith
Davis	King	Overtton	Wheeler

So the resolution was rejected.

Mr. ROBINSON. I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was not agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] to lay on the table the motion of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON].

Mr. LONG. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider was agreed to.

AFTER THE VOTE ON THE FARLEY RESOLUTION DECLINED INVESTIGATION

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I wish to have the RECORD show that, undertaking to give the Senate a night or two in which it could calmly study the evidence which I presented here this morning and yesterday, I made the customary change of my vote, from yea to nay, in order that I might later have the right to move for a reconsideration of the vote by which the resolution was defeated. The ordinary practice is that the person who sponsored the resolution, whether victorious or not, is usually given an opportunity to make that kind of a motion with respect to that kind of a resolution.

However, I have no quarrel that the contrary is the will of the majority, because I have availed myself of that in some other instances, and therefore cannot complain of the use against me of instruments which I have used against my adversaries on other occasions. However, I wish to say that I am sorry that the vote took on almost what appears to be a party color. All the Republicans excepting one were in favor of investigation. All the Democrats excepting two were opposed to an investigation. I will restate what I have just said, Mr. President. I am sorry that this vote showed a party line-up with only two Democrats voting in favor of investigating the Postmaster General and all the Republicans excepting one voting in favor of an investigation. I make that correction. There were two on each side. They are exceptions which prove the rule.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] is on the other side of the aisle but he also voted "nay."

Mr. LONG. I did not hear the vote. He is not on either side, is he? He is a Farmer-Laborite.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator knows as well as I do what party the Senator from Minnesota is connected with.

Mr. LONG. No; Mr. President, I do not know what party he is connected with. I was nominated for President on that party ticket and the Senator refused to recognize me as his candidate, and I did not accept the nomination last year.

Mr. President, the Democratic Party when I came to Congress was just about in the same position that it takes today, only it was a minority party. When I came to this body I was soon at odds with the leadership of the Democratic Party at that time. I was not immediately when I came here; that is, I did not know I was, but I had not been in this body for 10 days or not more than a month before I found out that the Democratic Party, as then led, was one of suicide and destruction. I would not follow the Democratic leadership, and my reasons for supporting the present occupant of the White House was that he saw fit to send me a message by word of mouth and in writing to commend me for my stand against the leadership of the Democratic Party according to my expressions that I had made for several days.

Mr. President, he is now the occupant of the White House. He is, with some exceptions—not many—going along the patterned line of the old Democratic national leadership when I first came to this body. He has enshrined himself in a Cabinet at least partly composed, if the records assembled and presented by another one of his departments can be trusted—composed of corruptive persons or practices tied in sins of politics never countenanced by this civilized country. The party, under the banner of Farley, blackened by the crime of sabotage, if the report of the Interior Department can be accepted—his control over and manipulation of those sent upon missions to relieve distress, his control, so exercised as to barter justice into injustice and the truth into an open falsehood against respectable practices in operations and conduct of government, cannot survive in a party if the party survives.

I have never conceived it to be a part of my political life to defend the corruption of an organization with which I was affiliated. I have not hesitated to oust, when within my power, from whatever political faction with which I was associated, those whose practices I found to be such as lent themselves to corruption and to spoliation and against public good. I am following the same practice in the case of Mr. Farley. He cannot remain in the Cabinet, I do not think, very long. If the regard that the Senator from Tennessee had for the President should prove to be well founded, on truth—and I am only too sorry that I cannot reciprocate that admiration for the President—I wish that I could, but my mind and heart cannot surrender and merge what is there and what came there without any blame on my part—but if the President be one-half so pure in motive or one-fourth so pure in motive as some of those who have voted against this resolution allege him to be, then the influence and shadow of Farley and the practices mentioned in these pages here by Mr. Glavis and Mr. Green and by others sent upon these missions to develop facts, must fade out. Farley must either go or the shadow of respect must remove itself from the President as well as from the balance of this administration.

I have heard it said on the floor of the Senate—I had no time to reply—that I have a private quarrel, or perhaps a public quarrel, with Farley and with Roosevelt. I have. I have a private quarrel with Roosevelt and with Farley. I have a public quarrel and a private quarrel and a political quarrel and a personal quarrel, because I do not separate the lines of politics from either my personal or professional lines. Mr. President, when I do not like a man personally I do not like him politically; when I do not like a man politically I do not like him legally. Somehow or other the Lord failed to endow me with the refining instinct of differentiation between one whose political practices I would condemn and one whose personal practices I might like.

The word "duplicity" and the word "diplomacy" come from the same Greek root. I do not know whether Senators know that or not. There is an old saying, "The Greeks had a word for it." The same Greek word is the mother word of "duplicity" and of "diplomacy." I do not know that we have to go back to the Greeks to justify that. I learned that fact when I drank water out of the branch in Winn Parish. I find no means by which one who, in a true sense, can become a diplomat whose characteristics do not become duplicitous as a result of it.

I cannot smile on the conduct of one in public which in private I condemn. I do not have to violate the rules of the Senate. I can fail to speak when, were I to speak the truth, I would infringe upon the rules prescribed for the conduct of a Senator; and I shall not speak when speech would mean talk under the rules of the Senate by which I would have to misrepresent what I conceived to be the truth and the facts about the matter.

Mr. President, Farley has apparently been exonerated; that is how the press will carry the news that the Democratic Members have exonerated one of their own; that the Democratic Party has expressed renewed faith in Farley. He will be introduced at another banquet or two, but not many. They will carry him there with a boiled shirt and a cut-away coat and a bow tie, but the odor will be there as if it were not attempted to be covered up. They may stand the smell of this patronage, but they will not be able to stand the odoriferous presence of Farley. He will swish around with that scissor-tail coat at a few more banquets given by those seeking patronage; he will receive a few more gracious lines, when suddenly some day or some night, following those diplomatic brolls which come in the lives of those intrusted with steering the Ship of State, it will be found that Mr. Farley can no longer sacrifice himself for the welfare of the people, but will retire—to what? Do you say he will retire to run the Democratic Party's next campaign? Oh, no. We have finished that much of him. No; they will not dare put Jim Farley at the head of the next Democratic campaign. You may have covered up the grave, but you have not buried the corpse very deep. If you bring him out, we will bury him next time the right way; we will bury him face down, so that every time he scratches he will go nearer home instead of coming back. [Laughter.]

IMPORTS OF AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS—RAW COTTON

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of Commerce, in further response to Senate Resolution 111 (submitted by Mr. VANDENBERG, and calling for certain information regarding imports of agricultural products, and cotton and wheat production and consumption), transmitting tables showing the exports of raw cotton by leading producing countries and imports of raw cotton by leading consuming countries for the entire period 1904 to 1934, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate letters and papers in the nature of petitions from sundry citizens of the United States, praying for the prompt enactment of the so-called "Patman bonus bill", which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. COOLIDGE presented a resolution adopted by the Thirty-seventh General Court, National Society, Daughters of Founders and Patriots of America, favoring the enactment of legislation increasing the strength of the Army, the National Guard, the Reserve Corps, and so forth, as recommended by the Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff of the Army, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WALSH presented the petition of Alston Post, No. 669, Veterans of Foreign Wars, of Alston, Mass., praying for the enactment of House bill 6193, prohibiting the importation into the United States of American flags and emblems manufactured in foreign countries, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a resolution adopted by Aerie No. 617, Fraternal Order of Eagles, of Brockton, Mass., favoring the passage of old-age-pension legislation, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petitions of the Central Labor Union and Local Union No. 57, International Association of Bridge, Structural and Ornamental Iron Workers, both of Worcester, Mass., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for a graduated tax on cigarettes, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Pittsfield, Mass., remonstrating against the enactment of pending legislation providing for the regulation of public-utility holding companies, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented petitions of Merrick Lodge, No. 563, Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen, of Springfield; White City Lodge, No. 243, of Worcester, and Granite Lodge, No. 1517, of West Springfield, both of the Brotherhood of Railway and Steamship Clerks, Freight Handlers, Express and Station Employees, all in the State of Massachusetts, praying for the enactment of legislation extending the effective date of the National Emergency Transportation Act of 1933, which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a letter in the nature of a memorial from the Boston Flower Exchange, of Boston, Mass., remonstrating against the enactment of the so-called "Wagner labor-disputes bill" and the "Black 30-hour work week bill", which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a paper in the nature of a petition from members of the New England Region, Common Brick Branch, Structural Clay Products Industry, Worcester, Mass., praying for the extension of the National Industrial Recovery Act, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. COPELAND presented a resolution adopted by Branch 213, Workmen's Sick and Death Benefit Fund, of Mamaroneck, N. Y., favoring the passage of unemployment, social-insurance, and old-age pension legislation, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a resolution adopted by New Syracuse Aerie No. 053, Fraternal Order of Eagles, of Syracuse, N. Y., favoring the enactment of legislation providing for old-age pensions, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the New York Chapter No. 3 of the American Veterans' association, Inc., of New York City, favoring an investigation of the American Legion, or other patriotic organizations, of veterans' activities in violation of their charters, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Canton and Potsdam, in the State of New York, praying for the enactment of legislation to take the profits out of war, which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of the State of New York praying the enactment of legislation providing for the issuance of a commemorative stamp in honor of Commodore John Barry, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the German-American Conference of Greater New York and John T. Hoffmann Unit, No. 25, of the Steuben Society of America, of Yonkers, in the State of New York, favoring an amendment to the Constitution providing for a referendum on the declaration of war, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the New York Board of Trade, Inc., of New York City, opposing the enactment of legislation adversely affecting railroads, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Lehigh & Hudson River Railway Veterans' Association, of Warwick, N. Y., favoring the placing of busses, trucks, waterways, pipe lines, and airplanes under regulation by the Interstate Commerce Commission, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented resolutions adopted by Acirema Council, No. 15, of Syracuse, and Manor Council, No. 112, of Woodhaven, both of the Sons and Daughters of Liberty, in the State of New York, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation tending to weaken the present alien deportation law, which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented a resolution adopted at Nyack, N. Y., by the Rockland County Peace Association urging the cancellation of the military mobilization announced for northern New York, that naval maneuvers in the North Pacific be not used as an instrument of diplomatic pressure, that the Hull doctrine of nonintervention in Latin America be extended, that legislation be passed to prevent profiteering in war, and remonstrating against a large naval building program, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a resolution adopted at Saranac Lake, N. Y., by the Presbytery of Champlain of the Presbyterian Church favoring placing Japanese immigration on a quota basis, urging the cancellation of maneuvers of the naval fleet in the Pacific Ocean, or that they be kept in waters adjacent to our own coast line, reduction of naval, land, and air armaments, and remonstrating against recognition by this Government of Manchukuo, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the National Public Housing Conference, of New York City, favoring the passage of legislation providing for low-rental housing, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Vegetable Growers Association of America, urging restoration of curtailments in studies in vegetable-crop production and in economics and other related subjects and relief of agricultural extension service workers from matters of regulation at the expense of service, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a resolution adopted at Oneonta, N. Y., by representatives of the Otsego County (N. Y.) Clearing House Association favoring the enactment of legislation covering an assessment of one-sixteenth of 1 percent on bank deposits to cover Federal deposit insurance, and remonstrating against proposed changes in the Federal Reserve System, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Dairymen's League Cooperative Association, Inc., of Auburn, N. Y., urging the enactment of legislation to provide for a managed currency and the restoration of the price level, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the board of supervisors of Columbia County, N. Y., favoring the enactment of legislation placing all agricultural commodities under the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the board of directors of the Sheffield Producers Cooperative Association, Inc., in the States of New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Vermont, remonstrating against the passage of said legislation placing all agricultural commodities under the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented resolutions adopted by Fairfield Grange, No. 569, of Herkimer County, subdistrict no. 12-B of the Dairymen's League Cooperative Association, Inc., of Auburn, and Kayahoorra Local, Dairymen's League Cooperative Association, Inc., of Herkimer County, all in the State of New York, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation placing the regulation of motor-vehicle transportation on the highways under the Interstate Commerce Commission, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Industry and Business Committee for National Recovery Administration Extension, of New York City, favoring the enactment of legislation extending the N. R. A. for 2 years, which was ordered to lie on the table.

CORDAGE ALLOWANCES

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, certain of my constituents are displeased with the action of the Senate in the allocation of the cordage allowance. I ask that the letter which I present, together with the brief or statement attached, may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs.

There being no objection, the letter and the accompanying paper were referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JOHNSON-PICKETT ROPE CO.,
Baltimore, May 13, 1935.

Senator ROYAL COPELAND,

Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR COPELAND: When Mr. Bailey and I left with you a memorandum in the anteroom of the Senate Chamber last Thursday, I am afraid we were entirely too scant in our explanation of just what it was and why we would like to have it inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The memorandum is, as its contents disclose, the minutes of a meeting called by the Acting Governor General of the Philippine Islands of the cordage manufacturers of the islands, to get their views on the proper allowance of cordage which should be allowed entry into the United States from the islands, duty free, and the proper method of allocating the allowance among the various manufacturers.

There has been a good deal of discussion in the committees of Congress as to just what the manufacturers of cordage in the Philippines want, and we submit that their recorded ideas, as set forth in the minutes of this meeting, are the best evidence of what they want.

The vote of a majority of the manufacturers sustains the position of the Johnson-Pickett Co., who are the principals for your constituents in New York, the United Fiber Co., represented by Mr. Bailey.

The Senate bill relating to this subject has passed the Senate and is on the Consent Calendar before the House, and will probably be reached next Monday. If you could have the memorandum of the minutes which we submitted to you inserted in the RECORD before that date it would be highly desirable and could be referred to by the House members of the Insular Affairs Committee, who expect to say a few words in behalf of an allocation of the cordage allowance in proportion to spindle capacity, or in other words, in proportion to the production capacity of the various mills.

I am taking the liberty of sending you herewith another copy of the minutes of the meeting in the event the original left with you the other day may have been misplaced.

Thanking you again for your many courtesies to our representatives and friends who have been to see you about this matter, we are,

Very truly yours,

THE JOHNSON-PICKETT ROPE CO.,
By HUBERT L. GWYNNE, Attorney.

SPECIAL CORDAGE COMMITTEE—AIDE MEMOIRE

Meeting of special cordage committee called by Governor General Hayden at Malacanan, Manila, March 22, 1935, 11 a. m.:

1. At the request of Governor General Hayden, at 9 a. m. the undersigned telephoned the Honorable Eulogio Rodriguez, secretary of agriculture and commerce, informing him of the Governor General's desire that he, together with the Honorable Jose Yulo, secretary of justice, Mr. Garchitorena, and representatives of the cordage industry should meet at 11:30 a. m. for the purpose of drafting a reply in protest to United States Senate bill 2209, as reported in radiogram received, no. 131, Cox to Hayden, dispatched from Washington, March 21, received at Manila March 22, 1935, reading as follows:

"HAYDEN, Manila.

"For the Acting Governor General: The bureau has been advised that Senate bill 2209, entitled 'A bill to protect American labor and to preserve an essential American industry' has been referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs and a hearing will be held thereon March 25. This bill provides:

"That, effective January 1, 1935, the total amount of all yarns, twines, cords, cordage, rope, and cable, tarred or untarred, wholly or in part of manila (abaca) or other hard fiber, which may be shipped into the United States from the Philippines, shall not exceed 5,000,000 pounds in any calendar year. Except as provided herein, nothing in this act shall be construed to modify or repeal the provisions of any existing law.

"Sec. 2. The Secretary of the Treasury shall promulgate such rules and regulations as may be necessary to enforce the provisions hereof, and this act shall be enforced as part of the customs law."

"It is requested that the view of the Philippine government on this bill be transmitted by radio in order that they may be available for the hearing on March 25.

"Cox."

2. Secretary Rodriguez called the committee to session in the cabinet room, Malacanang, at 12 noon, and invited the undersigned to act as secretary of the committee.

3. Present were: Hon. Eulogio Rodriguez, secretary of agriculture and commerce; Hon. Jose Yulo, secretary of justice; Mr. E. D. Hester, economic adviser to the Governor General; Mr. Cornelio Balmaceda, director of commerce; Mr. Mariano Garchitorena, manager fiber inspection service; Mr. V. C. Bartolome, of the fiber inspection service; Mr. John T. Pickett, of the Johnson-Pickett Rope Co.; Mr. Juan Elizalde, of Elizalde & Co.; Mr. H. P. Strickler, of the Manila Cordage Co.; Mr. Alfonso Sy Cip, of the General Manufacturing Co.; Mr. Perfecto Feliciano and Mr. Juan Feliciano, of Juan Feliciano & Sisters.

4. Radiogram received, no. 131, as quoted in paragraph 1 above, was read by all members.

5. Secretary Yulo announced the legal opinion that the bill was not technically an infringement of the Tydings-McDuffie Act, that it could run parallel with the Tydings-McDuffie Act, and that it would work to modify the status quo of cordage exports to the United States under the Tydings-McDuffie Act so that instead of the Philippines being allowed to export to the United States 3,000,000 of cordage duty free plus an unlimited quantity dutiable, the Philippines with the enactment of United States Senate bill 2009 would be allowed to ship 3,000,000 pounds of cordage duty free and only 2,000,000 pounds dutiable.

6. Mr. Cornelio Balmaceda, Director of Commerce, presented statistical data in reference to the Philippine cordage industry and trade.

7. After considerable discussion and at the suggestion of the chairman that motions for action be entertained, Mr. John T. Pickett, of the Johnson-Pickett Rope Co., presented the following motion:

"That until effectivity of the Tydings-McDuffie restriction, Philippine exports of all manufacturers of hard fiber to the United States and its possessions be limited to 9,000,000 pounds annually, all free entry, to be allocated according to the spindle capacity of each and every cordage mill in the Philippine Islands as per bureau of public works records of 1934 filed with the city engineer of Manila and with similar authorities in the provinces."

In discussion, Messrs. Juan Elizalde, of Elizalde and Co., and H. P. Strickler, of the Manila Cordage Co., presented strong arguments to the effect that it was useless to ask the American cordage interests to specifically approve 9,000,000 pounds for the current year and furthermore, that if allocation should be undertaken prior to the effectivity of the Tydings-McDuffie Act, such allocation should be made on the same basis as that provided for in the Tydings-McDuffie Act.

The chairman recognized a division of subject matter in Mr. Pickett's motion: (a) Limitation of quantity to 9,000,000 pounds; (b) allocation according to spindle capacity.

The chairman polled the representatives of the cordage industry in respect to limitation to 9,000,000 for the current year with the following results:

Mr. John T. Pickett, of the Johnson-Pickett Rope Co.....	Yes
Mr. Alfonso Sy Cip, of the General Manufacturing Co.....	Yes
Messrs. Perfecto Feliciano and Juan Feliciano, of Juan Feliciano & Sisters.....	Yes
Mr. Juan Elizalde, of Elizalde & Co.....	No
Mr. H. P. Strickler, of the Manila Cordage Co.....	No

The chairman announced that the majority opinion of the cordage industry was in favor of limitation of the current year or from date until effectivity of the Tydings-McDuffie Act to 9,000,000 pounds.

The chairman polled the representatives of the cordage industry on the point of allocation according to spindle capacity with the following results:

Mr. John T. Pickett, of the Johnson-Pickett Rope Co.....	Yes
Mr. Alfonso Sy Cip, of the General Manufacturing Co.....	Yes
Messrs. Perfecto Feliciano and Juan Feliciano, of Juan Feliciano & Sisters.....	Yes
Mr. Juan Elizalde, of Elizalde & Co.....	No
Mr. H. P. Strickler, of the Manila Cordage Co.....	No

The chairman announced that the majority of the industry approved allocation according to spindle capacity.

8. After further discussion, the chairman recognized the minority opinion of Mr. Elizalde, of Elizalde & Co., and Mr. H. P. Strickler, of the Manila Cordage Co., as in favor of moving forward the date of effectivity of the cordage provisions of the Tydings-McDuffie Act of April 1, 1935, it being understood that this action would include both the quantity limitation and method of allocation of the cordage provisions of the Tydings-McDuffie Act.

9. Secretary Yulo suggested that with the limitation to 9,000,000 pounds allocation for the current year would probably be unnecessary. To this Mr. John T. Pickett replied that inasmuch as allocation for 10 years would very likely be based on the export records of 1935, allocation according to the spindle capacity should be adopted in order to assure the small factories of the Philippines an opportunity to export cordage to the United States during the life of the Tydings-McDuffie Act.

10. Mr. E. D. Hester advised that in his opinion the protest should center not upon the presentation of a substitute for United States Senate bill 2209 but upon the grounds first, that the bill was a further incursion of the treaty-similar character of the economic provisions of the Tydings-McDuffie Act, and second, that it discriminated against the Philippine Islands in favor of foreign countries inasmuch as the quantity of dutiable cordage exported from the Philippines to the United States would be limited to 2,000,000, whereas the quantity of cordage exported to the United States from foreign countries would not be subject to any limitation whatsoever.

11. The chairman summarized the situation in respect to Philippine cordage and the work of the committee, thanking the gentlemen for their attendance and for the frankness with which they had considered the problem.

12. The chairman adjourned the committee at 12:40 p. m., sine die.

E. D. HESTER,

Secretary, Economic Adviser.

THE PROFITS OF WAR

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I present and ask to have printed in full in the RECORD and appropriately referred resolutions adopted by the General Court of Massachusetts, commending the President of the United States for his courage in urging Congress to take the profits out of war, and requesting that the President and Congress eliminate the profits from the manufacture of munitions by way of preparedness for war.

The resolutions were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolutions commending the President of the United States for his courage in urging Congress to take the profits out of war, and requesting that the President and Congress take the profits out of the manufacture of munitions by way of preparedness for war

Whereas the President of the United States has courageously recommended legislation looking to the taking of private profits out of war; and

Whereas private profits in war munitions may be an incentive to warfare and prevent the continuance of peace on earth and good will to men: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the General Court of Massachusetts hereby commends the President of the United States for his courage and leadership above mentioned, and earnestly and respectfully requests the President and Congress to further the cause of removing private profits from war and from the manufacture of munitions by way of preparedness for war; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be transmitted forthwith by the secretary of the Commonwealth to the President of the United States, to the presiding officers of both branches of Congress, and to the Representatives in Congress from this Commonwealth.

STATUE OF GEN. ROBERT E. LEE IN ARLINGTON CEMETERY

Mr. WALSH presented a letter from Miss Susan G. Macomber, chairman of the legislative committee of the Woman's Relief Corps, auxiliary to the Grand Army of the Republic, Boston, Mass., with an accompanying paper embodying a resolution, which were referred to the Committee on the Library and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WOMAN'S RELIEF CORPS.

Allston, Mass., May 8, 1935.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,

Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Through the fifty-sixth annual convention of the Department of Massachusetts Woman's Relief Corps, auxiliary to the Grand Army of the Republic, I have been instructed to send you the following resolution adopted by the convention on April 10 and to request that it be spread upon the pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

"The Department of Massachusetts Woman's Relief Corps, numbering over 8,000 loyal women, unanimously adopted this resolution, and respectfully beg that you do not vote favorably upon this bill, if and when it comes before the Senate for enactment.

"We believe it unseemly that a statue of any man, or men, who fought with rebel forces with the object of overthrowing this Government, should be recognized in this manner, regardless whether it is Robert E. Lee, or any other traitor, and particularly as the place—Arlington National Cemetery—where it is proposed to erect this statue of Robert E. Lee on a prancing horse, is hallowed by the remains of the gallant men whose eyes are forever closed in eternal sleep, who wore the loyal blue of the Union Army on 1861-65.

"Through the daily press the public has recently been informed of the fact that the deserter and traitor Grover Cleveland Bergdoll expects to again enjoy the benefits of this country and its freedom. The man for whom this bill (H. J. Res. 232) asks that a statue be erected, ranks the same as Grover Cleveland Bergdoll in the eyes of all clear-minded patriotic people who have not fallen under the spell of southern influence. Would the World War men want to think that 50 years hence a statue would be raised to the deserter Bergdoll? I doubt it much. No more do we to the deserter Lee, and if it is done, the standard of patriotism will be lowered to the ground."

This bill (H. J. Res. 232) sponsored by Representative HAMILTON FISH, Jr., is now in the Committee on the Library and will no doubt shortly be brought before the Senate. We beg that you do not vote favorably upon it.

Very truly yours,

(Miss) SUSAN G. MACOMBER,
Chairman Legislative Committee.

WOMAN'S RELIEF CORPS,
Boston, Mass., April 10, 1935.

GENTLEMEN: The Department of Massachusetts Woman's Relief Corps, auxiliary to the Grand Army of the Republic, at this the fifty-sixth annual convention, held at Hotel Statler, Boston, Mass., April 10, 1935, unanimously passed the following resolution, copies of which have been sent to Representative HAMILTON FISH, Jr., of New York, who entered House Joint Resolution 232, to which this refers, and to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this State.

"Whereas Representative FISH has introduced into Congress House Joint Resolution 232, authorizing the erection of an equestrian statue of Robert E. Lee, in Arlington National Cemetery; and

"Whereas Representative FISH has called for an expression of public opinion on this joint resolution; and

"Whereas Robert E. Lee fought for 4 years to destroy this Nation; and

"Whereas communism and inimical forces are today seeking the same ends that Robert E. Lee did, namely, our national destruction; and

"Whereas it would be against the public good to recognize thus the principle of national destruction as exemplified in the conduct of Lee and would encourage communism (whom Representative FISH professes to abhor and oppose) to emulate Lee; and would be unseemly for our Government to honor one whom the Great Emancipator named as a traitor: Therefore, we, the Woman's Relief Corps of the Department of Massachusetts.

"Resolve, That we are opposed to the erection of this statue to Lee in Arlington Cemetery; and we direct that copies of this resolution be sent to the Committee on the Library to whom the joint resolution was referred, and also to Representative FISH, and to our Senators and Representatives in Congress, directing that this resolution be spread upon the pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD."

Therefore, gentlemen, we ask that you do not vote favorably House Joint Resolution 232.

(Miss) SUSAN GLOVER MACOMBER,
Chairman Legislative Committee.
BELLE MORTON,
President 1934-35.

OLD-AGE PENSIONS—FRATERNAL ORDER OF EAGLES

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I have before me a resolution adopted by the Syracuse Aerie of the Fraternal Order of Eagles relating to old-age pensions in the United States and Canada. This organization is one of the best known and most benevolent of the fraternal organizations of the country. The organization is really the pioneer in the movement to provide old-age pensions. Its activities and sponsorship of this movement has been responsible for the enactment in many States of old-age-pension laws, for which I take this occasion to commend the organization most heartily.

I ask unanimous consent that the resolution may be printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas in August 1921 a thousand delegates to the Grand Aerie of the Fraternal Order of Eagles, representing 500,000 men, by unanimous vote committed our fraternity to the sponsorship of old-age pensions in the United States and Canada; and

Whereas at that time not a county, not a State in the United States, and not a Province in Canada was paying pensions; and

Whereas the Eagles have spent during the succeeding 14 years more than $500,000 in an educational campaign involving nationwide distribution of magazine articles, newspaper publicity, and pamphlets prepared by the publicity department of the order; and

Whereas Eagles have spoken in behalf of the pension plan, used motion pictures to arouse interest, and, in some States, conducted and financed surveys to show to legislatures the need of pensions; and

Whereas the first successful old-age-pension bill passed in the United States was prepared by a national officer of our order, introduced by him in the Montana Legislature, of which he was a member, passed through the efforts of Eagles, and signed by Gov. Joseph M. Dixon, who was an Eagle; and

Whereas almost without exception every subsequent old-age-pension bill that has become law was prepared by Eagles, introduced in State legislatures by members of our order, aided by the Federation of Labor and other interested organizations and altruistic individuals; and

Whereas more than a score of Governors who have signed old-age-pension bills have highly commended the Fraternal Order of Eagles, among the Governors being President Roosevelt, who stated publicly soon after signing the New York State bill: "Most of the credit for showing the need of old-age-pension legislation is due—and will be given—to the Fraternal Order of Eagles"; and

Whereas the President of the United States recognized our fraternity—and ours only—in appointing Past Grand Worthy President George Nordlin to the Advisory Council on Economic Security; and

Whereas ours was the only fraternity to be honored by a Presidential invitation to the conference on economic security when Past Grand Worthy Conductor Lester Loble, as "the author of the first old-age-pension law in this country", was asked to be one of the four discussion leaders at a round table on old-age pensions: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That Syracuse Aerie, No. 053, of the Fraternal Order of Eagles, proud of our order's work for old-age pensions, earnestly urges our Senators and Congressmen to support that part of the social-security bill (S. 1130 and H. R. 4142) which provides for Federal monetary assistance to the States paying old-age pensions. Such action on the part of our national legislators will earn the lasting gratitude of the members of this aerie.

THE AMERICAN MERCHANT MARINE—AMENDMENTS

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I submit four amendments intended to be proposed by me to the bill (S. 2582) to develop a strong American merchant marine, to promote the commerce of the United States, to aid national defense, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendments will be received, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and printed.

Mr. BLACK. I desire to state that the amendments provide a limitation on profits for shipbuilders accepting a subsidy, and also a minimum wage for the personnel on the ships, and provide for certain duties to be performed by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

FUNERAL EXPENSES OF THE LATE SENATOR CUTTING

Mr. HATCH submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 137), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate hereby is authorized and directed to pay from the contingent fund of the Senate the actual and necessary expenses incurred by the committee appointed by the Vice President in arranging for and attending the funeral of Hon. Bronson Cutting, late a Senator from the State of New Mexico, upon vouchers to be approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

MERCHANT-MARINE POLICY AND SHIPPING SUBSIDIES (S. DOC. NO. 60)

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, in a few days there will be before the Senate a shipping bill. The Department of Commerce, at the request of the Commerce Committee of the Senate, has prepared, through Mr. J. E. Saugstad, a description of the merchant-marine policy and shipping and shipbuilding subsidies. I ask unanimous consent that the paper may be printed as a Senate document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3808) concerning the incorporated town of Seward, Territory of Alaska.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

The message also announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the following enrolled bills, and they were signed by the President pro tempore:

H. R. 3808. An act concerning the incorporated town of Seward, Territory of Alaska; and

H. R. 6718. An act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture and for the Farm Credit Administration for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and for other purposes.

FARM CREDIT ACT OF 1935

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1384) to amend the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act of 1933, to amend the Federal Farm Loan Act, to amend the Agricultural Marketing Act, and to amend the Farm Credit Act of 1933, and for other purposes.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House, request a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. FLETCHER, Mr. WAGNER, Mr. BARKLEY, Mr. BYRNES, Mr. CAREY, and Mr. COUZENS conferees on the part of the Senate.

DEATHS OF FORMER SENATOR COHEN AND PLEASANT A. STOVALL

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, there passed away last night in the city of Atlanta, Ga., John S. Cohen, formerly a Member of the Senate.

Senator Cohen, or Major Cohen, as he has been known since the days of the Spanish-American War, was a well-known figure in the South—indeed, in the country. He was a great publisher, essentially a journalist in his likes and in his tastes, and for a long time was prominently identified with journalism and the politics of the Southeast, especially in his native State of Georgia.

As vice chairman of the Democratic National Executive Committee he displayed the rare judgment which characterized him in all his activities in life.

He was one of the early friends of the President of the United States, and he gave to the President of the United States unfailing and unfaltering support and loyalty.

I had the great pleasure of serving in this body during the short period of his service here, and our relations were always the most intimate and the most cordial. Indeed, I learned to know him, both in and out of public life, as a man of fine judgment, of superior loyalty, a friend of everything worth while in the life of his State, the life of his section, the life of his country.

I wish simply to pay this brief tribute to the memory of this sturdy, intelligent, loyal, progressive, patriotic citizen of my State, not only a devoted friend of his party but an unfaltering and devoted friend of the head of his party, the present President of the United States.

Mr. President, there also passed away last night in the city of Savannah, Ga., another distinguished citizen of Georgia. He likewise was a journalist and publicist, and through a long life had been identified with journalism in Georgia and the Southeast. I refer to Hon. Pleasant A. Stovall, Minister to Switzerland under the administration of President Woodrow Wilson, a gentleman of kindly characteristics, of gentle character, high culture, a real leader of everything worthy in the affairs of his city and of the State, and a great citizen of the United States.

The State has sustained a great loss in the passing of Mr. Stovall and in the passing of Major Cohen, formerly a Member of the Senate of the United States.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, the State of Georgia, which I have the honor to represent in part in this body, on yesterday suffered the loss of two of her most distinguished sons.

Hon. John S. Cohen, a former Member of this body, and Hon. Pleasant A. Stovall, a former Minister to Switzerland, both passed to their reward.

Former Senator Cohen was personally known to most of the Members of this body. For many years he was an outstanding figure in the life of his people. He was an able and fearless journalist and for almost 20 years directed the policies of one of the outstanding daily papers of the Southeast as its editor. Whether serving in a public capacity or as a private citizen, his entire career was marked by unselfish and patriotic devotion to the public welfare. Few men have been privileged to make such a definite imprint upon the course of events of the times in which he moved. He neither craved nor sought to hold public office but did not shirk the call of duty to assume the responsibilities of great public trust under the most trying circumstances. As the editor of the Atlanta Journal and in positions of leadership, both public and private, the people of Georgia had confidence in him and in his integrity. His wise advice and counsel was sought and welcomed in the highest councils of the Nation. As one who was privileged to know him intimately and to enjoy the blessing of his personal friendship, I feel a deep personal loss in his passing. Thousands of personal friends in every walk of life who loved him for his many sterling qualities will mourn him long.

Mr. Stovall was also a distinguished journalist and for many years published another great daily paper in my State. He served as United States Minister to Switzerland prior to our entry into the World War. As a representative of this great Republic during our period of neutrality he handled with signal distinction many perplexing problems of an international nature, both on behalf of his own country and other neutrals and in many affairs affecting the belligerent powers. His sweet character attracted all who knew him and his life was spent in the service of others.

The State of Georgia and the Nation can ill afford to lose men of the stature of these men in these trying times.

ADDRESS BY SECRETARY MORGENTHAU ON THE PROBLEM OF STABILIZATION

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, on Monday evening last, Hon. Henry Morgenthau, Jr., Secretary of the Treasury, delivered over the radio a very timely and interesting address on the monetary policy of the Government and the problem of stabilization. During the course of his address, among other things, he said:

As the nations went off gold, the value of their currencies in international exchange dropped sharply and our customers found it difficult to get dollars with which to pay for American products. They could trade with each other to some extent, but they bought from us what they could not do without. The physical volume of world export trade dropped about one-fourth from 1929 to 1932, but our exports dropped almost one-half in the same period.

During 1932 England increased her share of the world trade by 16 percent over the previous year, and Japan, by 29 percent. To say that we merely shared in world-wide misfortune is not entirely accurate, because our share included an additional penalty for remaining on the old gold standard.

While total world export trade declined, those countries which promptly went off gold increased their share of what remained.

Some of the countries became alarmed because they could see the bottoms of their gold bins. They and others exerted pressure to have foreign credits called home. Sometimes these credits responded by going in the other direction just as fast as they could travel. Gold was stampeding from country to country, always leaving the place where it was needed and rarely doing its new hosts any good.

Further on he said:

You have heard the argument that we should stabilize by declaring that we will not change the present gold content of the dollar. Some even go so far as to say that the other nations would certainly follow, if we took the lead. If we launched out alone on such a course, it would put us right back where we were in 1932, and offer a tempting invitation for the others not to follow, but again to take advantage of our disadvantage.

Mr. President, without quoting further from the able address of the Secretary of the Treasury, I ask unanimous consent that in its entirety it be printed in the RECORD at this point, and that the accompanying table headed "Sales Data", be printed following the address.

There being no objection the address and the accompanying table were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times of May 14, 1935]

TEXT OF MORGENTHAU'S ADDRESS ON THE PROBLEM OF STABILIZATION THE AMERICAN DOLLAR

It is my purpose tonight to state a few simple facts which, I hope, will contribute to a clearer understanding of the monetary policy of the United States. I shall not enter into complicated discussion of the theory of money. I shall merely tell you what was done * * * why * * * and the effect.

In order to examine the record in logical sequence, it is necessary to review briefly the background of our present problems. Foreign trade has, from the beginning, been an important factor in the business of the American people. During the 18 years immediately preceding the outbreak of the World War we exported $31,000,000,000 worth of merchandise, almost all of which was paid for with goods and services that we received.

The net gold movement to us was relatively small, amounting to $174,000,000. Foreigners invested in the United States, during those 18 years, $2,000,000,000. Americans invested abroad $1,000,000,000. At the outbreak of the World War the American people owed the world $3,000,000,000 more than foreigners owed us. That was what the ledger showed on July 1, 1914.

With the beginning of the World War a tremendous change took place. From July of 1914 to the end of 1922 we exported $47,000,000,000 worth of merchandise. Much of this was paid for with goods, services, and gold, but there remained due us a balance of $19,000,000,000, for which we took mostly promises to pay.

OUR INVESTMENTS ABROAD TWO-THIRDS IN DEFAULT

Now note the contrast. In the previous 18-year period, with our country one of the world's attractive fields for capital investment, we drew in about $1,000,000,000 net from abroad, but when we became a creditor nation the net outflow of capital reached $19,000,000,000 in the 8 years between the beginning of the World War and the end of 1922.

Nor did we stop there. We continued to export more than we imported, thus accumulating an additional two and a half billions of dollars of net foreign investment by the end of 1929.

If we deduct from the grand total of our loans and investments abroad all of the loans and credits that foreigners have here and then examine the status of our net foreign investment we find that an amount equal to two-thirds of it is today in partial or complete default.

There you have the background, from an American point of view, when in 1931 things headed toward a crisis all over the world. Credit and currency difficulties which had been spreading throughout Europe came to a head in the spring of that year. On September 21, 1931, Great Britain suspended gold payments. Norway, Sweden, and Denmark followed within a week. Japan acted in December. Other nations either went off gold or took equivalent action to control their foreign exchange.

As the nations went off gold the value of their currencies in international exchange dropped sharply, and our customers found it difficult to get dollars with which to pay for American products. They could trade with each other to some extent, but they bought from us only what they could not do without. The physical volume of world export trade dropped about one-fourth from 1929 to 1932, but our exports dropped almost one-half in the same period.

RETENTION OF GOLD BASIS HELD "ECONOMIC SUICIDE"

During 1932 England increased her share of the world trade by 16 percent over the previous year, and Japan by 29 percent. To say that we merely shared in world-wide misfortune is not entirely accurate, because our share included an additional penalty for remaining on the old gold standard.

While total world export trade declined, those countries which promptly went off gold increased their share of what remained.

Some of the countries became alarmed because they could see the bottoms of their gold bins. They and others exerted pressure to have foreign credits called home. Sometimes these credits responded by going in the other direction just as fast as they could travel. Gold was stampeding from country to country, always leaving the place where it was needed, and rarely doing its new hosts any good.

In January of 1932 gold began to leave the United States in alarming amounts. This was fair notice to all concerned that our turn was next. The panic was knocking at our door, but nothing effective was done to avert it. Europeans knew that we could not maintain our currency at the old gold level without a further ruinous deflation of our prices, trade, and industrial activity.

Facing that crisis, the previous administration stubbornly refused to take action, evidently under the impression that that was a proud achievement, when it was obviously economic suicide.

Foreigners had left here more than a billion dollars to enjoy our high interest rates and prospects of quick profits. Seeing what was happening, they judged that it was high time to take this money home. They did so, and the panic was on. We could not offer them their defaulted paper when they called for their money. We could not even offer them their paper that was not in default.

We had let them have the money on long-term loans, and they had short-term loans here. Our long-term paper was not due, while their short-term loans could be collected and their stocks sold. They could demand gold for every dollar due, and that is what they did. Thus it happened that in the first 6 months of 1932 we witnessed the incredible spectacle of gold going out of the world's greatest creditor nation on every ship—nearly all of it to nations that were in our debt. Still nothing effective was done to avert the disaster.

Stupendous as the gold movement was, we could not ship fast enough to meet the demand, and speculators took advantage of the situation to sell the dollar. They were not all foreigners, either. However, the citizenship of these snipers is not important, since their dominant trait is an utter lack of patriotism or loyalty to any nation. They would sell civilization itself short if they could, and, for all they knew at that time, they might have been doing so.

GOLD LOSS WAS A FACTOR IN BANK PANIC OF 1933

Our loss of gold, added to the calamity of declining trade, falling commodity prices, and widespread unemployment, caused bewilderment and then panic. The disaster swept over our country with the fury of a hurricane. Within a few months our financial structure was in a state of collapse. In the month of February 1933 and up to the time President Roosevelt took office about half a billion dollars in gold and nearly $2,000,000,000 in currency were withdrawn from our banks.

They were closing, not individually, but by whole States at a time. That was the situation when this administration came into office. On taking his oath, Mr. Roosevelt assumed both the duties of President and receiver for a concern—the richest on earth, but on that tragic day face to face with insolvency.

We were headed for disaster unless the run on the banks could be stopped and our gold reserves reassembled. Both objectives were promptly achieved. The President's proclamation closed the banks, ending the run, and the gold was ordered into the custody of Uncle Sam under penalties. Those two acts met the domestic emergency. An embargo on gold exports was declared, and that ended the outward flow. This effectively took us off the old gold standard and the dollar began to adjust itself to the realities of the world situation.

In going off gold we were not the first; we were the thirty-first. The operation was completed in January of 1934, when the dollar was revalued and set at 59.06 percent of its former gold content. Since that time we have enjoyed the soundest currency in the world. It is, in fact, so sound that we find gold flowing back into this country to take refuge in our dollar; not to pay balances but to find safety. Some of the same sharpshooters who personally conducted the flight of gold from this country during 1932 and the first 2 months of 1933 are now bringing it back.

FOREIGN-TRADE INCREASE TRACED TO NEW DOLLAR

But let us return to the record and see what our new dollar did for our foreign trade. I shall take all three of the commonly used yardsticks and apply them:

First. Measured in physical volume, the United States increased its export trade during 1934 as compared with both 1932 and 1933.

Second. Measured in dollar value, the United States increased its foreign trade in 1934 as compared with 1932 and 1933.

And, finally, measured by percentage share in the physical volume of total world trade, we again show an increase over both 1932 and 1933.

This is the more remarkable because the volume of our agricultural exports was declining.

In 1934 we shipped one-third less cotton than in 1932, but we got 7 percent more money for it.

We also got a higher price for our wheat, but the drought can account for most of the increase.

Our wheat exports have also been affected by quotas and embargoes. Some of our former customers prefer, for reasons of national policy, to grow their own wheat, regardless of price.

Because of these unusual factors, I cannot trace with accuracy and fairness the full effect of our monetary policy upon agricultural exports.

A better test is offered by manufactured goods.

The physical volume of all our finished manufactures exported in 1934 increased 37 percent compared with 1932; semimanufactures increased 47 percent in the same period.

To be concrete, let us take a specific article, such as the automobile. In 1930 we exported 238,000 cars. In 1932, with our country one of the very few remaining on the old gold standard, we exported 65,000 cars. In 1933, under the Roosevelt monetary program, our exports shot up to 107,000 cars. Last year they more than doubled; they came right back to where they had been in 1930.

During the disastrous period of declining sales, the world still wanted American automobiles, but it could not get the dollars to pay for them. Nothing startling developed in the way of foreign competition; our dollar prices had not gone up; and quality remained just as good, or improved.

We simply had an interim during which we could not sell because the dollar was too high in relation to other world currencies;

this administration lowered the gold content of the dollar and the foreign market is being restored to our automobile manufacturers with such rapidity that the benefits are already Nation-wide.

AUTO EXPORTS ARE CITED AS EVIDENCE OF BENEFIT

Some people have been telling you that there simply could not be any benefit in restoring trade by bringing our money into reasonable relation with the other moneys of the world. I decided to get the answer to that question from the manufacturers themselves. They ought to know best. I asked the executive heads of 29 large representative firms whose products are a cross-section of our industry to tell me:

First, whether they are getting any more foreign trade.

Second, whether employment in their plants has increased.

Then I examined their published reports to find out whether they were making any profits. Here are the combined answers.

To the first question . . . whether they are getting any more foreign trade . . . they answer, "Yes." In 1934, which was the first full year under the Roosevelt monetary program, their export sales were 59 percent greater than in 1932.

To the second question . . . whether the number of their employees has increased . . . they also answer, "Yes." Two hundred and four thousand more men and women were working in their plants during 1934 than in 1932, an increase of 34 percent.

To the third question . . . whether they are making any money . . . the answer is again, "Yes." Their combined loss in 1932 was $121,000,000; their combined profits for 1934 were in excess of $128,000,000. These figures include their losses and earnings on domestic sales also. Domestic sales followed substantially the same course as their foreign sales. When foreign sales hit rock bottom so did domestic sales; and when foreign sales recovered under the Roosevelt monetary program, domestic sales recovered with them. So there you have the testimony of the best qualified witnesses.

Under the monetary policy of this administration, they lifted themselves out of a deficit in excess of $100,000,000 to earnings in excess of $100,000,000; and employment increased by more than 200,000.

CONTINUATION OF RISE IN TRADE IS INDICATED

There are many indications that world trade will continue to increase. Our monetary policy in relation to foreign trade is not intended to capture business, but merely to protect our normal share. So far from engaging in a competitive devaluation race with the other nations, we hold out to them a currency of such steadiness that the normal tendency may very well be for the rest of the world to move gradually toward practical exchange stabilization. If that can be achieved, the final step should come easily and almost of its own accord. Unless somebody rocks the boat that would be the natural course.

In estimating the future of our foreign trade in relation to our monetary policy, we may as well face the question whether we wish to sell abroad vast quantities of goods that the buyers cannot pay for unless we lend them the money. Of course, if we want more paper there are plenty of international bankers to arrange the details. We felt rich on such paper during the roaring twenties. Now we know better.

In place of paper, under the operation of our new monetary policy, we have been receiving large shipments of gold and silver. Some of it came to settle trade balances and some represents capital seeking refuge in our sound currency. Various economists will tell you that this policy is likely to end our foreign trade; that first we strip the world of gold and then our foreign trade dies. But we are not stripping the world of gold.

We have more gold than ever before, but the world supply of monetary gold is also increasing rapidly. Production now proceeds at the rate of about $1,000,000,000 annually, and will continue to increase. The great nations are restoring their reserves. Meanwhile, percentages of the totals held by the various nations show no alarming changes.

UNITED STATES HAS 38.8 PERCENT OF ALL MONETARY GOLD

We had 41.7 percent of all the monetary gold in 1922, and now we have 38.8 percent. France had 8.4 percent in 1922 and now she has 24.8. Great Britain lost gold heavily before she suspended gold payments in 1931, but since then has increased her share from 5.2 percent to 7.2 percent.

With increasing gold production, and hundreds of millions of dollars worth of the yellow metal being brought out of hiding, surely some of it can be used to pay balances. We are also endeavoring to restore silver to greater usefulness as a monetary metal. It is the money of a large part of the world's population.

Objection to our course is sometimes based upon the assertion that we would bring vast quantities of the world's gold and silver here, only to be locked up in the United States Treasury . . . the phrase commonly used is that the gold and silver thus become sterile. At least, however, it goes to swell our monetary reserves.

Loans in default are not very good backing for currency; indeed, they might, without undue asperity, be described as also sterile. If we must choose between the two, this administration elects payments of international balances in monetary metals.

You have heard the argument that we should stabilize by declaring that we will not change the present gold content of the dollar. Some even go so far as to say that other nations would certainly follow, if we took the lead. If we launched out alone on such a course, it would put us right back where we were in 1932, and offer a tempting invitation for the others not to follow but again to take advantage of our disadvantage.

We realize the importance of world prosperity, and will evade no opportunity to assist in that direction * * * except the ever-present opportunity to donate prosperity at our own expense.

In conclusion, I should like to summarize this statement by saying:

First. You have an absolutely sound dollar.

Second. The monetary policy of this administration rescued us from chaos; held the fort through the most trying period of our recovery program, and is now the spearhead as we advance steadily toward our goal.

Third. Of the great trading nations that revalued their currencies, we were the last, until quite recently, when Belgium joined us.

The world should know that when it is ready to seek foreign exchange stabilization, Washington will not be an obstacle. Our position was that of an innocent bystander who suffered untold loss in a fight that he did not start, and from which he could not escape. Why should we be singled out and admonished that the moral duty to restore order is primarily ours? Before we make any commitments we must be sure that we will not lose what we have just regained.

We are not unwilling to stabilize. However, if the great trading nations elect to continue under the present absence of rules we are no longer at a disadvantage. We revalued our currency no more than was necessary and we can go either way. Our hands are untied.

POLICY OF CONGRESS RELATIVE TO MONETARY STABILIZATION

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, last night the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Morgenthau, addressed the people of the United States over two national broadcasting systems on the subject of the American dollar. In this address some very important suggestions and statements were made, and I desire very briefly to call attention to just one or two of them.

The first suggestion to which I call attention reads as follows:

The monetary policy of this administration rescued us from chaos; held the fort through the most trying period of our recovery program, and is now the spearhead as we advance steadily toward our goal.

At another point Mr. Morgenthau said the following:

You have heard the argument that we should stabilize by declaring that we will not change the present gold content of the dollar. Some even go so far as to say that the other nations would certainly follow, if we took the lead.

At still another point Mr. Morgenthau said:

The world should know that when it is ready to seek foreign exchange stabilization, Washington will not be an obstacle.

One other line I quote:

We are not unwilling to stabilize.

Mr. President, there are some difficulties in the matter of stabilization of the American dollar. Before we can stabilize the dollar I think we must first adjust the dollar, and I believe that no one now is of the opinion that the present value of the dollar is at that point where the dollar should be stabilized.

The other nations find themselves in the same difficulty in which the United States finds itself. I think that today or yesterday the former president of the World Bank at Basle, Switzerland, made the statement that before we could have any prosperity throughout the world, world currencies must be stabilized. I agree with that opinion, and I agree with the contention made by Mr. Morgenthau. But the press seemed to construe Mr. Morgenthau's statement to mean that while we are ready for stabilization, we are not ready to take the lead.

I call attention to a news story in the Journal of Commerce of this date. I find, in addition to the speech made by Mr. Morgenthau, some statements under the heading "Highlights of Address by Secretary Morgenthau", and I desire to call attention to just one sentence, as follows:

The United States is ready to stabilize its currency as soon as foreign nations are ready, but will not take the initiative.

I do not gather that interpretation from the address of Mr. Morgenthau. Other newspapers seem to think that we are ready to stabilize provided some other nation will take the lead. I should like to have someone state what nation is able to take the lead. There is only one other nation which might do so, and that is Great Britain. Great Britain has practically no silver and very little gold, and it occurs to me that a nation to take the lead in the stabilization of currencies should have a liberal supply of gold and a liberal supply of silver if it expects to use gold and silver as a basis for the stabilization of the currency of its own country and the currencies of the world.

Mr. President, because we have such a large amount of gold, practically $9,000,000,000 worth, and there is only about $20,000,000,000 in the world that can be used for money, which makes the American volume of gold nine-twentieths of all the monetary gold in the world, we are able at least to suggest stabilization to the gold-bloc countries. Because we have a billion ounces of silver, and the ability to acquire any amount of silver that is for sale, all of it, if necessary, we are in position to suggest stabilization to the silver-using countries of the world.

Mr. President, in order that this matter may have the attention to which it is entitled, I desire at this time to submit, with the permission of the Senate, a Senate concurrent resolution. I ask that the concurrent resolution be printed in the RECORD in full and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 15) submitted by Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, as follows:

Whereas the paramount question in the United States, as in all nations, is the coinage, issuance, regulation of the value and control of money and credit; and

Whereas under section 8 of article I of the Constitution, the Congress has original and exclusive jurisdiction over the coinage of money and the regulation of the value thereof; and

Whereas the Congress has heretofore delegated permissive powers to the President, under certain conditions and limitations, to issue money and to regulate the value of such money; and

Whereas the money of the United States should be coined, issued, and regulated in value to serve the best interests of our people and with relation to the other currencies of the world; and

Whereas world currencies should and must be stabilized; and

Whereas the nations of the world are looking to the United States to initiate steps for concerted action leading to the stabilization of world currencies; and

Whereas the United States can and should take the lead in this necessary movement; and

Whereas the adjustment and regulation of the value of the several units of currencies of the several nations are the domestic problems of such several nations; and

Whereas in order to stabilize currencies which circulate in international exchange it will be necessary to adopt some form of monetary metal, either gold or silver, or both, at some fixed ratio, in order to definitely and positively support and back such currencies: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring). That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized and requested to suggest to the responsible authorities of the nations of the world the advisability of preparing for early concerted action looking toward the stabilization of the currencies of such several nations; be it

Resolved further, That since some one-half of the people of the world use silver as money; since the other half of the people formerly used gold as money and as the basis for the issuance of currency; since most of the nations of the world today are on a commodity or managed-currency basis; and since the United States has adopted a policy of using both gold and silver as money and the basis for the issuance of currency, the President is hereby authorized and requested to suggest to the several nations of the world the advisability of considering the use of both gold and silver at an agreed and fixed ratio as a form of specie to be secured and held as the basis of the currencies of the several respective nations; be it further

Resolved, That the President, acting as the agent of the Congress, be, and he is hereby, authorized and requested to take immediate steps looking toward the adjustment and regulation of the value of the dollar so as to have such dollar serve the best interests of our people and consequently promote our domestic economy; and that in the regulation and adjustment of the value of such dollar the President is authorized and requested to take into full account and give proper consideration to the following:

(a) The amount of the annual total tax bill of our several units of government.

(b) The amount of the annual total public and private interest items.

(c) The amount of the consolidated or massed debts, public and private, owed by the several units of government, corporations, and the people jointly and severally; be it further

Resolved, That when the United States, acting through the Congress and its agent or agents, has satisfactorily adjusted and regulated the value of the dollar, the President be, and he is hereby, authorized and requested to arrange for and call a world conference on monetary policies and the stabilization of world monetary units.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I desire to address to the Senator from Oklahoma one or two questions which are along the line of the discussion and pertinent to the assertions made by the Senator from Oklahoma.

I wonder whether the Senator from Oklahoma realizes that by reason of a policy which is now pursued by our Treasury Department we are placing the control of our currency, and especially the control of our silver, in the hands of those who control the British market for silver. I refer especially to the provision whereby we are taxing our American dollars in silver and exempting the British dollars in silver.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, it is because of a fear that the country might take the interpretation given to Mr. Morgenthau's speech by the public press as an admission that the United States would not become interested in the stabilization of currencies until some other nation took the lead that I have submitted the concurrent resolution. The purpose of the resolution is to set forth the steps which the nations must take and the steps which this Government must take preliminary to stabilization.

We are not ready for stabilization. No country is ready for stabilization. My resolution suggests the steps we must take and the steps other nations must take preliminary to even discussing stabilization. It is because of the fear that another country, a very substantial country, which now has the control of the silver market of the world, is seeking to secure the control of the gold market of the world, to the advantage of that country and to the possible disadvantage of the United States, that I have injected myself to the extent of offering the concurrent resolution.

COLUMBIA BROADCASTING SYSTEM PROGRAM POLICIES

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I hold in my hand a pamphlet containing the new program policies which have just been announced by the Columbia Broadcasting System, which are very gratifying to me as Chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee. I also have in my hand a statement issued by Mr. Prall, Chairman of the Federal Communications Commission, in connection with the new Columbia Broadcasting System policy. I ask that both the state of Commissioner Prall and the pamphlet containing the new policies be inserted in the RECORD as part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the letter and pamphlet were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF ANNING S. PRALL, CHAIRMAN OF THE FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION IN CONNECTION WITH THE NEW COLUMBIA BROADCASTING SYSTEM PROGRAM POLICIES

FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C., May 14, 1935.

This new pronouncement of policy by the Columbia Broadcasting System is gratifying not merely because it is one of the most forward-looking steps ever undertaken in the great American radio industry but also because it is the considered undertaking of a network serving more than 100 stations from coast to coast.

Such an example of wise leadership can hardly fail to exert a profound influence on American broadcasting generally. The net effect of such a marked raising of broadcasting standards can only be to enhance further radio's unique influence on our modern ways of living and thinking, and to increase at the same time the interest of the listener and the value of the broadcast service to him.

NEW POLICIES—A STATEMENT TO THE PUBLIC, TO ADVERTISERS, AND TO ADVERTISING AGENCIES, MAY 15, 1935—THE COLUMBIA BROADCASTING SYSTEM

As radio broadcasting expands its audience and augments its influence, there devolves upon the broadcaster and the program sponsor an ever-greater responsibility.

Similarly, as radio continues to become a more intimate force in the lives of people, they tend to be more sensitive to broadcasting they like and to broadcasting they do not like. It is incumbent upon the broadcaster constantly to examine general policy so as to assure steady progress in building and holding radio's audience. Such watchfulness serves the interests of the audience, of the advertiser, and of the broadcasting companies alike.

The Columbia Broadcasting System has given particular consideration to recent trends in two general types of commercial program: Those which are designed for children, and those involving unpleasant discussions of bodily functions, bodily symptoms, or other matters which similarly infringe on good taste. In addition, as a result of expressed public interest, careful study has been given to the amount of time that should be used by sponsors for their advertising messages.

CHILDREN'S PROGRAMS

Wide variations in viewpoint exist among parents as to programs which they regard as suitable for their children to hear, and similar differences exist between parents and children. The same divergence of opinion is frequently found among authorities.

Commercial sponsors of broadcasts addressed to children are devoting great effort and much money to creating programs that merit the approval both of child and parent. It is also true that there have been instances of poor judgment and careless execution. To eliminate such faults would be gratifying to all those who feel a deep responsibility for the rearing and education of impressionable youth.

The Columbia Broadcasting System has no thought of setting itself up as an arbiter of what is proper for children to hear; but it does have an editorial responsibility to the community, in the interpretation of public wish and sentiment, which cannot be waived.

In accordance with this responsibility we list some specific themes and dramatic treatments which are not to be permitted in broadcasts for children.

The exalting, as modern heroes, of gangsters, criminals, and racketeers will not be allowed.

Disrespect for either parental or other proper authority must not be glorified or encouraged.

Cruelty, greed, and selfishness must not be presented as worthy motivations.

Programs that arouse harmful nervous reactions in the child must not be presented.

Conceit, smugness, or an unwarranted sense of superiority over others less fortunate may not be presented as laudable.

Recklessness and abandon must not be falsely identified with a healthy spirit of adventure.

Unfair exploitation of others for personal gain must not be made praiseworthy.

Dishonesty and deceit are not to be made appealing or attractive to the child.

We realize that distinctions in aesthetic values and feeling which may be wholly obvious between two given treatments of dramatic material cannot always be easily specified in words. Thus, for instance, it is not easy to capture in definition the fine distinctions between the pure fantasy which comprises some of the world's greatest literature for children, and the fantastic distortion of realities which is unsuitable for a youthful audience. Nonetheless, the differences between these forms of entertainment become rather obvious when the two are compared side by side.

A program for children of elementary school age should offer entertainment of a moral character in the widest social sense. It should not obtain its entertainment value at the cost of distorting ethical and social relationships in a manner prejudicial to sound character development and emotional welfare.

In general, it is worth noting that the literature for children which continues to find their favor through many generations offers heroes worthy of the child's ready impulse to hero worship, and of his imitative urge to pattern himself after the hero model. Such literature, whether created 100 years ago or written today, succeeds in inspiring the child to socially useful and laudable ideals such as generosity, industry, kindness, and respect for authority; it opens doors into wide worlds that may be reality or fantasy, but are in neither event ugly or repellent in aspect; it serves, in effect, as a useful adjunct to that education which the growing and impressionable child is absorbing during every moment of its waking day.

It is our hope and purpose to stimulate the creation of a better standard in children's programs than has yet been achieved.

To be of assistance in reaching this goal, Columbia is engaging the services of an eminent child psychologist who will have the benefit of an advisory board of qualified members, with the special purpose of pointing the way toward programs designed to meet the approval of parents, children, and educators alike. Columbia hopes thus to be equipped to appreciate and apply the parent's practical point of view no less than to reflect studied scientific judgment. The name of this consulting authority, and the membership of this committee, will be announced soon; and the new policy becomes completely effective July 30.

ADVERTISING WHICH DISCUSSES INTERNAL BODILY FUNCTIONS, SYMPTOMS, ETC.

The Columbia Broadcasting System has concluded, after serious consideration, to permit no broadcasting for any product which describes graphically or repellently any internal bodily functions, symptomatic results of internal disturbances, or matters which are generally not considered acceptable topics in social groups.

This policy will specifically exclude from the Columbia network not only all advertising of laxatives as such, but the advertising of any laxative properties in any other product. It will further exclude the discussion of depilatories, deodorants, and other broadcasting which, by its nature presents questions of good taste in connection with radio listening.

As to new business, this policy becomes effective immediately, May 15, 1935. As to existing business, it becomes effective as rapidly as present commitments with clients expire. The last of these expires in March 1936. Meanwhile, the advertising continuities for any such product are to be so worded as to conform strictly with a specific standard of new requirements.

Many programs containing such advertising in the past have offered entertainment of great merit, judged by the strictest standards.

On the other hand, many people prefer not to hear such advertising over the radio, regardless of the excellence of the program. The reason for this viewpoint is obvious: Radio broadcasting is heard by mixed and assorted groups of all kinds, in the home, in restaurants, and in public meeting places. In certain groups a listener may find it distasteful to hear a discussion of some subject which under other circumstances he finds wholly fitting and proper.

Similarly, we realize that the personal and often intimate quality of the human voice, radio's medium of presenting its sponsor's messages, forbids discussing subjects on the air in a manner which might be wholly acceptable when read in type.

COMMERCIAL ANNOUNCEMENTS

In the last several years advertisers and agencies have themselves been responsible, in many instances, for the discovery that brief and skillful handling of the commercial announcement—rather than obviously excessive and insistent sales talk—creates effective response and universal commendation and good will.

The Columbia Broadcasting System recognizes, with many advertisers and with the public, the desirability of avoiding advertising announcements that are too lengthy or too frequent.

As a result, numerous advertisers have condensed their sales announcements to a marked extent, to their own satisfaction and the demonstrated approval of the listening audience.

With the interest of the audience and of the great majority of advertisers in mind, the Columbia Broadcasting System considers it desirable, at this time, to set the following maximum allowances for commercial announcements, effective July 30, 1935:

EVENING PROGRAMS

A maximum of 10 percent of the total broadcasting period may be devoted to the sponsor's commercial announcements, including contests and offers, on programs broadcast after 6 p. m. This applies to all full-hour programs, three-quarter hour programs, and half-hour programs. A single exception to the 10-percent ratio will be made on quarter-hour programs, on which an additional allowance not to exceed 40 seconds will be made in recognition of the fact that the short program necessarily requires as much time as the longer one for routine identification announcements.

The following table shows, in minutes and seconds, the maximum amount of commercial talk which will be permitted, under these limits, on programs of various lengths broadcast after 6 p. m.:

Full-hour programs: All commercial announcements not to total more than 6 minutes.

Three-quarter hour programs: All commercial announcements not to total more than 4 minutes 30 seconds.

Half-hour programs: All commercial announcements not to total more than 3 minutes.

Quarter-hour programs: All commercial announcements not to total more than 2 minutes 10 seconds.

Unpleasantly rapid delivery of the sales message to effect a crowding of excessive material into the period allowed for the commercial announcement will not be permitted.

DAYTIME PROGRAMS

The Columbia Broadcasting System has decided on a lesser curtailment of the amount of advertising in daytime programs for a number of reasons. Programs broadcast during the morning and afternoon hours serve vast numbers of women as a medium of useful information. Many of these programs are educative in both cultural and practical fields. Many of them offer valuable help in solving household economic problems, discussion of which requires more detailed statement of the sponsor's service or product. To deprive the daytime listener of such discussion would subtract from the broad usefulness of radiobroadcasting.

Sponsored programs in the daytime will accordingly be allowed a maximum of 15 percent of the total broadcast period for commercial announcements, with an additional 40 seconds on the quarter-hour program.

PUBLIC ACCEPTANCE

We are satisfied that the best thought of many leading advertisers as well as of the broadcasting industry is reflected in these policies. They set higher standards than broadcasting has attempted before.

We have adopted them after years of experience and careful consideration of every aspect of the problems involved. For these new policies we ask the full cooperation of the public, the advertiser, and the broadcasting industry.

BASIC ADVERTISING POLICIES

The three important new policies set forth in the foregoing statement represent an extension of basic Columbia policies with which advertisers and advertising agencies have long been familiar and which have served to maintain commercial broadcasting on the Columbia network on a high ethical plane. These basic points of policy, most of which have been in effect since the inception of the Columbia network, are here restated:

1. No false or unwarranted claims for any product or service.
2. No infringements of another advertiser's rights through plagiarism or unfair imitation of either program idea or copy.
3. No disparagement of competitors or competitive goods.
4. No lottery or "drawing contest." No contest of any kind in which the public is unfairly treated.
5. No programs or announcements that are slanderous, obscene, or profane, either in theme or in treatment.
6. No ambiguous statements that may be misleading to the listening audience.
7. Not more than two price mentions on a 15-minute program. Not more than three price mentions on a half-hour program. Not more than five price mentions on a full-hour program.
8. No advertising matter or announcements or programs which may in the opinion of the system be injurious or prejudicial to the interests of the public, the Columbia Broadcasting System, or honest advertising and reputable business in general.
9. No appeals for funds.
10. No testimonials which cannot be authenticated.

NEUTRALITY—ADDRESS BY ADMIRAL WILLIAM S. SIMS

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD an address delivered on May 8, 1935, by Vice Admiral William S. Sims, retired, United States Navy, on the subject of Neutrality.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

What can we do to make sure we shall not be drawn into another Great War?

It is easy to indicate policies that would in theory keep us out. But the question is as to whether these policies could actually be carried out in a war atmosphere, when opposed by the powerful pressure of human greed, of commercial interests.

The Great War showed us how very powerful is the force of this influence.

As a neutral we claimed the freedom of the seas—the right to trade with all belligerents and neutrals. At least, we claimed the right as a neutral to trade with all other neutrals.

We made this claim because we wanted the enormous profits of such a trade. The needs of the belligerents were so great that they were willing to pay almost anything for the vast quantities of goods they had to have to carry on the war.

As a result, we were sending to the Scandinavian countries from 20 to 30 times as much copper, cotton, rubber, food, and other needed supplies as we were in 1913, knowing that they were shipping these goods down into Germany.

According to a statement by one of our Senators, sea freight rates were from 300 to 2,000 percent higher than before the war.

While the trade and manufacturing of the belligerents were greatly curtailed by the fighting, American trade was booming.

Millions of extra acres were plowed up and planted in grain, the price of wheat was doubled, manufacturing plants were operating at capacity, many were extended, including munitions of war plants, and the product of all was being sold to the highest bidder, either friends or enemies.

We had relatively little unemployment, wages were abnormally high, mechanics in silk shirts were paid more than ministers and college professors, and millionaires were multiplying.

The war was a golden harvest for our people, a get-rich-quick chance not to be neglected. The general feeling of traders was expressed by a remark overheard in a New York subway:

"If this war will only last another year, I will be a millionaire."

All this neutral trade was under the protection of our Government. We made constant threats warning the belligerents that our trade must not be restricted.

Our diplomatic notes were ineffective, and it was the disregard of our rights as neutrals that finally forced us into the war.

Thus the enormous pressure of the golden stream of war profits made us insist upon our right to make money out of the vital needs of nations fighting for their lives, and to insist upon being protected in this trade.

Well, some people ask, if that is what took us into the great war, then why not empower the President to declare an embargo on all contraband trade?

Nowadays, this would mean an embargo on nearly every kind of commodity. Almost every commodity is useful or necessary in war.

Cotton, rubber, food, and so on, are no less essential than bullets. A blockaded country must surrender to starvation no less than to an invading army.

In any event, an embargo is a double-barreled shotgun with the breech open; it shoots both ways; it hurts the gunner almost as much as it does the one he shoots at.

And of course opposition to an embargo would be tremendous; particularly while other neutrals were reaping fat profits.

Don't forget that the embargo we declared in 1812 nearly drove some of our New England States to secede and join Canada.

It would be practically impossible for a President to obtain the necessary support for a wholesale embargo.

But there is another course open to us. A course less drastic, not calling for so great a sacrifice of profits, and therefore more workable.

This course is for our Congress to declare that all trade in contraband, which nowadays means nearly everything, must be at the risk of the traders; and that no compensation for loss by action of belligerents would be demanded by our Government.

For example, if an American ship carrying such supplies was sunk by a belligerent, our Government would make no claim, much less would we declare war.

The individual trader out for huge war profits would have to bear the risk himself.

This would greatly reduce the profits of neutral trade, and it would, of course, be difficult to get our people to agree to restrict in this way their opportunity to make money.

But it would also greatly reduce the chance of our being drawn into a war. And, therefore, I believe that every effort should be made to bring about the adoption of this war-time policy.

So far I have spoken only of the influence of the very natural desire of our people to make money during a war; but, of course, the same human desire operates in all countries to the same discouraging degree.

Discouraging because, in the midst of the horrors of a world at war, people seem to act with little or no regard for the interests of humanity, or even for their own national interests.

We all know by this time that this malign influence is so strong that people will even profit by trading with their countries' enemies.

It is hardly possible to overstate the power for evil of this acquisitive desire.

For example, in the early part of the war, the British were not able to stop, or sufficiently restrict the flow of trade from England itself to the Scandinavian countries and thence into Germany, although the government was kept thoroughly informed of the great extent of this trade by Admiral Consett, the British naval attaché in the northern countries.

Admiral Consett also showed that British agreements with these countries that goods should not be sent to Germany were continuously violated.

Though this extremely damaging trade was carried on at a time of great national danger, the British Government was not able to stop it.

I mention this only to show the almost irresistible influence of commercial interests upon the actions of governments. Had it not been for these controlling interests the war could probably have been ended in 1916.

These facts were set forth years ago in a thoroughly documented book by Admiral Consett entitled "The Triumph of Unarmed Forces."

Now, many people have suggested that all such matters as neutrality, the rules of warfare, and the relations between nations could be effectively regulated by treaties.

Now, of what value are treaties in withstanding such forces, armed and unarmed?

From history it is clear that treaties and international law will be violated whenever a nation has its back to the wall.

Suppose, for example, a nation were fighting for its life. And suppose the United States were sending vast quantities of goods to that nation's enemy, by way of trade through neutral countries. It is quite certain that the nation fighting for its life would stop as much of such trade as it could.

And no mere provision of any trade treaty or of international law would prevent this. In the face of disaster the treaty would become a scrap of paper.

That is, no nation at war can respect a treaty made in peace if compliance with it would cause defeat. Under such conditions armed insistence upon the freedom of the seas would simply mean war. Such insistence on our rights would be the way to get into a war, not the way to stay out.

There is even some justification for the cynical remark that there is a clause in all treaties, written in invisible ink, that the hot blast of the first crisis will render visible.

This invisible clause is as follows:

"The provisions of this treaty shall be strictly complied with at all times, except when, in the judgment of any of the contracting parties, such compliance would be politically or economically undesirable."

If the obstacles in the way of keeping out of a war are as I have described them, what are we going to do about it?

The point of the whole business is this: We cannot keep out of a war and at the same time enforce the freedom of the seas—that is, the freedom to make profits out of countries in a death struggle.

If a war arises, we must therefore choose between two courses: Between great profits, with grave risks of war on the one hand; or smaller profits and less risk on the other.

When I say "we" I mean not only the traders themselves but all of us, for practically our whole population benefited by this war-time trade, though we did not understand that we were inviting disaster for ourselves and for the world.

But to resist the political pressure for protection in such a trade would be a difficult job for any President. Yet it would not, I think, be impossible.

And it would be much easier for the President if every American citizen understood the grave choice that would face us—and did his part.

And the time to decide is now, while we can think calmly and clearly, before war propaganda gets in its deadly work. Much may be done by preparing in advance a wise foreign policy that aims at a realistic understanding of the vital issues.

To this end, we, as a people, must come to understand that peace is priceless; that it is worth any reasonable sacrifice; that it is certainly worth any sacrifice of war profits; that a decent regard for humanity must be placed ahead of gold.

Therefore, let every citizen who has the cause of honorable peace at heart take this stand:

"Our trade as a neutral must be at the risk of the traders; our Army and Navy must not be used to protect this trade. It is a choice of profits or peace. Our country must remain at peace."

THE UNION LABEL—DISCUSSION BETWEEN I. M. ORNBURN AND JOHN M. BAER

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, on Monday, April 22, 1935, I. M. Ornburn, secretary-treasurer of the Union Label Trades Department of the American Federation of Labor, and Hon. John M. Baer, former Representative from North Dakota, engaged in a dialogue discussion on the subject of the union label over the national network of the Columbia Broadcasting System. Mr. Ornburn is an authority on the subject, and I believe all the Members of the Senate will undoubtedly wish to read this brief discussion. I ask unanimous consent that the address may be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, together with an editorial on the same subject by Mr. Ornburn.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Question. Mr. Ornburn, what is the union label?

Answer. The union label, Mr. Baer, is a symbol which is displayed by means of a cloth or paper label, stamp, or other imprint upon products to indicate that they are made in unionized shops, factories, and industrial establishments.

Question. What is a shop card?

Answer. A shop card is a printed sign which is displayed in the window or on the wall of all shops and business places whose employees are unionized.

Question. What are union working buttons?

Answer. Working buttons are similar to the insignia of lodges or fraternal orders and are worn in the same manner. The working button gives assurance that the services are rendered by a member of a trade union.

Question. How many labels, shop cards, and buttons are there at the present time?

Answer. There are 60 in all, but each trade has a distinctive label or design.

Question. Do all the trades affiliated with the American Federation of Labor have union labels, Mr. Ornburn?

Answer. No; not all the unions have union labels, but all the trades which display union labels are affiliated with the American Federation of Labor.

Question. Is there any official body which represents the union label trades?

Answer. Yes, indeed; the Union Label Trades Department of the American Federation of Labor, Washington, D. C.

Question. How many members of trade unions are affiliated with the Union Label Trades Department?

Answer. There are more than a million members of the trade unions who designate their products and services by union labels.

Question. For what does the union label stand, Mr. Ornburn?

Answer. It stands for the identical principles which trade unions have fought to establish. They are shorter hours, higher wages, and better working conditions.

Question. Will members of trade unions and their friends, who do not have union labels, benefit by buying union-made goods?

Answer. They will benefit in just the degree that they buy union-made goods, because they will raise the standards of living of not only the members of other trade unions, but also of the average citizen.

Question. Why do you say that it will increase the income and better the conditions of the average citizen?

Answer. Because it is generally conceded that if it were not for union labor's fight for shorter working hours, higher wages, and better working conditions, the unorganized worker would not enjoy these great privileges.

Question. Then, Mr. Ornburn, do you believe that by purchasing products which bear the union label one is not only helping the average citizen, whether he belongs to a union or not, but that he is also helping to raise American standards of living?

Answer. Yes; the organized-labor movement has been the greatest factor in raising American standards for both the organized and unorganized workers.

Question. What effect do you think the purchasing of union-made goods will have upon the prosperity of our Nation?

Answer. From past experience we positively know that this country will not pull itself out of this disastrous economic depression until prevailing union wages are permanently established, and that the buying of union-made products is the best guarantee of union standards.

Question. Is the union label displayed on foreign-made goods?

Answer. The union label is not displayed on products which are made in any foreign land. The union label is the only assurance that the product is American made, as well as union made.

Question. Is the Blue Eagle a substitute for the union label?

Answer. No; it is not, Mr. Baer. The Blue Eagle is sometimes displayed on products which are manufactured under inferior conditions to those established by the American labor movement.

Question. You stated, Mr. Ornburn, that the union label was the best assurance that the product is made in the United States. Do you mean to say that the Blue Eagle is displayed on foreign-made goods?

Answer. I am sorry to say that the Blue Eagle is displayed on goods made in foreign countries.

Question. Under what authority is the emblem of the Blue Eagle placed upon foreign-made goods?

Answer. In the National Recovery Administration the importers have a code which allows them to place the Blue Eagle on products after they are imported into this country.

Question. If industry complies with the minimum wages, maximum hours, and other provisions of the N. R. A. codes, does not that assure the purchaser that the products are made under union conditions?

Answer. No, Mr. Baer; because a comparison of the wages and hours of the N. R. A. codes with those of trade-union agreements will prove beyond question that they do not rise to the standards obtained by organized labor.

Question. What effect do imports have upon the American worker?

Answer. They reduce the wages of American workers. Eventually imports, if not checked, will lengthen the working hours and reduce the worker to the slavery conditions which exist in many foreign lands.

Question. Then, it is your opinion, Mr. Ornburn, that there are no standards in the world as high as those set by the American labor movement?

Answer. That is correct. Buying under the union label is unquestionably the only way to maintain the hours, wages, and conditions for which trade unions have fought for many years.

Question. It is your conclusion, then, that by reducing the wages of American workers you necessarily reduce their purchasing power and that this Nation will not recover so long as American dollars are spent for foreign-made goods?

Answer. Exactly so. If we do not increase the buying power of our own consumers, we shall be unable to take care of the increased production of our own factories. Consequently, we shall never be able to emerge from this depression.

Question. Is it your belief that we should engage the women in this campaign to buy union-made goods?

Answer. The ladies are very important! Recently a large advertising concern announced that the women members of the family purchase 85 percent of all the products which go into the household. Consequently it is absolutely necessary to enroll the wives of trades-unionists and their friends into this campaign to encourage the purchase of union-label goods.

Question. Tell me, is child labor employed in the manufacture of foreign-made goods?

Answer. Yes; it is. Children are employed under the most depressive conditions in the shops where these goods are made in foreign lands.

Question. Does the union label appear on prison-made goods?

Answer. No; it does not. There is some effort being made to prevent prison-made goods from competing with the products of free American citizens, but to date no definite results have been obtained.

Question. How is the buying public to know where to buy union goods and services?

Answer. If the customer does not see the shop card or buttons, then he must look for the union label on the goods.

Question. But what if the merchant or other business man does not have union-made products?

Answer. If he has no union-label products, ask him to put in a line if he desires to retain your trade.

Question. Does the union label insure the purchaser of any higher quality merchandise?

Answer. Yes, Mr. Baer; the discriminating buyer will look for union-made goods because they are made by skilled and experienced workers under the most sanitary and satisfactory union conditions.

Question. Where can the retailer find out who manufactures union-made goods?

Answer. A directory of the industries which display the union label will be furnished by the Union Label Trades Department, American Federation of Labor Building, Washington, D. C.

Question. Will not the demand for products which bear the union label increase the cost of living?

Answer. Every sane plan for bringing about recovery includes some increase in commodity prices. This increase in commodity prices should start with higher wages for workers and increased prices for farm products. Naturally, then, this will increase the purchasing power of both the workers and farmers, and only through increasing their incomes can the business of this country return to a normal basis. During the World War, when prices were high, there was no unemployment in the cities and there were few foreclosures on the farms.

Of course, safeguards should be made to protect the consumers against monopoly and profiteering in the handling of products of both farm and factory. There has always been too great a spread between the producer and consumer, but even with the waste of our system of distribution, when commodity prices were high, we did not have 20,000,000 citizens on the relief rolls, and poverty in the midst of plenty on the farms of this country. On the contrary, we did have higher wages, which doubled our pay rolls, and commodity prices which trebled the incomes of the farmers. And, allow me to add the amazing fact that with those high wages and farm prices, the cost of living was not perceptibly higher than it is at the present time.

Question. What is the extent of the purchasing power of union-label goods at the present time, Mr. Ornburn?

Answer. The members of all trade unions have seen the great advantage of buying union-label goods. There are now 6,000,000 organized workers in the American labor movement. Including their wives and other members of their families, the 6,000,000 union members would comprise 30,000,000 consumers. In addition, trade unionists influence their friends to buy union-made products, and these buying consumers have become the greatest force in the Nation. Acting together, they could advance by several decades the cause of organized labor, which means higher wages, shorter hours, and better working conditions.

Question. In what general lines of goods and services can the consuming public find the union label, shop card, and button?

Answer. In almost every line. Take, for example, a meal or a drink. The consumer should look for the union house card or the union bar card. The waiters and waitresses, the cook, the bartender, and miscellaneous workers in every union establishment wear the working button. Even the bottle or barrel from which your refreshing drink is served is often union made, and it is probably delivered by the regular union of teamsters and chauffeurs. Again, if you want a cigar or a package of cigarettes, union brands bear the union label. The same is true of pipe and chewing tobacco, as well as stogies.

If you wish to purchase food, inquire if the bread, crackers, or other confectioneries are made by union bakers. You should also look for the union market shop card when you buy meat. The retail clerks in all mercantile establishments can join a union. In this case the retail clerks' shop card is displayed. There are union labels for every article of wearing apparel.

Question. We hear a great deal about home building in the new deal. How about union labor in the construction of a home?

Answer. Carpenters, painters, paperhangers, plumbers, plasterers, cement workers, and electrical mechanics belong to international unions affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, and each craft has its own union trade mark.

Question. Now you have covered about all the necessities of life. How about amusements?

Answer. Well, now, I'll ask you some questions, Mr. Baer. Did you know that the moving-picture machine operators and theatrical stage employees are members of unions? Did you know that music is furnished by union musicians? And before you go out for the evening, did you know that you can obtain a first-class shave or haircut in a union barber shop?

Question. Are books, magazines, newspapers, and other publications printed in union print shops?

Answer. All the print crafts have union labels, and these labels are often combined under one label of the allied printing trades.

Question. Who makes the tools and machinery which all these workers use?

Answer. The shops in which every kind of machinery is made and mechanical work performed employ members of the metals trades unions. There are union machinists, molders, sheet-metal workers, iron, steel, and tin workers, and various other metal workers.

Question. Then, it is your conclusion that by purchasing union-label goods, which are made under union conditions and in America, the buying public will be making a substantial investment in the security and prosperity of our own land?

Answer. That is absolutely true, Mr. Baer, and in that statement I believe I have the support of every fair-minded economist or authority who has at heart the welfare of our own Nation. If time permitted, I believe I could prove that by buying in our home market the United States would gain greater economic independence. Consequently, it would keep us out of foreign wars and entanglements, thereby assuring our Nation peace as well as prosperity.

Mr. NYE. The following editorial is by I. M. Ornburn, secretary-treasurer Union Label Trades Department, and has appeared in the labor press throughout the country:

THE BLUE EAGLE IS NOT A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE UNION LABEL

There are some who think that the Blue Eagle is a substitute for the union label. This false idea is fostered by certain anti-union employers who see in it a distinct advantage, because the union label represents standards of employment superior to those required by the National Recovery Administration.

The Blue Eagle does not signify that products are made under trade-union conditions. Daily, newspapers direct our attention to the business establishments which are entitled to use the Blue Eagle, but which completely ignore proper representation and collective bargaining agreements by denying their workers the right to organize.

Other industries which fly the Blue Eagle may comply with the minimum wages, maximum hours, and other labor provisions of the N. R. A. codes, but it does not insure to the purchaser of their products that the workers in those industries are receiving the higher wages, shorter hours, and better working conditions which have been established by trade unions. It is necessary only to compare the minimum wages and maximum hours of the codes with those of trade-union agreements to prove these statements beyond question. Buying under the union label, shop card, and button is unquestionably the only way to maintain the hours, wages, and conditions for which trade unions have fought for many years.

The Blue Eagle is also placed on prison-made products which go into interstate commerce and unfairly compete with the union-made products of free American citizens.

The union label assures the purchaser that the goods are made in America. Importers are allowed to place the Blue Eagle on goods made in European and Asiatic countries under extremely low and depressing conditions of employment. If the products are made in foreign lands, the purchaser has no guaranty that they are not made by child labor or enslaved men and women. The union label thus assures the buying public that the goods are not only union made but also that they are made in America.

The discriminating purchaser will look for the union label because it will insure the highest quality of goods made under the most sanitary conditions by skilled workers. The union label guarantees that the goods are not foreign made. The union label assures the purchaser that the business establishments which display it pay their workers higher wages, work them shorter hours and under better conditions than those which display only the blue eagle.

Therefore when it comes to union labels and the Blue Eagles, look for both of them, if you choose, but demand the union label. There is no substitute!

ANALYSIS OF STABILIZATION AMENDMENT TO BANKING ACT OF 1935

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, omitting all nonessentials and unimportant matters, my amendment inserts only four words in the House committee's mandate to the Federal Reserve Board for the administration of our monetary policy as provided for in title II of the Banking Act of 1935. I thus meet the criticism that the House amendment does not sufficiently satisfy the constitutional requirement in stating the legislative objective.

The object of title II is to give power to the Federal Reserve Board to administer our monetary policy in such a way as to bring about or restore full employment and business activity, and thereafter to stabilize production, trade, prices, and employment.

In view of those facts, my amendment was drawn as follows:

It shall be the duty of the Federal Reserve Board to exercise such powers as it possesses in such manner as to promote conditions conducive to full employment and business activity, and thereafter to mitigate by its influence unstabilizing fluctuations in the general level of production, trade, prices, and employment, so far as may be possible within the scope of monetary action and credit administration.

The words "full employment", the word "activity", and the word "thereafter", as underscored, were inserted by me in order to attain the objective referred to of stating clearly both the legislative policy and the legislative will, in the form of a congressional mandate to the Federal Reserve Board.

Recently I took the pains to point out that there now lies within the hands of bankers the potential makings for one of the most stupendous inflations this or any other nation has ever experienced. It is for this reason that I have said that the Banking Act of 1935 is conceived as our most essential safeguard. My amendment is deliberately conceived with the expressed purpose in mind of strengthening the act as a safeguard against both inflation and deflation.

It is universally recognized, I believe, that our objective must be the restoration of industrial employment to the highest practicable level and to restore business activity to a maximum. That, it must be conceded, is a legitimate and laudable objective.

Consonant with the increase in industrial employment and business activity there must of necessity take place a legitimate expansion of credit and currency. To the extent that these three factors undergo a proportional degree of change, inflation will not arise. It is axiomatic, I presume, that full employment and business activity cannot be expected to come about without the accompaniment of a somewhat comparable rise in the general level of all prices.

After employment and business activity are restored the Federal Reserve Board would be required to use all of its powers to—Mitigate by its influence unstabilizing fluctuations in the general level of production, trade, prices, and employment, so far as may be possible within the scope of monetary action and credit administration.

Those powers of the Board which are directly referred to as being "within the scope of monetary action and credit administration" are: First, the power of the Board to direct Reserve banks to buy and sell eligible paper, including Government securities, in the open market; second, control over rediscount rates; and, third, the power to change the reserve requirements of member banks. Under this mandate any administration can be held responsible for the results. The power is given; and they can be held responsible if they do not exercise the power to restore and maintain full employment in industry and full business activity.

The absurd objection that this monetary policy would interfere with member banks in extending credit as they see fit has no foundation whatever in the pending Banking Act of 1935. The monetary policy of Congress is one thing; the business of lending money by the member banks is another thing entirely.

You will note that in the above amendment no particular reference is made to either silver, gold, or a specific price level. This, in my estimation, is correct.

International exchange, tariffs, embargoes, bounties, subsidies, the ownership of banks, and other issues must be dealt with wholly upon their own merits. It is, in my opinion, impossible for us to find a common solution for any one or all of these issues in conjunction with the main issue raised in title II, namely, the determination of our monetary policy. For instance, international-exchange agreements cannot be legislated by Congress for the obvious reason that Great Britain, France, Germany, Italy, Japan, and other nations determine in individual cases one-half of the international-exchange equation.

Tariffs, embargoes, bounties, and subsidies must be dealt with subject to the determination of, first, our monetary policy, and, second, the international exchange ratios. The ownership of either the Federal Reserve banks or commercial banks is not and cannot be made a part of the major problem, namely, the determination of our national monetary policy. Irrespective of who ultimately shall own the banks, a definite answer must be made as to who shall control the administration of our monetary policy and what that policy shall be.

A rise of prices resulting from an undue expansion of credit and currency or in excess of that necessary to promote conditions conducive to "full employment and business activity" would be an evidence of inflation.

Conversely, a recession of prices, accompanied by unemployment, or the existence of more than a reasonable amount of unemployment, irrespective of any particular price level, would be an evidence of contraction or deflation.

Under my amendment it would definitely be the intention and mandate of Congress that both inflation and deflation, as I have defined them, would be outlawed, and that the Federal Reserve Board would be held strictly accountable for the ultimate results arising from the administration of our monetary policy under the mandate.

In my estimation, the amendment as drawn satisfies the constitutional question which has been raised. At the same time, it avoids any embarrassment or disappointment which might arise from the insertion of a particular price level, due to the fact that any particular price level might prove to be either too low or too high. Moreover, it has the merit of fulfilling almost all of the expressed "norms" or levels advocated by conservatives, liberals, and "left-wingers"; in fact, it writes into the law what every reasonable person must be willing to concede is just and proper.

Mr. President, in this connection, I have received a letter from Mr. Alfred Owen Crozier, of White Plains, N. Y., and one from Mr. F. Jacobson, of Long Island City, N. Y., which I ask to have printed as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NATIONAL REPUBLICAN CLUB,
White Plains, N. Y., May 7, 1935.

HON. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Chairman Senate Banking and Currency Committee,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Since writing enclosed acknowledgment of receipt of copies of banking and currency bills you kindly sent to me I have read and fully agree with your full printed statement in re bill S. 1715.

That means that I totally disagree with the report filed by the Republican members of the House Banking and Currency Committee attacking and opposing title II of your said S. 1715 banking bill.

"It is the same old cat coming out of another hole." It is the eternal question—the fight for "private control of the public currency." Jefferson and Jackson opposed it when in form of a privately owned central bank issuing and controlling the volume of the public currency.

The Aldrich privately owned central bank measure was an attempt to fasten on this country beyond all possible repeal for 50 years private control of the public currency, and of bank credit based thereon.

Aldrich and Cannon induced President Taft to approve their scheme in his message to Congress in December 1911—and got only eight votes in the electoral college for reelection in 1912, an endorsement of the measure having been forced into the Republican platform of 1912.

Theodore Roosevelt, in the first speech of his 1912 campaign, at Providence, R. I., complied with my urgent request and with the advice of George W. Perkins by denouncing in unqualified terms the Aldrich central bank scheme and the Aldrich schedules in the tariff.

The Progressive Party platform contained the plank denouncing the Aldrich central bank measure, which I personally urged before the full platform committee in 1912.

I stood by the side of "Teddy" in Milwaukee when he was shot, having just made an appointment to go with him on his car to Chicago that night after his speech, to try and get him to drop Taft personalities during the final weeks of the campaign and concentrate wholly on the old Andrew Jackson issue by fighting private control of the public currency and the power in private hands to inflate and contract the country's whole supply of money and credit, the power to create alternating booms and depressions. That assassin's bullet may have changed history.

Our Republican leaders seem to have short memories. They now again seek foolishly to commit the party of Abraham Lincoln to the doctrine that the people cannot be trusted, that ours should be a Government "for the people" by and for the profit of banking corporations, and never a government "of the people and by the people", when it comes to making and administering laws, under the Constitution, providing the people and American business with their necessary supply of public currency and of bank credit based on such currency hoarded in bank reserves.

It looks like our alleged Republican leaders have no more sense than to pick up the poker by its hot end instead of its cool end just as it's pulled out of the fire—as to banking and currency legislation.

No doubt it will help in Wall Street in raising campaign funds, to use the Republican Party in Congress to keep the power to make the supply of money and credit scarce or plentiful—the power to cause speculative booms by wild-credit inflation, and to cause depression by drastic and dangerous currency and credit contraction—but it will gain no votes among the distressed masses of the people.

At the personal request of Mr. Bryan, I went to Baltimore and he personally introduced me to the Democratic platform committee in 1912; I spoke about 20 minutes, exposing the joker in the Aldrich central-bank measure—the fact that the Aldrich measure, if passed, could not be repealed for 50 years, it being a charter under Supreme Court decisions—and I urged a plank condemning the Aldrich central-bank scheme, and that plank was in the Democratic platform of 1912.

Present Democratic leaders have since discovered that in some very vital ways their party leaders in 1913 were deceived and overreached by some of their financial advisers, and that the Federal Reserve law in fact created and legalized private control of the public currency, and a complete exclusive monopoly of the issuance and control of the whole public currency and of all bank credit based on such currency.

Paul M. Warburg, claimed to be and was the actual author of the Aldrich central-bank scheme with its 12 regional branches, and as President Wilson made him a member of the Federal Reserve Board at the very beginning, it is fair to assume that directly or indirectly his was the clever hand that framed the Federal Reserve System composed of 12 regional-central banks all tied together by the Bankers Advisory Council.

The law of 1913 was safer in that there is reserved to Congress the right to repeal or amend the law any time, but the functions and powers under that law were very largely identical with those of the Aldrich measure. Both took control of the public currency away from our Government and granted it exclusively to the Federal banks owned by their member banks.

The promised "elastic currency" is a myth—it does not expand and contract automatically but in accordance with the wishes of the banking system—therefore it increases when it should decrease, and it decreases when it should increase, the result being a boom or a depression. Private control of the public currency and its Federal Reserve machinery ruined the country, and the banking system which now demands that it be left in position to do the same thing again in the same way.

The nominal public control provided in the pending bill never could work so badly as has private control—the country and business never will be safe until the Government owns all of the Federal banks and uses them to control the currency and not to do a banking business.

Respectfully yours,

ALFRED OWEN CROZIER.

LONG ISLAND CITY, N. Y., May 3, 1935.

HON. SENATOR DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Chairman Senate Committee on Banking and Currency,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We respectfully submit the following facts for your serious consideration:

1. The ----- Bank of this city has begun to charge us $2... per month service charge, the first time since we opened our account, over 10 years ago.
2. This, despite the fact that our average balance has been higher than ever before, namely about $250....
3. We are advised by the bank that we must carry an average balance of at least $1,000... to avoid service charge, if we maintain the same activity.
4. Our activity consists in writing 2 to 3 checks a day.
5. The local banks have combined to make uniform service charges so that we cannot get relief by changing our bank.
6. Two dollars and .. cents a month amounts to $24... a year. With about 1,000,000 small checking accounts in the country the bankers have set out to collect about $24,000,000 from the people. According to the ideas of the bankers, this can be avoided only if the people deposit with them, for cold storage, approximately $1,000,000,000.

Does our Government of the people stand for this? If not, how can we save ourselves from such abuse? Have the banks forgotten that only a couple of years ago they were saved by intervention of our Government? Government action is necessary to avoid the people's concerted action which would be disastrous for all concerned. Your reply and advice would be greatly appreciated.

Respectfully yours,

(Signed) F. JACOBSON.

TENNESSEE VALLEY AUTHORITY

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2357) to amend an act entitled "An act to improve the navigability and to provide for the flood control of the Tennessee River; to provide for the reforestation and the proper use of marginal lands in the Tennessee Valley; to provide for the agricultural and industrial development of said valley; to provide for the national defense by the creation of a corporation for the operation of Government properties at and near Muscle Shoals in the State of Alabama; and for other purposes", approved May 18, 1933.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, at the time we took a recess the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON] had the floor. I do not see him in the Chamber at the present time.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I have sent for the Senator from Iowa, and I think I shall suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will recognize the Senator from Nebraska on the particular bill now pending.

Mr. NORRIS. I am ready to proceed.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. I think we might, while waiting for the arrival of the Senator from Iowa, consider an amendment which I have offered, and which is now on the table. Has the Senator from Nebraska any objection to taking up that amendment now?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I should be glad to have that done.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed, on page 7, line 16, after the word "according", to strike out all down to and including the comma after the word "Board", in line 17, and to insert in lieu thereof the following: "to the uniform system of accounting for public utilities as accepted by the Bureau of Internal Revenue."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I anticipated that the Senator from Michigan would have some remarks to make about the amendment. I have no objection to the amendment, except that I understand that the Federal Power Commission now has the power under general law to provide for a uniform system of accounting as applied to private utilities, and I suggest to the Senator from Michigan that instead of the Bureau of Internal Revenue he insert in his amendment the Federal Power Commission. If I am misinformed about the existing law, then, of course, I would not suggest this change, but I understand that the law is as I have stated it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] desire to modify his amendment?

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, when we enacted the Federal Power Commission Act I think it was drafted by me, and at least passed upon by the Interstate Commerce Committee, and the only power given to the Federal Power Commission, obviously, was to regulate the accounting systems of their licenses. For example, they licensed a certain water-power company and under the licensing agreement, which provided for recapture in 50 years, they obviously had to set up the method of accounting, and it had to be uniform.

In spite of what the Senator from Nebraska says, I know that the Federal Power Commission has absolutely no control over the private operating utility companies, not to say anything about any control over the Nation-wide holding companies. However, in the credits which are allowed for deduction in income taxes, the Bureau of Internal Revenue has a uniform system of allowing credits of all kinds for obsolescence and depreciation, and that is the reason I offer this amendment, and I do not desire to have it changed.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I accept the statement of the Senator from Michigan, of course, about the existing law. The only reason why I suggested the change was because I feared if the Power Commission made a different rule for private companies than the Internal Revenue Bureau would make for the Government company there might come an objection, it seems to me, from private companies, which would be well founded, that they ought to be treated just the same, so far as their accounts are concerned, as any other company; but in view of the statement made by the Senator from Michigan I have no objection to the adoption of the amendment he has presented.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS].

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is before the Senate and still open to amendment.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I have an amendment which I desire to offer.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I was just going to offer some amendments.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well, I will wait until the Senator from Nebraska shall have presented his amendments.

Mr. NORRIS. I have three amendments, all of which I discussed the other day, and I will not again discuss them unless some Senator has questions to ask.

On page 4 of the bill, line 12, after the word "to", I move to insert the words "transmit and", so that it will read "transmit and market such power."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. NORRIS. The next amendment I propose I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of line 22, page 3, it is proposed to add the following:

The Board is also authorized to experiment in the production of chemicals and other modes and methods for the extermination of noxious weeds and the destruction of plants injurious to agriculture.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. NORRIS. I offer another amendment, which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of the bill it is proposed to add a new section, as follows:

SEC. 13. That section 4 of said act of May 18, 1933 (48 Stat. 58), be amended by adding subsection (1) as follows:

"(1) Shall have power to advise and cooperate in the readjustment of the population displaced by the construction of dams, the acquisition of reservoir areas, the protection of watersheds, the acquisition of rights-of-way and other necessary acquisitions of land, in order to effectuate the purposes of the act; and may cooperate with Federal, State, and local agencies to that end."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of the bill it is proposed to add a new section as follows:

SEC. 14. The Cumberland River and Cumberland River Basin shall be included by the provisions of this act, and the "Tennessee Valley Authority" shall exercise the same jurisdiction and power over the Cumberland River and the Cumberland River Basin as over the Tennessee River and the Tennessee River Basin, and all the provisions of this act that apply to the Tennessee River and the Tennessee River Basin and the Mississippi River Basin shall likewise, and with like force, apply to the Cumberland River and the Cumberland River Basin.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, continuing the discussion which I started the other day, I am inclined to think the amendments which have just been adopted broaden the bill to the point where it is more offensive to the authority of the Constitution than it was theretofore. My discussion led up to the question whether the fact that Congress has the right to control navigation and flood control, in connection with which and incidental thereto power is produced, carries with it the right to produce electrical energy, purchase equipment therefor, build distributing lines, and extend such activities to the point where they become the major enterprise rather than the first or primary purpose of the legislation.

Citing again the decision of Judge Grubb in the case of Ashwander v. Tennessee Valley Authority (8 Federal Supplement), I now read from page 896 as follows:

The fact that purposes other than navigation, national defense, or regulation of proprietary property are incidentally served would not invalidate the exercise of the authority conferred, even if the other purposes alone would not have justified an exercise of the power. However, if the other purposes are not related to any constitutional powers or are not incidental to their exercise, they stand independently for their legality and are not supported by them. A plan for the development of the Tennessee River Valley, as a social experiment, is in no sense related to the improvement of navigation of the Tennessee River, or to the national defense, or to the regulation of Government-owned lands, and the production and sale of electrical power in aid of such development and experiment would not be incidental or related to the exercise of any of the constitutional powers named.

The only reason why I am discussing the bill at all is because I do not believe we ought to give the Supreme Court the impression that, without anyone objecting whatsoever, we seek to extend the power to make a navigation project into a project for the production of power, so that project becomes a power project rather than a navigation project. The Senator from Nebraska referred the other day to the case of the Railroad Retirement Board as petitioners against Alton Railroad Co. I am going to make two references to the case. In the printed opinion at page 15, I find the following:

Several purposes are expressed in section 2 (a), amongst them: To provide "adequately for the satisfactory retirement of aged employees"; "to make possible greater employment opportunity and more rapid advancement"; to provide by the administration and construction of the act "the greatest practicable amount of relief from unemployment and the greatest possible use of resources available for said purpose and for the payment of annuities for the relief of superannuated employees." The respondents assert and the petitioners admit that though these may in and of themselves be laudable objects, they have no reasonable relation to the business of interstate transportation.

After a thorough discussion the majority opinion of the court, quoting from page 19, holds:

The petitioners, conscious of the truth of this statement, endeavor to avoid its force by the argument that social and humanitarian considerations demand the support of the retired employee. They assert that it would be unthinkable to retire a man without pension, and add that attempted separation of retirement and pensions is unreal in any practical sense, since it would be impossible to require carriers to cast old workers aside without means of support. The supposed impossibility arises from a failure to distinguish constitutional power from social desirability. The relation of retirement to safety and efficiency is distinct from the relation of a pension to the same ends, and the two relationships are not to be confused.

In the final analysis, the petitioners' sole reliance is the thesis that efficiency depends upon morale and morale, in turn, upon assurance of security for the worker's old age. Thus, pensions are sought to be related to efficiency of transportation and brought within the commerce power. In supporting the act the petitioners constantly recur to such phrases as "old-age security", "assurance of old-age security", "improvement of employee morale and efficiency through providing definite assurance of old-age security", "assurance of old-age support", "mind at ease", and "fear of old-age dependency." These expressions are frequently connected with assertions that the removal of the fear of old-age dependency will tend to create a better morale throughout the ranks of employees. The theory is that one who has an assurance against future dependency will do his work more cheerfully and therefore more efficiently. The question at once presents itself whether the fostering of a contented mind on the part of an employee by legislation of this type is in any just sense a regulation of interstate transportation. If that question be answered in the affirmative, obviously there is no limit to the field of so-called "regulation." The catalog of means and actions which might be imposed upon an employer in any business tending to the satisfaction and comfort of his employees seems endless. Provision for free medical attendance and nursing, for clothing, for food, for housing, for the education of children, and a hundred other matters might with equal propriety be proposed as tending to relieve the employee of mental strain and worry.

In addition to that, as cited by the Senator from Nebraska the other day through his reference, I find that in the minority opinion Chief Justice Hughes read from the report of former Senator Sutherland, who is now an Associate Justice, which report is found in Senate Document 338, Sixty-second Congress, second session, and among the principles announced was that—

If the proposed legislation effectuates any constitutional power, it is not rendered unconstitutional because to a greater or less extent it may accomplish or tend to accomplish some other result which as a separate and independent matter would be wholly beyond the power of Congress to deal with.

The question here is whether or not we are, in attempting to control the surplus power, embarking the Government upon the public-utility business in a way that is not authorized under the Constitution. Can such a procedure be said to be incidental to the powers granted in the bill which are within the provision of the Constitution? That is the phase of the matter to which I desire briefly to address myself.

I think there are certain tendencies being shown here all along the line that the major purpose of the Tennessee Valley Authority is not to increase navigation or make navigation more certain or to do the things which are within the constitutional power of the Congress. I think it is clearly developing that the whole program of the Tennessee Valley Authority is outside of the real authority intended to be granted, and for that reason many of the functions of the Tennessee Valley Authority are beyond the authority which it was intended should be granted this organization by the legislation heretofore enacted.

In order to show the tendency of the present Tennessee Valley Authority I am going to quote from the hearings in 1934 before the House committee on the deficiency appropriation bill, at which time Dr. Morgan was a witness. I find that in this testimony he cites as the matters to which they are looking forward various phases of the work, and in these citations he always gives emphasis to the production of power, to the lowering of rates, to the improvement of the social conditions of the locality. He does not emphasize, and did not emphasize, the question of benefits to navigation, or benefits in the way of flood control.

In this hearing one of the things that Dr. Morgan specified first was that they were going to determine what type of raw materials could be found in those localities, and he said they proposed to find a way, through cheap power, of utilizing and manufacturing those products. I do not see how that can be held to be an outgrowth of navigation, how it can be connected up with navigation, how in any way flood control or the activities which are authorized under the Constitution can be hooked up with a program such as Dr. Morgan describes. He is conscious of the fact that the coal producers have been making objections to some of the things that are being done in the Tennessee Valley, on the theory that when power is produced and displaces coal the miner engaged in producing coal may be thrown out of work. Dr. Morgan speaks of the various phases of their work, and then he comes down to the item of ceramics, pottery.

Reading from Dr. Morgan's testimony, at page 276, he says:

For instance, in the past 2 or 3 years the electric firing of ceramics—that is, pottery, etc.—is just taking all Europe. We get a large part of our pottery imported from foreign countries and they are abandoning firing by coal and gas. They are taking on firing by electricity which is far more economical.

Now, we have the best ceramic material in the world right there.

I am not disputing any of these suggestions by Dr. Morgan. I am simply reciting them to show that in his mind that which is uppermost is the effort to ascertain what can be done down there to create new industry, and improve the social and living conditions of the country. I am not adverse to a program of that kind. My challenge is whether or not it is subsidiary to and connected with the production of surplus power.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McCARRAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield.

Mr. BONE. As I listen to the Senator's argument I desire to get one point plain in my mind, because the Senator is the spokesman of the Republican Party on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. DICKINSON. I do not claim to be a spokesman for any party. I am just a work horse.

Mr. BONE. The Senator will allow me to draw my own conclusions, for he has been the spokesman for the Republican Party throughout the West, and has so assumed to speak to public bodies. I should like now to have the Senator tell me whether his opposition to the Muscle Shoals project speaks the opposition of the Republican Party to public ownership of power.

Mr. DICKINSON. I have never talked on the question with any other Republican, and I have never been consulted by any other Republican.

Mr. BONE. I may say to the Senator that I intended to use his observations in the West, where the Republican organizations and Republican spokesmen seem very thoroughly set on the idea of having the Grand Coulee and the Bonneville projects built, and I merely wish to know whether the Republican Party in the East rises to damn those projects. If that is to be the Republican theorem, I wish to know it and to be able to tell the people in the West that such is the case.

Mr. DICKINSON. Let me ask the Senator from Washington whether, regardless of whether or not this is permitted under the Constitution, he wishes to proceed with it anyway.

Mr. BONE. I merely wish to know whether the Senator speaks the Republican viewpoint on this question. Just forget the Constitution for a moment.

Mr. DICKINSON. I have made no suggestion that I am speaking for anybody other than myself.

Mr. BONE. I understand; but the Senator is making very plain his opposition, and I am going to use the Senator's statements as the position of the Republican Party.

Mr. DICKINSON. Permit me to assure the Senator from Washington that he may use my opposition in any way he wishes.

Mr. BONE. Exactly, and that is what I propose to do—but I merely want the Senator now to make it plain—I think he wishes to be fair—that the Republican Party hates public ownership of power. Be honest with us, and say so.

Mr. DICKINSON. I have never suggested that the Republican Party had anything to do with my stand, and I do not now so suggest. The Senator cannot quote me as controlling the Republican Party. I do not control it. I am against public-utility ownership by the Government.

Mr. BONE. Exactly. Now the Senator has made it very plain.

Mr. DICKINSON. I am speaking for myself personally when I say that. I do not think the Government ought to go into the public-utility business.

Mr. BONE. No; but I think the Senator has been the spokesman of the Republican Party, and I think the Senator is going to make it very plain to us, as other members of his party here do, that the Republican Party hates and will bitterly fight public ownership of power. Let us make that very plain to the whole country, so that we shall have no illusions about it.

Mr. DICKINSON. I will make it very plain to the Senator from Washington right now that I am opposed to it.

Mr. BONE. Exactly; and the Republican Party is. Let us not try to "kid" the country.

Mr. DICKINSON. I am not committing the Republican Party at all. I am saying to the Senator, and I am going to say to the Senate, why I am opposed to this measure. Personally, I do not believe the Government ought to go into this business. I am going to try to show why I do not think it is within the provisions of the Constitution, and I am also going to state it on my own responsibility. Whether or not the Republican Party wishes to adopt a program of that kind is purely its own business.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? I do not desire to divert the Senator.

Mr. DICKINSON. The Senator is not going to divert me.

Mr. BONE. I understand; the Senator is too able a platform man to be diverted by a tyro like myself; but I wish to say to the Senator that the opposition of the Republican Party in the West to public ownership of power was not predicated on constitutional grounds, but on the grounds which the Senator always emphasizes, that he does not want the Government in competition with the power trust.

Let us be perfectly fair about this matter. The only reason I have ever made these suggestions on the floor of this body is that I want men to be fair about this thing, and not hide behind the skirts of the Constitution, but come out bluntly and say they object to public ownership of power. I think the people of this country now are fully prepared to understand that the constitutional objection is raised here when it is not raised in areas of the country where it could not be raised. In my State there was no question about the right of the people to go into the business of developing power plants and selling power, and out there the opponents of the projects did not raise this constitutional question. Opponents stressed the idea that there was something grossly immoral about the people themselves producing power.

Mr. DICKINSON. Let me say to the Senator that in the State of Iowa municipal ownership is permitted and is practiced. There is no restriction whatsoever on it. I am not for the Federal Government coming out there and going into the power business, but I am for permitting the municipalities to do what they please about it. I suggested the other day that I was not for the Tennessee Valley Authority having permission, through a type of authority, to go into a locality and force elections taking taxable property out of the tax list and leaving the citizens without that source of revenue purely on the theory that lower rates are to be thus obtained, on the theory that great benefits are to result from public ownership, when, as a matter of fact, experience has shown that public ownership is not the most beneficial procedure.

Mr. BONE. I am glad—

Mr. DICKINSON. Please wait until I proceed further. Just wait a minute.

I have here a chart which shows that from 1913 to 1934 there has been a decline of over 40 percent in the price which families have paid for power for use in their own homes. As a general rule, power rates have been going down all the time. On the other hand, what is happening with reference to taxation? Taxation—Federal, State, and local—has been going up all the time; it has gone up over 800 percent. I can remember when the electric-light bill was considered to be high, and our taxes were considered to be low. Now, as a matter of fact, we do not have complaint with reference to the price being paid for electric light, but we find that our local taxes are going up all the time, all along the line. I desire to suggest, also, that every time a State or a municipality or some other function of government engages in the operation of a plant of this kind the result is to take out of the taxable assets a valuable property and to put it over in the exempt column; and that is one of the things which are now happening in the Tennessee Valley.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I think the Senator will modify his last statement when he obtains the facts. The condition in the Tennessee Valley, where he says that is going on, is best illustrated by the town of Tupelo, Miss., where the Tennessee Valley Authority is furnishing current to the municipality. The price of electricity went down more than half. The provision under which the town obtained electricity from the T. V. A. provided that they should pay to the municipality the same amount of money in lieu of taxes that the private company would have paid had they owned the property; also that they should pay to the municipality an interest rate on the investment in the property which the town owned. The result was that, while rates went away down, consumption more than trebled, and the money was paid for taxes just as though the plant had been privately owned.

That contradicts point-blank the statement of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. DICKINSON. The Tennessee Valley Act contains a provision, which has been referred to by the Senator, which I think is very fair. However, we find a difference when we go into other States, when we go into my city, for instance. I was city clerk for a number of years when we had a municipal electric-light plant, one of the most successful, I think, that has ever been established out in our section of the country, and our rates were perfectly satisfactory. We have never had any difficulty with them whatsoever, although that plant does not pay a dollar of taxes to our town. I say that that town ought to have the privilege of having a municipal electric-light plant if it wants to. I have no objection to that. The question I am raising is whether or not there ought to be a superpower authority which tries to use influence that will convince people that they ought to have a municipal plant when, as a matter of fact, I think they ought to decide it for themselves.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit an interruption there—

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no figures here, but the Senator can take any town in the Tennessee Valley where they have had an election to decide whether there should be a municipal distributing plant to buy power from the T. V. A., and there is no question on earth but that some more money, three times more money, was used by the private interests to defeat such an ordinance than was used to bring about the adoption of that kind of an ordinance.

Mr. DICKINSON. I have never made an investigation along that line, but I am very familiar with the town in Mississippi referred to. Dr. Morgan covers it in his testimony. I do not believe that the Tennessee Valley Authority knows now the rate at which it can furnish power. I do not believe this activity is advanced to the point where they can fix a rate on power which can be depended upon for the future.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator yield again?

Mr. DICKINSON. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. If this country is to be ruled by injunctions issued by judges, and the Tennessee Valley Authority is to be restrained by judges from building any more lines, from building any more dams, from building any transmission lines, then it is true that it must fail, because it is admitted, to start with, that the Tennessee Valley Authority cannot furnish power, for instance, to a town like Tupelo, Miss., at the price at which they are now furnishing it unless they are also permitted to sell to other municipalities the electricity which is now going to waste by the hundreds of thousands of dollars worth on account of that injunction. It is true that if an injunction is issued when they are supplying one town restraining them from supplying any other town, the enterprise must fail, because they must supply more than one town in order to succeed. However, I will say to the Senator that before any of these rates were computed they were investigated by the best engineers obtainable, and experience has shown that the rates to be fixed at Tupelo will eventually be very much lower unless the Nation is turned over to injunctions issued by the courts, and the courts run the country.

Mr. DICKINSON. I do not concur in the view of the Senator that if the injunction in the case we have in mind shall stand the Authority will not build any more dams. All the injunction does, as I understand, is to prevent the Authority from going into the public utilities business in the matter of building distributing lines, generating plants, and so forth.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator has been very courteous in yielding to me, and I will not interrupt him unless he is perfectly willing that I shall do so.

Mr. DICKINSON. It is perfectly agreeable.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator has been speaking about the injunction issued by Judge Grubb?

Mr. DICKINSON. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. That injunction provided that the Tennessee Valley Authority should be restrained from making any improvements, building any transmission lines, or supplying any one of the 14 towns in Alabama they were going to supply. It concluded by saying that if the T. V. A. had any activity it wanted to follow it was at liberty to apply to the court for a change in any particular in the injunction which had been issued.

Relying on that, some farmers living within a few miles of the Wilson Dam, where at this moment hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of power is going to waste and doing nobody any good, applied to the T. V. A., after the injunction had been issued, asking them to build a transmission line and supply them with electricity.

It was not a case where there were customers to be taken from any other power producer. Those farmers were without electricity. The Alabama Power Co., surrounding them on all sides with wires, had been there for years and years, and not a kilowatt had been furnished to these farmers. So the farmers asked the T. V. A. to make a survey. They made the survey, concluded that it would be a good thing to comply with the request, decided that they could afford to build a transmission line at the price agreed upon, and sell the farmers electricity.

The line would have been 15 miles long, connected with no private lines, having nothing to do with anything of the kind, but running directly from the Wilson Dam. However, the Authority had to go to the court and, with hat in hand, had to say to the judge, "Notwithstanding the fact that Congress and the President have given us authority, you are greater than all of them, and we want you to permit us to supply these farmers with electricity", and the judge turned down the application on an affidavit from the manager of the Alabama Power Co., which, incidentally, was supposed to be with the defendant. I have a copy of the affidavit on my desk. The reason for turning it down was that the manager of the Alabama Power Co. said in his affidavit, "If you supply these farmers with electricity at the rate you propose to give them it will make our customers in the surrounding villages and cities discontented, because they are paying us a higher rate." So the judge turned it down. That is government by injunction.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, it is my impression that there are two distinct policies here, and I know the Senator has been fighting for one for a good many years; that is, that the people shall have the right to construct transmission lines and distributing lines. It is my understanding that at the Boulder Dam all of the electricity is sold at the switchboard. The question here—and I think it is purely a constitutional question, and it may be that we ought to change the Constitution—is whether or not, under the Constitution as it now stands, we are permitted as a government to go into the sale of power, through transmission lines and distributing plants and generating plants. I think it is a clear-cut case.

Mr. NORRIS. I take it from what he says that the Senator would like to have the Tennessee Valley Act modified so that the Tennessee Valley Authority would not be able to transmit power, but would have to sell the power at the bus board where it is produced. That was the basis of a controversy, and I admit that it is a two-sided question. The power companies are all on one side and the people are on the other. That was the question which presented itself to those of us who were members of the committee of conference between the Senate and the House when the Muscle Shoals controversy was before us. The original Senate bill provided, as did every Senate bill with which I had anything to do, that the Corporation set-up, known as the "T. V. A.", would have a right to transmit the power. The opposition on the conference committee, controlling the House vote, was against that proposal. They said:

We will make no further objection to the Muscle Shoals bill if you will simply agree that they cannot transmit power but must sell it at the bus board.

What would have been the outcome? As I looked at it, and as I look at it yet, it would have been entirely useless to enact the Tennessee Valley Authority law—I would not have favored it—because at Muscle Shoals, for instance, where the Government owns a great dam and a great steam plant, it would have meant that they would have had to sell all their electricity to the Alabama Power Co. There would have been no other customer. If they did not sell it to the Alabama Power Co., every one of the municipalities would have to build a transmission line to the Government place of generation in order to obtain any power.

Mr. DICKINSON. Could not the farmers, to whom the Senator has referred, have presented their application to the Authority and have taken their electricity from the switchboard?

Mr. NORRIS. They could have done so, but they would have had to build a transmission line; and if the Senator had had his way, the city of Florence would have had to do the same thing. Tuscumbia, another city, within sound of the roaring water, would have had to build another transmission line; and all the other towns would have had to do the same thing. Moreover, the dam is near the Tennessee line. Suppose a municipality in Tennessee wanted to come there and get electricity. It could not build a transmission line in Alabama without the consent of Alabama. The result would have been that there would not have been any transmission lines; but if there had been, there would have been a multiplication of them by the hundreds.

Mr. DICKINSON. The thought I had in mind was simply that there would be no reason why numerous municipalities could not join and be served by the same line.

Mr. NORRIS. They could, but it would have been extremely difficult. If a State line had to be crossed for practical purposes, it would have been an impossibility; it could not have been done.

Mr. DICKINSON. Will the Senator please suggest what he thinks is the conflict of interest between the right of a State to control rates under a State utility commission as against the Tennessee Valley Authority and their control of rates?

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, that is not involved in this proposed legislation at all; but I have no hesitancy in saying that the Tennessee Valley Authority would have a right to make a rate in Alabama and in Tennessee, and, under the law, the rates would have to be the same, of course, making allowance for differences in distance and other distinctions which might arise; but they would have no right under the T. V. A. Act to discriminate, and charge one town a higher price than they would charge another for the same kind of service.

Mr. DICKINSON. I agree with that; but the Tennessee Valley Authority also would have a right to make a rate in conflict with a rate fixed by a State authority.

Mr. NORRIS. I should think so; yes.

Mr. DICKINSON. That was my impression.

To show the drift that this matter has taken, I think it is tremendously interesting to note the various proposals which are now being advanced. I concur in the statement that the Grubb decision is a very far-reaching decision. If the Grubb decision should be affirmed by the United States Supreme Court, and the Government should wish to pursue the plan suggested by the Senator from Nebraska, we would probably have to have a constitutional amendment in order to permit it to be done. I see no way whereby we can possibly say that this is an incidental endeavor to a thing which is already authorized under the Constitution, and that is the reason why I am discussing it.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, I do not agree with the Senator in that respect. That phase may be the most important phase. It may be more important than navigation, more important than flood control.

Mr. DICKINSON. Does not the Senator think it is more important?

Mr. NORRIS. In some cases I think it would be; but, considering the constitutional peg upon which the Senator hangs his argument, everything that may result from the exercise of the constitutional power in a systematic, economical manner must follow, it seems to me. If I am not right, then we should need a constitutional amendment if we should carry on what we propose to do.

I entirely agree with the doctrine laid down in the dissenting opinion by Chief Justice Hughes which the Senator has already read. It seems to me it states the matter clearly and concisely. While it is a minority opinion, nevertheless, as the Senator recognizes, the Chief Justice quotes from the language of a member of the Court who joined in the majority opinion, namely, former Senator Sutherland. If the Senator will permit me, I should like to read it now.

Mr. DICKINSON. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. It illustrates what I am trying to show.

A thorough examination—

Says Justice Hughes—

of the question of constitutional authority to adopt such a compulsory measure was made some years ago by a commission constituted under a joint resolution of Congress, of which Senator Sutherland (now Mr. Justice Sutherland) was chairman. Its elaborate and unanimous report, transmitted to Congress by President Taft with his complete approval, considered the constitutional question in all aspects, upheld the congressional power, and proposed its exercise. Among the principles announced was that "If the proposed legislation effectuates any constitutional power, it is not rendered unconstitutional because to a greater or less extent it may accomplish or tend to accomplish some other result which, as a separate and independent matter, would be wholly beyond the power of Congress to deal with."

In other words, I think if Congress builds a dam to assist in navigation, which it is conceded it has a right to do, or to authorize the T. V. A. to do; and if, in the building of that dam, electricity is developed, an amount of electricity which standing alone, by itself, would be a very important item—an immense quantity of it, say 100,000 horsepower, more than sometimes, in some seasons of the year, is developed at Wilson Dam—as I see it, it would be perfectly foolish to say to the T. V. A., "You have a right to build that dam, that is constitutional, but you have no right to make any electricity. It must go to waste if you make it. You can use only enough to operate governmental facilities, and beyond that it must go to waste." I do not think that is good doctrine.

Mr. DICKINSON. No. Would the Senator say, however, by reason of the fact that the T. V. A. produces electricity, that the Government ought to give the T. V. A. the right to build the transmission lines, and to extend them all over the country, to transmit the whole supply to the various farms?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. DICKINSON. And also to sell electrical equipment, in order to school people in the use of electrical equipment?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I should say that wherever electricity can be used by means of transmission lines, or wherever it can be bought by people, the Authority should have a right to transmit it. In other words, if it is produced, as it is, at Wilson Dam, and it cannot be disposed of, we place ourselves at once in the hands of the Alabama Power Co., the only instrumentality which can distribute it.

Suppose that dam produced wheat instead of electricity: Would the Senator say it could not be sold anywhere but in the immediate neighborhood? Suppose it produced bread; suppose it produced some chemical, and over 10 miles away there was a market for it. Could it not be taken over to the market?

Mr. DICKINSON. I should dislike to say, if it produced wheat, that we could go into the milling business, and then into the bakery business, and then into every other business, including the delivery of bread to the consumer.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator, I think, is in error. The Government does not do that. The Government does not go into the towns, into the homes of the towns. The Government sells the electricity to the towns.

Suppose wheat were produced and the nearest mill were 50 miles away, would the Senator prohibit the Government from taking the wheat to that mill where it could be ground into flour? The Government takes the electricity to the municipality, sells it to the municipality, and the municipality does the distributing. It sells the electricity to the people who use it.

Mr. DICKINSON. Let me suggest that if there is authority for the creation of the Electric Home and Farm Authority there is authority directly to do all the things which that agency does.

Mr. NORRIS. But the T. V. A. did not create that agency. The Senator must not insinuate that.

Mr. DICKINSON. Who did create it?

Mr. NORRIS. The President created it out of a fund which Congress had appropriated and given him for various purposes. The T. V. A. did not create that agency.

Mr. DICKINSON. It is not an agency of the Tennessee Valley Authority?

Mr. NORRIS. No; it is not a subsidiary in any sense.

Mr. DICKINSON. It was supplied with funds, of course, by the Public Works Administration?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. DICKINSON. There is no question about that.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MALONEY in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield.

Mr. BONE. May I ask the Senator if it is his viewpoint as a lawyer that the effect of the Grubb decision, if sustained, will be absolutely to forbid the United States Government, through any of these agencies which it has created, to enter into the power business and to sell power commercially?

Mr. DICKINSON. Does the Senator mean to retail it?

Mr. BONE. Yes; or to wholesale it outside.

Mr. DICKINSON. I think that will be the effect.

Mr. BONE. That is what I am getting at. In other words, if the Grubb decision, or the logic of that decision, is sustained by the Supreme Court, that virtually means the end of plants such as Muscle Shoals, Grand Coulee, Casper-Alcova, and Boulder Dam with respect to their power attributes; that is, the production and sale of power?

Mr. DICKINSON. No; with respect to their going into the retail business. They can produce power, however.

Mr. BONE. But can they go into wholesaling, in selling to cities and communities?

Mr. DICKINSON. That is retailing.

Mr. BONE. In other words, they cannot go beyond the mere production of a sufficient amount of energy to operate the governmental facilities at the dam—that is, for pumping the water, for lifting the gates, or something of that sort? That is correct, is it?

Mr. DICKINSON. They have the right to sell the surplus power which they produce at the switchboard, but they would not have the right to go into the erection of transmission lines and the distribution and sale of the power to municipalities or to any other type of distributing organization.

Mr. BONE. The Senator does not assume, I take it, that if a maximum of 5,000 horsepower were required to operate the facilities at the plant, the plant then might legitimately install generators and dynamos to produce 100,000 horsepower of energy, because obviously 5,000 horsepower would be all that would be required to operate the wheels of the dam and the motors for the gates. The Senator contends, I understand, that if 100,000 horsepower were developed and the surplus were sold, that that would be going into the power business?

Mr. DICKINSON. That would be going into the power business.

Mr. BONE. That is what I want to get at.

Mr. DICKINSON. For instance, we find that various bills, which are called "model bills", have been sent out by the administration to legislatures in the various States of the Union. That action shows the effort of the Government to control the legislation in the various States of the Union. I am glad to see that in the State of Iowa they threw the bills in the wastebasket, and that action was taken by a Democratic legislature and a Democratic Governor. None of the bills were given consideration.

Mr. BONE. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield.

Mr. BONE. What significance does the Senator attach to the fact that it was a Democratic legislature?

Mr. DICKINSON. They certainly are not sold on the Roosevelt program.

Mr. BONE. Does the Senator assume that a standpat Democrat is different from a standpat Republican when it comes to the matter of power?

Mr. DICKINSON. I do not know anything about standpat Democrats. All Democrats look alike to me.

Mr. BONE. The fact that so many Republicans share the Senator's viewpoint may account for the fact that his party failed to be returned to power in 1932.

Mr. DICKINSON. Let me state the purpose of these model bills or proposed forms of legislation which are being sent to the various States of the Union.

First, to regulate and conserve the State's water resources by regulating the use of water for power and other purposes.

Second, to create a State engineering control board which would have the authority to build dams, canals, and transmission lines for electric power, as well as steam-power plants. The bill appropriates $2,500,000 of State money to be made available in 1935, and $20,000,000 in State money to be made available in 1937.
